I say to you, Mr. Chairman, and through you to the House that I know the dealer trade and that they are by and large completely efficient and reliable from the standpoint of accumulation, processing and distribution, just the same as our farmer-growers are as good, reliable and efficient in the production field as can be found anywhere. Furthermore, I know that Ontario dealers support the basic principle on which the Ontario bean growers marketing board was established.

The agriculture industry, Mr. Chairman, is the sum of its several parts, each with a closely related responsibility to the other. The producer, processor and distributor, as well as consumer, whether the latter be domestic or foreign, each has an equally important role to play; but it can only be accomplished on a basis of mutual trust and confidence. The differences between some—and I emphasize some—growers as represented by the board, the dealers and the hon. Minister are small and if resolved, and resolved soon, can only result in a closer, stronger relationship of all segments of an important sector of our agricultural industry.

This, Mr. Chairman, is what my colleague, the hon. Minister of Agriculture, is endeavouring to bring about. In this I support him wholeheartedly. I suggest all in this House should support him rather than propose measures which can only be divisive in character, and which were stated for rather obvious purposes a few days ago.

Mr. Chairman, may I propose to the House also, the implementation of a suggestion that has been under consideration of the hon. Minister and his advisers for some time? I have reference to the establishment of research facilities which would combine the efforts of the growers board, the University of Guelph and other appropriate agencies in a programme of plant breeding and collection here in Ontario, with the end in mind of further developing varieties of seed that would be even more particularly adapted to the production needs and characteristics of the growing areas of our province.

As already mentioned, much has been done by Michigan state authorities in this important field. I have already indicated the extent to which improved varieties of seed have meant in broadening and extending the areas of production in Ontario. I am also aware of the nature and extent of the co-operation and collaboration between Michigan and Ontario in this important field of agriculture research. As we now appear to be on the threshold of exciting possibilities in terms of expanding our production areas even further, it occurred to me that we might pursue our endeavours in this direction even more aggressively with some special field testing and subsequent selection and plant breeding, using our own facilities as a measure of further collaboration in this field.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Hear, hear!

Mr. J. P. Spence (Kent East): Mr. Chairman, I was very interested, listening to the hon. Minister of Highways outlining the research programme for the bean industry in the province. I must say I have been greatly concerned in the past with this bean marketing board. The hon. Minister has told us that it is unconstitutional to have a bean plant operating under the board; there has to be something done to divide this. I believe he has had set up an inquiry by Price Waterhouse, and if I understand correctly, the report is in.

I must say, Mr. Minister, I had thought the bean board was one of the most successful boards we had in the province of Ontario. It has brought the price of beans to where most of us who are in the bean business can exist and make a livelihood. I am one who is very much concerned to hear this report from Price, Waterhouse. I must agree that they are a very capable firm, but I hesitate to go along with anything that might upset a fair return to the producers of beans. I hope the hon. Minister can advise us—maybe he has not yet made up his mind—what course is going to be followed since Price, Waterhouse has put in their report.

I want to say to the hon. Minister of Highways I do appreciate hearing him recommend a research programme for the bean industry here in the province of Ontario. I think it is a step forward; I think it is a step that should perhaps have been taken long ago, Mr. Chairman.

I am also very pleased to hear that there is a keen demand in the British market for Ontario-grown white beans. I wonder if the hon. Minister could advise us what course is going to be taken since this report has now reached his office.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Mr. Chairman, first of all I appreciate the comments of the hon. Minister of Highways, concerning, first of all, the support for me on the matter of establishing floor prices. I am so convinced that we are right in this that I believe that every day, even today, it is costing the bean farmers of the province of Ontario money not to have this price established. I mean that sincerely, because just as soon as that price is set across in the United States and this price here is not set, our bean dealers, with inquiries coming to them indicating the need and the demand of the British market for beans, cannot give them a price. That is how bad it is right here in the province of Ontario.

I am appreciative of the suggestion for further research facilities. I think we must recognize the fact that we have a research institute in the province of Ontario which has done, to my mind, a magnificent job in co-ordinating research within the province of Ontario and Canada, and indeed in the United States. This matter of research on growing and development of new varieties of beans came up, I believe, two years ago for discussion with the research institute. It was decided at that time to use every possible means of co-ordination between the University of Michigan research facilities on new varieties of beans and our own research stations here in Ontario at Guelph and at Ridgetown. There has been the closest co-ordination here, but I believe we must recognize the changing trends in the bean-growing areas across Ontario. They are expanding north and east very rapidly and, to a lesser degree, are being grown in areas of Kent and lower Lambton county. So I think the hon. Minister of Highways has made an excellent suggestion here. I feel that we should do a good deal more to establish test plots in these new areas to see what the reaction of climate and soil is going to be on these varieties.

Now, in connection with the question the hon. member for Kent East has raised concerning implementation of the Price, Water-house report, let me say it is under active discussion by the bean board. What they are going to do with it, I do not know, to date.

The other point that the hon. member raised was that the bean board had been the most effective commodity marketing board we have in the province of Ontario. I want to pay tribute to what the bean board has done. I believe in giving credit where credit is due, but I want also to point out, through you, Mr. Chairman, to the hon. members of this House, that I sometimes wonder if the bean board has acted in the best interests of all the bean farmers in Ontario or those who would like to grow beans in this province.

I point out to you that in 1962 and 1963, the bean dealers in this province in price negotiations offered the bean board $7 a hundred as a floor price for beans. And what was the price settled on? $6.35. Why? Why was this done, when we know that in Canada there is a market annually for at least 600,000 hundredweight of beans every year? The domestic consumption of beans in Canada is about 3 to 3.6 pounds, and it is increasing at about the rate of our population increase annually. So we know, relatively, what the annual consumption of beans is.

Along with this figure, there is a 77 cent stabilization fund taken off the price of beans to aid in export sales, over and above the domestic export price. There is not a reason in the world why the farmers of Ontario should not have gotten $7 a hundred minimum for their beans in 1962 and 1963. That is 600,000 hundredweight of beans at a loss of 65 cents a hundred. What does this figure out to in dollars and cents to the farmers of Ontario? In 1964, when it came to the price negotiations the bean dealers, among other reasons, said, "there is no point in us even offering, this group will not even accept the higher price for beans that we are ready to offer."

So there was nothing done about negotiations. They refused to negotiate. The take-over clause was one of the reasons. I will admit that they refused to negotiate, but certainly the experience of the last two years was indicative to them that there was bad faith some place along the line.

The result was that an arbitration was set up under the terms of The Farm Products Marketing Act and the price was established, not at $6.35 as the bean board wanted, but as arbitrarily was decided by the arbitration board at $6.60 a hundred for beans.

Mr. Spence: That is just the floor price.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: That is just the floor price, exactly. There is no reason why they cannot go on up, as they have gone on up. But I want to ask my hon. friend, why would the bean board set the price so low and then start bidding above that floor price for beans right off the bat? The simple fact of it is that what has been happening in the past is that when they bid more for beans than they were actually worth on the market and sold them for less than they could obtain on the market, they could reach into the other pocket, where their licence fee was, and take out the losses and pay the losses. The individual dealers cannot do that kind of thing.

Now that is one thing that I think is wrong. It is not easy for me, Mr. Chairman, to stand here in this House and say these things, nor for the Minister of Highways, the hon. member for Huron, to stand in this House and say these things about a commodity marketing board that affects the people in our own areas, that affects friends and neighbours of both of us, whom we know and have known since we grew up together and on whom we have differing opinions. But as a responsible Minister of the Crown in this government, I have to think of the good of the industry and of the farmers of Ontario, and I have to take that stand.

I plead with the bean board today, I plead with them, to recognize these differences and to sit down and resolve these differences in order that we might get on with the business of expanding the agricultural food exports of this province and really accomplish something that is worthwhile.

Mr. Spence: Mr. Chairman, may I ask the hon. Minister a question? One of our dealers is handling 60 per cent of the beans; is this fair, why is one dealer handling 60 per cent of the beans?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Mr. Chairman, I do not know whether there is anything fair about this or unfair about it. Surely to goodness—

Mr. Oliver: A lot of beans!

Hon. Mr. Stewart: A lot of beans indeed; a lot of beans is right; a trite statement. Nevertheless, I think it is indicative of the expansion of one man under the operation of the present bean board that has allowed him to reach the place you say he has reached.

Now there are differing figures as to whether he handles 60 per cent or not. There are figures quoted where he handles 40 per cent. There are some who say he handles 50 per cent, some 60. I do not know. But I do know this, Mr. Chairman, that we need the co-operation of bean dealers, just as we need the co-operation of all commodity handlers in this province who render a service to us as farmers and producers. That to me is just sound common sense and logic.

The way to get that co-operation, is to try to meet on common, mutual ground, recognize differences that may exist and try to iron them out to the general, mutual satisfaction of both parties, always bearing in mind that both groups are intended to serve, in the end result, the best interests of all agriculture.

Mr. Spence: Mr. Chairman, I hope the hon. Minister is right. I am not an expert in this field, nor have I made a study of it. But one thing that alarms me, as I believe the hon. member for Bruce outlined in his address the other day, is that the prices of all agricultural products are lower today than in 1951. That is 14 years ago, Mr. Minister, and here we have white beans higher. This is what staggers me. Whether we are right or whether we are wrong, I hope you are right. I cannot argue with you on that, but it makes me wonder. We hope that we do not upset anything that has worked, has brought in a fair return to those growing white beans in the province of Ontario.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Mr. Chairman, I would like to just say one more word in this connection, because I think the inference has been left here that it is the bean board which has been responsible for what is happening.

Mr. Spence: I think they help.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Well, they may have helped to some degree, but they are certainly by no means responsible for all the increase in price. The very fact that the bean price has increased to the place it has today is because the market for beans in Great Britain has increased by over 100 per cent in 11 years. When you have a buoyant market like that to which you can ship surplus, as long as there is not too much surplus, there is no problem at all.

But you see, the fact that you and I as farmer members and as members of this House must recognize, is that we have a responsibility to expand and to exploit every opportunity we have to sell more of any agricultural food product that can be produced in this province. So with that in mind, surely it must naturally follow that this bean board that we talk about should have gone out, recognizing the importance of that growing market, and said to the farmers of Ontario: Look, grow more beans; here is an opportunity; let us cash in on this growing market.

And what did they do? They went out said: Oh, no, do not increase production!

This does not make sense, Mr. Chairman, when right across the line the Americans increased their sales to Great Britain by 56 per cent, while we increased ours by 6.7 per cent. There is the thing that is wrong, as I see it. I feel that when we have an advantage of 15.5 per cent in our market over others, that we should have been exploiting it to a far greater degree.

I point that out, that the bean board to my mind had very little effect on the increase in the price of beans compared to what they were in 1951. No more than that the Americans affected the price more than anyone else. It is a growing market, indicated by the acceptance by the British housewife that this is one of the most popular canned vegetables there is in Great Britain today.

Mr. Chairman: Vote 107.

Mr. W. D. McKeough (Kent West): Mr. Chairman, if I might just add this one small point. My hon. colleague from Kent East has raised the fact that one dealer who happens to be a constituent of the hon. member for Kent East has a large percentage of the market. I do not think the percentage matters, but I think to be completely fair it should be added at this point that the greatest share of the credit for the development of the market which we now enjoy in the United Kingdom goes to that company. I would think that the hon. member for Kent East would be the first to admit that.

And if this is true, then the fact that the price of beans, in which you are interested, and in which we are all interested, is high today, then a great deal of the credit should go back—and let us name him here—to W. G. Thompson, who was a former member of this House. He has done a tremendous job in developing this market in the United Kingdom. I do not think it should be left that there should be any criticism of the job that he did in that market. I do not think you want to leave that criticism.

Mr. Spence: Mr. Chairman, I never left any inference of criticism against him. I wanted to know why one dealer had 60 per cent of the business in the bean industry. It is unusual. We have co-operatives all over southwestern Ontario and they cannot sell. I would like to know why they cannot sell. The hon. Minister has been over to Europe, to England; he has examined the bean industry and here we only got one, practically one, operator who can market beans. This is what makes it unusual for me.

Another thing I want to say to the hon. Minister in regard to the bean industry: Why has it expanded like it has, or we could have been growing more beans in the province of Ontario?

One of the reasons is on account of the price of corn, on account of the price of soybeans. There is a great risk in growing white beans on account of weather conditions. When you grow corn and soybeans there is no risk. The price of soybeans and corn has increased, so the income per acre is practically the same as what it is for beans, and naturally you would grow the crop that has the least work and the least risk.

Mr. Gaunt: Mr. Chairman, I want to make a few comments in this connection. I was very interested in what the hon. Minister of Highways had to say about the bean industry. I know that he has a great many growers in his riding as I have in mine. Certainly he is most interested in it, and I am interested in a solution being found to this rather thorny problem as well.

He did say that we in the Opposition had talked about this problem for obvious reasons, and I hope he was not imputing motives to me. I am certainly as interested in finding a solution to it as he is, and I want to make that abundantly clear.

I did mention a little earlier that as far as I was concerned, the government and the bean growers marketing board were on a collision course in this connection. The government has said that the company and the marketing board must be separated. On the other hand, the marketing board says that it is not going to separate the company from the board unless ordered to do so by the government. It seems rather obvious that this is a collision course.

What I suggested at that time was the setting up of a co-operative, with a special relationship to the marketing board. This co-operative could handle beans, and perhaps enlarge its area eventually to handle wheat and a number of other products. It seems to me that this is a workable solution, and I think the hon. Minister of Agriculture should do everything in his power to get together with the personnel of the bean growers marketing board, to try to convince them that this is a good thing, and one way out of the rather nasty situation that has developed in the bean industry.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Could I ask the hon. member what he meant by that "special relationship" there? I do not think the hon. member mentioned that the other day and it intrigues me. I wonder what you mean by that.

Mr. Gaunt: I did make reference to it the other day. I said that the special relationship could include some of the same personnel. That is to say, some personnel on the marketing board could also be directors and managers, if you will, in the co-operative. That is what I meant by the special relationship.

Mr. MacDonald: Like the cheese set-up.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Well, I want to say we have done everything I think that it is possible to do in trying to get them to set up a co-operative. I have discussed this with them at some length, and I know that the farm products marketing board on innumerable occasions have both, verbally and in writing, suggested that this be done. But they seem to feel that they do not want to accept that suggestion.

I do not know what else one does, and for the life of me I cannot understand why they take this attitude, because here—is it Fenton Cryderman who is the vice-chairman of the United Co-Operators of Ontario, who is also a member and a past-president, I believe, of the Ontario bean growers market board, sitting on the board? Surely, you could not have a man who was more indoctrinated with co-operative philosophy than a vice-chairman of the United Co-Operators of Ontario! And yet he refuses to accept this suggestion. It defies my sense of reason.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, before we leave this vote. Some two thousand words back I was quoting from a document with reference to a co-op abattoir in Nova Scotia. I was not in a position to state with certainty who signed it—all I stated was that it was an official. The document is the product of Douglas Curtis, president of the Nova Scotia Co-Operative Abattoirs Limited, and it was dated May 24, 1965. I suggest to the hon. Minister that it is accurate and, therefore, either he or I, preferably he since he has more time and machinery, should try to reconcile it with the information he has been given from other sources.

Mr. D. A. Paterson (Essex South): Mr. Chairman, may I raise a question concerning the marketing of onions? Is this the correct vote?

Mr. Chairman: Yes, sir.

Mr. Paterson: I realize from the various growers papers and so forth that approximately 50 per cent of our Ontario grown onions should be exported, and I wonder if the hon. Minister has any figures at this time as to the market availability and placing of the number of bags in England this season? Is there any indication to date as to what our exports will be of onions this year, or have there been any orders placed from England as yet?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Mr. Chairman, I am quite prepared to deal with this question, but it comes under the food council vote—not the farm products marketing board produce. That is a food council vote. We will deal with it then, if it is all right with you, sir.

Vote 108 agreed to.

On vote 109:

Mr. Gaunt: Mr. Chairman, I am in a bit of a quandary. I have two items that I want to bring up but I just do not know under what vote they would fall. One is in connection with the machinery inquiry and the setting up of a machinery board, and the other deals with charges of a fertilizer company in respect to the formulas that they put out on the fertilizers. That is to say, the formula offences. I am at a loss to know under which vote they would fall.

I mention it in this vote simply because the information branch would handle some of this material, and I know that they have sent out various pieces of literature dealing in particular with the machinery board. I am wondering if it would be all right to carry on?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: For the information of the hon. member, the formula for fertilizer analysis, the consistency of formula analysis—

Mr. Gaunt: Yes, I am referring to the—

Hon. Mr. Stewart: It is a federal responsibility, and it is administered by the plant products division of the federal Department of Agriculture. As a matter of fact we had one of the inspectors here in the House just last Friday, I was talking to him and introduced him to some of our people.

Mr. Gaunt: The other point was the machinery board.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: That should have come under the main office vote, and we have passed that. If the hon. member has a question to ask I would be pleased to deal with it if he wants to talk to me later about it. That is in the main office vote.

Mr. Gaunt: Well, I just wanted to make one brief comment about it. I know that my hon. friend has set up a farm machinery board to deal with machinery, the distribution and sale of farm machinery and so on. But a number of farmers have complained that the distribution of farm machinery, and particularly farm machinery parts, in busy times and over the weekends, has not been improved since the hon. Minister set up his farm machinery board. I was just wondering if he would have any comments. I would suggest that perhaps this machinery board could be improved, and its operation streamlined to that extent.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Mr. Chairman, I am disappointed to hear this comment from the hon. member for Huron-Bruce, and I am sure he makes it in good faith. We have been led to believe from general comments that we have heard that there is an improvement, that there is an availability of parts on holidays and weekends that have not pertained before the implementation of the committee's study and report. Any criticism that has come to our attention we have gone to work on it immediately, and relayed it to the secretary of the committee who is the liaison man between the machinery company and the advisory board, and it is his responsibility to track down any complaint that may arise. I think he has done an admirable job in establishing a better relationship between the dealers out in the country and the central distributors, permitting the dealers to provide a better service to the farmers themselves.

I have heard of one or two illustrations pertaining to one or two companies that has left something to be desired, but I believe it is working itself out quite satisfactorily, and we are led to believe that any problem is going to be corrected as soon as the merger completely takes place and the organizational problems work themselves out.

We have been pretty adamant about this with the company involved, Mr. Chairman, and I think we will find there is a much better relationship existing there than in other places. Now, there are certain parts for some types of machines that are outdated, they are old, and are very difficult to obtain, I must confess. On the other hand, I think we have generally accomplished a very great deal.

Mr. Gaunt: Mr. Chairman, I would just like to add one footnote to what my hon. friend has said. I am glad that he has been working with this board, and the board itself has been conducting its work in this area with such a degree of success. It goes without saying that farmers have, in the past, experienced considerable difficulty, particularly on holidays and weekends, and my hon. friend and I know that when a farmer is harvesting and a machine breaks it is most distressing not to be able to get a part for that machine. I am glad to hear that the board has been this effective, and I hope it will be even more so in the future.

Mr. Paterson: Mr. Chairman, I would like to pose a question to the hon. Minister in regard to a copy of a letter I received on May 13 from Barney Wilson of the Ontario fruit and vegetable growers association. It concerns a broadcast given over the CBC network. Last year, I read into the record what I think this House considered, and I personally considered, a very derogatory writing concerning agriculture in our province. This is a very similar thing which was broadcast by our own CBC network. I just wondered, did the deputy Minister reprimand the directors of the CBC concerning this broadcast?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: I am sure the hon. member realizes that we in this House have nothing to do with the CBC. What they broadcast is their own affair. I must confess I have not heard the article he refers to. I am told by one of the deputies that we have a copy here, so if this is the case we will have a look at it. I am sorry that it has happened.

Mr. Gaunt: Mr. Chairman, as a matter of interest I would be most interested in learning of the policy of The Department of Agriculture in respect to the information branch, that is to say, how many broadcasts on television and radio are conducted monthly, and what is the hon. Minister's policy in interviewing various people at the university at Guelph and elsewhere within the agricultural industry.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: As far as the number of broadcasts per month, I cannot give the hon. member those figures. I do not know if they are here or not. If they are, they are probably through some of this information which involves several pages. I do not think that needs to be read in the House. I would say that the policy of the information branch is to relay to the agricultural community the information pertaining to the findings of research, and the developments of agriculture as it pertains today. I think it has been done with a good deal of success. Television clips and tapes have been made. I think one of the most significant contributions ever made in an extension programme was that pertaining to the three television broadcasts relating to the business of farming through co-operation with the CBC.

Mr. Gaunt: Farm management.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Yes, farm management. The Business of Farming, I believe was the title of these three consecutive broadcasts, beginning I believe at 10.30 in the forenoon and running an hour to 11.30. We found, on research, that there was a very wide acceptance of this programme. It involved farmers—practical farmers from across Ontario—with farm management specialists, extension specialists in various fields, not only in farm management but in engineering and what-have-you, sitting down to discuss with these farmers their operation, and the film being made on the actual operation of the farms and discussing it with them. It was a most interesting series. I heard more favourable comment from that than any other series that I know anything about.

To me this is the new modern concept of getting information out to farmers. The old way of short courses that we used to attend, years and years ago—a month's short course, or two weeks or what-have-you—in individual communities organized under the auspices of the extension branch and The Department of Agriculture representatives were very, very effective. But when you use television you can spread right across the province in the series of programmes that has an enormous impact, and it brings up-to-date information to these farm families in a way that is most acceptable.

Some of the comments that we have had on this, I was interested to note, reveal that they would prefer that the hour started at 11.00 and went until noon, rather than start at 10.30 and go to 11.30. I suppose the farmer does not want to spend that extra half-hour in the house. He wants to come in and stay there until after lunch. I think that is a very practicable suggestion. We intend to carry this on next year. To me, it is a tremendous programme, a very worthwhile programme, and one that I think is having a very great impact.

As far as our policy is concerned and what we do with farm news, 94 releases were made last year on production and marketing information, 139 releases were made on information for consumers of Ontario farm products, 104 releases were made on topics of interest to the home gardener, 85 announcements on coming events of importance in the agricultural field across Ontario having to do with policy and programme announcements where statements were made. Then there were this other series with feature stories with 40 articles especially written by the department personnel, including staff members at the OAC, Western Ontario agricultural school and the Kemptville agricultural school where these were widely used by the farm press as background stories and for information.

It seems to me that the information branch is fulfilling the purpose for which it has always been intended, and that is the dissemination of news to the people who can use the news. Regardless of the effectiveness of the research programme carried on by the agriculture research institute, unless the findings of research and the findings of our people who are specialists in their field are related in a practical way to the understanding of the farmer so that he can apply it in his own individual circumstance, they are of little use. This, to me, is the function of the information branch, and I want to pay tribute to its director, Mr. Schneller, and all the people who are associated with him in the branch. I think they have done, and are doing, a magnificent job, and I feel are really the arm of our department that implements the functions of many of the other branches.

Mr. Gaunt: Mr. Chairman, I just want to say that I appreciate full well the fact that the potential of television as an educational medium is certainly tremendous. I am just wondering if the hon. Minister would consider perhaps extending the programme beyond the farm management field into other areas. I think television offers a tremendous potential for the dissemination of information and I think it should be used to its fullest extent.

Mr. Paterson: Mr. Chairman, under subsection 8—compensation for damage by hunters—I notice this is under the livestock branch and I would like to pose two questions. First, is there any compensation allowable to farmers, say of soya beans, who have hunters tramping through their fields, and second, does this apply to greenhouse damage? In my particular area we have a great deal of damage on the boundaries of our Crown reserve in the area by shotgun firing.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Mr. Chairman, I must confess that our present policy applies only to livestock and farm machinery. Farm buildings—and I can only assume the greenhouses must be considered farm buildings—do not apply under our present policy.

Mr. Paterson: What about the soya bean—

Hon. Mr. Stewart: No, I am sorry, there is no application here.

Mr. A. H. Cowling (High Park): Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. W. E. Johnston) is absent from the House. He had some comments on this vote that he asked me to make and with your indulgence I will do that right now. And, as a matter of fact, we have the Ontario stock yards in High Park and also the largest packing houses in Canada, so there you go.

The policies and programmes administered by the livestock branch are designed to assist livestock producers in breeding meat animals suitable for today's markets in an efficient, economical manner.

Mr. MacDonald: Do you know what you are talking about?

Mr. Cowling: Quiet, please. Insofar as meat production is concerned, we are a North American economy and so from both a price and a quality standpoint are in competition with U.S. producers. Ontario produces more finished cattle, more hogs and more milk than any other province in Canada. Approximately 75 per cent of our cattle population is made up of the dairy breeds and so considerable emphasis is placed in this area. Fifty-nine dairy herd improvement associations with a membership totalling nearly 1,300 are in operation. With the average herd size of 27 cows there are thus approximately 34,000 cows on test. If only the benefits of production records credited to the members are considered the cost of about $9 per cow may seem rather high, however, when the value of the cost of production records and the importance of production records in the proving of bulls in artificial insemination units are considered, it is apparent that this is a most worthwhile programme. The hon. Minister of Agriculture announced—

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Cowling: Just a minute, you might learn something new here.

The hon. Minister of Agriculture announced in the House that this programme is being enlarged through the introduction of an owner-sampler system under which the herd owner will collect the milk samples and the testing will be completed by the supervisor possibly at a central testing laboratory. We will all recall the hon. Minister announcing this.

Such a system will make possible the testing of a much larger number of cows at a lower cost per cow tested. A monthly mail-in system has been conducted as a pilot project in Bruce county with most favourable results. The hon. member for Bruce (Mr. Whicher) will know about that. It is planned to expand this service as it has been well received by the members concerned.

Improvement programmes associated with beef cattle production have continued to expand. In 1964, 1,397 bulls were started on performance tests and 1,134 completed tests. During 1964 the number of herds enrolled on herd tests increased to 34. Among the commercial producers there is a constant increase in the demand for beef bulls of good type along with good performance. Such producers are encouraged to buy good performance-tested bulls through a system of premiums which applies to those bulls which have met the necessary standards for type and performance and are sold through inspected auction sales. Good sires are the foundation of all livestock improvement programmes, so in order to meet the demands of the future this policy should be expanded.

Artificial insemination continues to be a major factor in livestock improvement. Dairy herd improvement records show that the offspring of AI unit bulls produce more milk and more butter fat than those cows in the same herds that are sired by bulls in natural service. Assistance to artificial insemination units is given in the form of a grant on the purchase of sires subject to certain regulations. Dairy sires can qualify for grants totalling $750 and beef sires for grants totalling $600.

The service to farmers in northern Ontario is subsidized at the rate of $2 per cow bred in those areas, and amounts to approximately $30,000 per year. Total assistance to artificial insemination units is nearly $60,000 per year.

As in the case of beef cattle, the main assistance to swine producers is in the payment of premiums on approved performance-tested boars. Many progressive commercial producers will not buy boars that do not meet the standards of this programme. Premiums in excess of $40,000 were paid to approximately 1,400 commercial producers who purchased such boars in 1964.

While sheep production is not a major enterprise in Ontario, through the federal-provincial sheep assistance policy over 4,000 breeding ewes were brought into Ontario from western Canada in 1964. This is the only source of relatively large numbers of uniform commercial ewes available to Ontario farmers who wish to enlarge their flocks. Distribution of good quality purebred stock throughout the province is encouraged by the paying of grants to inspected, approved, consigned sales. In the case of cattle sales the grants are $5 per head, for swine $2.50 per head and for sheep almost $1 per head sold.

Mr. Chairman, you will recall during the comments of the hon. member for Huron-Bruce, he was talking about the price received on hogs on the market. Well, according to the Globe and Mail of just a day or two ago—and this took place at the stockyards in Toronto—top beef sold for $27.90 and hogs got up to $32.35, which is a high, high figure for hogs and is an indication of the great job The Ontario Department of Agriculture is doing.

Mr. W. G. Noden (Rainy River): Mr. Chairman, I would like to make a few comments on vote 110, item 4. The amount of money to be voted is justified as serving a most important purpose. When the hon. Minister of Agriculture visited the Rainy River district during 1963 he observed the possibilities of beef cattle raising in the area, and the programme was inaugurated by the cattlemen's co-operative through the purchase of some 365 head of breeder cattle and some bulls from out of the province. I bring that to your attention—out of the province.

This represents a guaranteed loan of about $100,000 and as stated before, the distribution has been based upon ten animals per farmer. Last year 45 farmers from the three districts of northwestern Ontario were invited by the hon. Minister of Agriculture to tour the different beef breeder and feed lots in this part of Ontario and this included a visit to a bull sale auction.

The result of this visit was that three farmers from the Rainy River district attending the hay sale during the spring purchased 27 registered bulls at approximately $14,000. This money remained in the province instead of going to western Canada. In my opinion, this vote justifies the continued confidence of this Legislature in this kind of a programme. The Department of Agriculture is to be commended for its interest in furthering the beef cattle arrangements in the Rainy River district.

Mr. Gaunt: Mr. Chairman, I want to make a few comments concerning AI. My hon. friend from High Park made reference to this in passing and I would just like to make a few comments. I would agree with him when he says that AI has made a tremendous contribution to the livestock industry for the past number of years. The quality of the average herd has certainly been raised through AI and its services.

I would point out that as far as AI is concerned, I think many farmers have used it indiscriminately. I say this because I have gone into farms on occasions and have been told by the farmer that he has a bunch of cows or heifers that have been sired by eight to twelve and sometimes even more bulls. Now to me this would indicate that the farmer has no planned programme when this large number of sires is used in the breeding programme of a herd of cows.

What I am suggesting is that the department should take a look at this particular matter because I understand that 80 per cent of those farmers on DHIA use artificial services. I would think that the department, through its DHIA programme, would be well advised to employ a geneticist on a full-time basis to advise farmers concerning a breeding programme. It is a cardinal rule of genetics that live breeding is much more effective in establishing a good solid breed, improving the breed on a long-term basis, than is either in-breeding or outside. So I would say that if a geneticist were employed by The Department of Agriculture on a full-time basis I think he could perform a very real service.

He could set out for every farmer—and I think, if I recall correctly, there are about 1,280-odd farmers on DHIA—he could set out for those farmers a planned breeding programme established on sound, genetic principles. He could show him how he could improve his herd through line breeding and advise him what sires he should use. I think that in the long run this would be a very real service to the farmers in this province because, as I said before, they tend to use too many sires to actually carry out a common-sense breeding programme. I would say that this could be extended.

It would even, in the final analysis, encourage the artificial insemination units to hire their own geneticists, and second it would certainly move them into the field of recognizing that they must get related sires; that is to say in their purchase of sires they would be more conscious of the fact that they perhaps should be purchasing in common terms, cousins, if you will, rather than unrelated animals. I say that because I feel that the two points that I made could result from the fact that the department, if it sees fit, should get a geneticist and work with the farmers in this connection.

I think there is a very real result to be obtained from it.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Mr. Chairman, I would not let that suggestion go by for the simple reason that my hon. friend recommends the hiring of a geneticist. Now this is a good lesson in genetics with which any good farmer would agree. But for the department to go out and hire a geneticist to try to persuade farmers of the value of line breeding is something that the farmer, if he would read the literature that he gets from his own artificial insemination unit, would know the benefit of right now.

Each insemination unit in the province of Ontario sends this out in the form of a newsletter to every farmer indicating the value of certain blood lines that are established and pertain in the various bulls whose semen is available from that unit. Any good farmer would recognize the importance of the theory which my hon. friend has expounded today.

Now, how you persuade farmers not to order semen from a particular bull over a period of a year or two years to establish a uniformity within the herd is something that I just do not know. The fact that the number of inseminations is increasing annually is an indication that artificial insemination is accepted by the farmers. Good service is being provided, but how one gets farmers to accept the fact that they should be uniform in their requests or that they should request semen from a given bull for a given period of time to establish that uniformity that we all like to see in a herd of cattle, is a point for which I do not think I would want to have to accept the responsibility. You can do all the educating you like. You can lead a horse to water but you cannot make him drink.

Mr. Gaunt: Mr. Chairman, I realize that this is so. I realize that what the hon. Minister said is so, but I just want to point out to him that a lot of the pamphlets which are sent out by the AI units are rather complicated and perhaps the ordinary farmer just does not understand them. My point was that if the department had a geneticist the theories which are expounded in some of these articles could be brought down to earth, simplified and brought down to the point where he could understand them and could apply them.

Mr. Spence: Mr. Chairman, on vote 110, item 8, compensation for damage by hunters, $15,000; I see in the estimates for last year that there was $15,000 allotted for this. Could the hon. Minister inform us if this was just for livestock shot by hunters, or what does it cover, Mr. Chairman?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: It was only for livestock, and the amount was just under $14,000.

Mr. Spence: How many head of cattle or horses—

Hon. Mr. Stewart: One hundred and seven.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Chairman, the mastitis control programme was mentioned a few votes ago, I do not know how extensively the hon. Minister went into it—

Hon. Mr. Stewart: It is in the veterinary services branch and we will come to it—

Mr. Nixon: Oh, I am sorry.

Mr. Gaunt: Mr. Chairman, I want to make a few remarks in this connection. I would like to talk for a moment about the ROP programme. I realize full well that it is a Dominion programme, but I want to make some reference to it, if for no other reason than to impress upon my hon. friend's mind that perhaps he could go to Ottawa and suggest that a few changes be made in it.

It seems to me that as far as the ROP record of performance is concerned, the rate of gain is set out. The ROP score is indicative of the carcass quality and the score—if you like—of the hog when it is killed. It seems to me that an ROP record should actually contain a maturity date, paid when it is scored anywhere from, I suppose 60 to 100, if 100 is possible. But there is no indication of the maturity date on that ROP record, as I understand it, and I think that I am right in that, so that you may—

Hon. J. Yaremko (Provincial Secretary): Would the hon. member explain, for the benefit of the hon. member for High Park, what ROP stands for?

Mr. Gaunt: Record of performance. Mr. Chairman, may I tell my hon. friend from High Park that ROP is record of performance.

Mr. Cowling: Mr. Chairman, I knew that, and it is a record of performance insofar as milk content is concerned.

Mr. Gaunt: Yes, sure, I am very familiar with that. Mr. Chairman, may I tell my hon. friend that it also applies to pigs and hogs and the swine industry.

In any case, the point I was making is that an ROP score as such does not give an entirely true picture. That is to say, a pig might have a score of, let us say, 89, and have a maturity date of 150 days. That ROP record would be much better to my mind than one that had a score of 95 with a maturity date of 200 days. On the one hand, the hog with the score of 89 and 150 maturity days would be a money-maker, and the one with the score of 195 and 200 days maturity date could in all probability be a bencher which would lose money.

So I would say that the maturity date is very important on any ROP records. I would urge the hon. Minister to exert his influence on the federal people and see if they could change it in that respect.

I would also make passing reference to selective registration for boars. I think this is an objective for the future, I think it is something we should be moving toward. I feel that where you have selective registration of any registered boar, then you weed out the lower scorers, and in the long run this will improve the quality of the industry as such.

The Ontario hog producers association's annual convention in Toronto this past year—I believe it was March of this year—passed a resolution which purported to suggest to the government that they ban all unregistered sale of boars through community sales yards, and any other sales facilities in which they might be sold. I think it was the opinion of the meeting at that time that the sale of unregistered boars was a thing which was very detrimental to the hog industry, because it was from these boars that many of the B and C grades were coming.

They felt that steps should be taken to see that this kind of thing be stopped. I have seen many hogs pass through sales barns that certainly were not fit to go into the herds of farmers and sire pigs. I am as sure as I am standing here that the pigs which would result from such a mating would give a large proportion B and C grades.

Another suggestion that was made at the Ontario hog producers' annual meeting was the fact that they were interested—I say "they," I mean the hog producers—in setting up an export authority for hogs. I believe the Danes have something comparable to this. They have, as was mentioned earlier, I believe, all the facilities, or most of the facilities, to process the pork in their country, and they have an export authority to handle that pork so that they can say to Great Britain: "We are going to give you so much pork," and it is handled through this authority.

It has been very effective for them, and certainly they have had great success with it, because the Danish pork in export markets has been a real competitor and has increased, I believe, successfully every year for the past number of years. So I would first like my hon. friend to comment on the point about selective registration, the fact that all unregistered boars should not be sold at community sales barns and so on. And then I would like him to comment on the establishment of a pork authority.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Well, Mr. Chairman, in the first instance, the ROP service, as it pertains to both swine and cattle, is a federal responsibility, and I have no comment to make on it whatever. The hon. member prefaced his remarks with that, and I am sure he would not expect me to comment in that regard.

Concerning the prohibiting of sale of unregistered boars, this is a matter that I think is debatable. I can see the point that he is making, and I can see where it could be useful. However, I would point out to him that I have known a number of purebred breeders with the very best breeding stock, who for some reason or other fail to keep up the registration papers and the progeny of the very highly qualified sire and dam. If such a law were to be enacted a sale could not be made of that progeny and would deny the right of some farmer buying that animal to carry on the bloodline of that particular animal. So I think we have to judge the abuse that might come in to any particular aspect of such an arrangement as he suggests.

Mind you, I do not for one minute condone the use of low quality or scrub sires, either in livestock or hogs or sheep. It is not good farming practice. We have always decried this as far as possible, but I think it is going quite a piece to say that we should have such legislation. I think that the good sound common sense and judgment of farmers is about the best type of legislation one can have in this particular regard.

This pork authority, I am afraid, is something I fail to grasp the significance of. My hon. friend might want to elucidate on it a little bit further. I am afraid I am not in a position to comment on it. I do not know enough about it.

Mr. Gaunt: Mr. Chairman, I just want to say that I realize there is a problem. My hon. friend has suggested that if a farmer was slack, I suppose, in the registering of a good boar, then if this were to become law then he would be denied the right to use that boar. I realize there is a problem there.

I have been at community sales when boars were sold, and in some cases peddled from one place to the other. Often the price of such a boar would not be over $50. To me, this is bad for the industry. I think that improvement in the industry is certainly hampered when such a practice is taking place, and in some areas to the extent that it is quite common.

The other point about the hog authority—the Ontario hog producers at their annual meeting indicated that they were in favour of such a hog authority. Now I presume that they got the idea from the Danes. As I pointed out before, the Danish people have had such a hog authority, an export authority, for some time, and the export authority actually handles all the pork for export. I understand that they actually negotiate the price in all cases for the export of that product.

The Danes have a two-price system for pork, that is to say they have a price for the domestic market and a price for the export market, and if the export market is such that the producers cannot make a profit, then the consumer is charged a surcharge on the pork which she buys in the store. In this way, the moneys resulting from that surcharge are sent back to the export authority, as I understand it, and distributed amongst the hog producers in that country. In this way, they can maintain a satisfactory price to the producer. I think this is the way it works. This is my understanding of it, at any rate.

Vote 109 agreed to.

On vote 110:

Mr. Gaunt: Mr. Chairman, I have some rather lengthy remarks in connection with Connaught laboratories on this vote, and I am just wondering if I should start them at this time?

It being 6 o'clock, p.m., the House took recess.

ESTIMATES, DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

On vote 110:

Mr. M. Gaunt (Huron-Bruce): Mr. Chairman, I would like to make a few comments about the Connaught laboratories and their full-scale entry into the swine business in the province—indeed across Canada. The intended aim of the programme is to develop a pig that will consistently outperform all other pigs, in terms of feed efficiency, rate of gain, livability, quality, and so on.

I understand that today Connaught has more than 1,000 purebred pigs in its herd. In addition, there are satellite farms that are producing thousands of high-bred gilts. It is estimated that 6,700 high-breds will be sold this year. Farmers taking these hogs are tied to the laboratory by a legal contract.

Now, in 1967, or 1968, I believe it is, Connaught plans to supply 25,000 gilts to farmers across this province and across Canada, yielding approximately half a million hogs. To say this is a large-scale operation, is certainly one of the biggest understatements of the year. The programme started with the introduction of SPF pigs, which means, as my hon. friend knows, that the pigs are free from atrophic rhinitis and virus pneumonia—diseases which certainly inhibit the growth and feed conversion of the hog.

In addition to Connaught SPF programme, an intensive cross-breeding programme was launched, with top breeding stock from this country and from Great Britain. The stock was culled and the very best of animals were selected, so that Connaught ended up, I believe, with four strains of Landrace, three strains of Yorkshire and three substrains of Lacombe.

It is an ambitious programme, but there is one question that looms large in the minds of farmers in the province. As far as they are concerned, is it going to hurt or help the industry? If it is going to hurt the industry, then I would be safe in saying that the farmers in this province would want the government to tell Connaught in no uncertain terms, that the programme must be changed. If, on the other hand, it is going to help the industry, I am sure that it would receive widespread support.

However, there seems to be growing fears that it is going to hurt the industry. For example, government veterinarians detected, I believe last fall, some positive heads among those that were sent from Connaught, which would ordinarily mean that the veterinarians at the veterinary college in Guelph, had detected atrophic rhinitis. What happened then, as I understand it, was that Connaught immediately stopped sending heads into Guelph for testing—and that included lungs as well; but they continued to sell breeding stock as SPF pigs, and they charged SPF prices.

In other words, when the government veterinarians diagnosed atrophic rhinitis, Connaught arbitrarily decided that they did not have atrophic rhinitis.

Another interesting facet to this whole affair is the fact that there is a very definite absence of records of the Connaught herd and the Connaught stock. They have also failed to meet ROP requirements. This means that one is really not too sure of the quality of the stock that is being produced and sold to farmers across Canada. Not only is ROP testing not done, but Dr. Crawley has said that he has no intention of participating in such a programme. He even said that he would not permit government officials to check his livestock.

Connaught, it seems, has applied pressure on both the provincial and federal governments to get the herds certified, despite the fact that they are not willing to make any attempt to live up to the standards and the regulations necessary for such certification.

There are a number of questions in regard to the quality and performance of the breeding stock. If the laboratories are going to sell breeding stock on such a large scale, then it naturally follows that the breeding stock should be of a superior nature. If it is not, and we have indications—no real proof—but we have indications that it is not, then real and perhaps permanent damage could be done to the swine industry in this province, by such a programme.

Since no one really knows for sure whether these animals are superior or not, because the laboratory themselves have not seen fit to give the general public the information, then I think that it is the responsibility of the government, either to find out, or get someone else to find out exactly what is going on in connection with Connaught's programme. If Connaught fails to meet the standards in the SPF programme or in ROP testing, the government should, in my opinion, put a stop to the programme and what I would call the misrepresentation that appears to be taking place.

If, on the other hand, Connaught is willing to co-operate and meets the standards and regulations of the various programmes producing superior stock, then all well and good; there is nothing wrong with that. But if Connaught continues to exhibit the attitude of thumbing its nose at the government and conducting its own programme, really in effect being a law unto itself, then I say it is time the government stepped into the picture and took a firm hand in this matter.

Mr. Chairman: Is vote 110 carried?

Mr. F. R. Oliver (Grey South): I would like to hear the hon. Minister's views on this, if he would care to comment.

Hon. W. A. Stewart (Minister of Agriculture): I would like to say this in connection with Connaught laboratories. First of all they are not a participant in our SPF programme of hogs in Ontario. They are not certified. Now as was said this afternoon, the ROP programme, as it pertains to swine, is a federal programme. They establish the standards, they carry out the tests.

As far as Connaught laboratories is concerned, it is a separate entity, I believe wholly supported by the University of Toronto and what donations are made to it. They depend on no support from the government whatever, for the operation of their laboratories.

Mr. Oliver: Do they not get any support from the government?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: No, none whatever.

As far as the programme of swine breeding is concerned, it is the prerogative of the farmers of Ontario to choose this breeding stock as they wish. If they feel it is in their interests to become engaged with Connaught Laboratories in the production of swine under this programme, then it is their affair, just as it is to go to any other breeder and become involved with him in the production of live-stock.

I do not feel that we have any right to get into the position of saying to farmers, "You cannot participate in this programme at all." I do not think we have any more right to say this with regard to Connaught than we have to go to any other breeder in the province of Ontario, and say, "no longer can you sell your breeding stock to farmers."

If the farmers are willing to buy under the circumstances and under the terms of the agreement, then I think it is their prerogative to do so.

When it comes to enrolling the programme in our department, then it becomes our responsibility to determine whether or not the company, or the farmer, complies with the standards laid down, and whether he will be certified or not.

Mr. Oliver: Well, may I ask my hon. friend to what extent does the University of Toronto support the Connaught laboratories in this venture? Does he know? Because to that extent, they are jeopardizing the other breeders in the province, would my hon. friend not say?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: If my memory serves me correctly, the Connaught laboratories are wholly supported by the royalties they get on the serums that are produced at the laboratories, and on various types of antibiotics and what-have-you that are produced there. This produces revenue and this revenue, or part of it, has been invested in the swine programme, which is in itself self-perpetuating—

Mr. Oliver: Mr. Chairman, may I be very naïve for a moment and ask my hon. friend what is the extent of this programme at the Connaught laboratories? How many swine are involved, and what is the—

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Well, my hon. friend from Huron-Bruce related these figures and they are quite extensive. I think they have plans for them to expand in quite a substantial way across Canada; there are, I believe, contracts being drawn up. From reports that I have read and from what I have seen on television—there was a show on this, I believe, on CBC Country Calendar, if my memory serves me correctly, a few weeks ago—Connaught laboratories are expanding their operations into western Canada.

Mr. Oliver: That is the difficulty, if I may suggest this to my hon. friend, I think they are going beyond the realm of research and they are into a commercial venture.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Oh, I think that is quite right.

Mr. Oliver: You think that is quite right?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Yes, I do.

Mr. Oliver: Therein I suggest lies the great danger! If we are going to allow this mammoth to grow and grow with university support, where is the end going to come? I mean, to what extent are they going to go all across Canada? Are they going to produce untold thousands of hogs in competition with other breeders? I mean, there must be a final stage to this thing somewhere.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Perhaps there should be, but at the same time I do not think it is the position of this government to step in and say, stop this programme. I do not think it is our place at all to step in and stop this programme. They are an autonomous company, they are self-supporting, they are indeed a branch of the University of Toronto, as I understand it. We have no authority to step in and say to Connaught laboratories, you cease this programme; because obviously a good many farmers must be accepting the programme or they would not be meeting with the success with which they are meeting.

Mr. Oliver: Does my hon. friend say they are a company?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: No, I said they were a separate entity, but associated with the University of Toronto, as far as I know.

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): You said a company.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: If I said a company, I do not believe this is the case. They are a branch of Toronto University.

Mr. Gaunt: Mr. Chairman, the fact of the matter is that Connaught is actually selling SPF pigs and they are not certified. Yet they are selling pigs and contracting pigs out to farmers across the province as SPF pigs and are charging SPF prices. Herein lies the danger, or one of the dangers.

I think that as far as the responsibility of the government is concerned, it is quite clear to me; I think that this is misrepresentation. If Connaught wants to certify their herd and live up to the regulations and the standards in order to certify their herd as an SPF programme; fine, well and good. But they have not done that. As I say, herein lies one of the dangers.

Vote 110 agreed to.

On vote 111:

Mr. D. A. Paterson (Essex South): On vote 111, Mr. Chairman, might I raise a question regarding the two price system that has been bandied around in various agricultural press? I wonder if the hon. Minister would care to comment, say, specifically on onions. If there were established a two price system for onions, do you think this would help in our serious problem in this regard in establishing a firm price now for our export markets?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Mr. Chairman, with respect to the hon. member's question, this comes under the food council vote. Are we at 112?

Mr. Paterson: No. I was asking this under marketing and I—

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Well, this is the office of the commissioner of marketing, and really what you have raised I think comes under 112. I will be quite pleased to deal with it then.

Mr. Paterson: That is fine.

Mr. Gaunt: Mr. Chairman, as a matter of interest, I would like to know the purpose of the office of the commissioner of marketing. What is the purpose, I really do not know?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: The purpose of the office of the commissioner of marketing has been co-ordinating marketing research and acting as liaison officer between the markets branch, the farm products market board, food council, the Minister's office, the deputy Minister's office, with the various commodity groups, particularly associated with the Ontario food terminal and with the Ontario tender fruit institute and such organizations as that. The intention is that the office of the commissioner of marketing will be blended into the food council with the recent resignation from The Department of Agriculture of Mr. G. F. Perkin, who was the commissioner of marketing. He has left us after, what, 40 years service, 35 years service to the department? This aspect will be blended into the Ontario food council, so I think next year you will see one vote for the food council instead of the two votes that we have this year.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Mr. Chairman, on that specific point, this is perhaps an administrative matter, but if you are going to blend it in and Mr. Perkin has now resigned, why have we got this estimate this year? Why is it not "instant" blending instead of "one year" blending?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: There are two very good reasons: First of all, when this estimate book was prepared I had no knowledge and I do not believe anyone else in our department had any knowledge that Mr. Perkin was resigning. In the second place this estimate was, as I said, prepared last December; the position will be filled, but filled in the food council, so that in effect the personnel would just be moved over into that vote. It is just an administrative detail.

On vote 112:

Mr. R. F. Nixon (Brant): Mr. Chairman, on the food council. It would be a shame to let this vote go by without asking the hon. Minister for the information his statisticians have been able to provide him with on the extent to which vertical integration has been eased, or perhaps even rolled back by the activities of the food council. Perhaps there is some information he could give the House on the subject.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: This is a perennial subject for discussion. I would say that there may be little indication that there is less vertical integration in Ontario, but I would say that there is little indication that there is any more than there has been in the last few years.

In fact, some of the companies that had gotten into the field have retired from it now and others have, in some areas, expanded in two or three crops. I can think of canning peas and sweet corn as being two illustrations where there has been some expansion in this programme. On the other hand, I think we have to recognize that after a good deal of study by all sides of the industry, both the production and the processing side of it, through the food council, there has been some general acceptance that there is a place for at least a limited amount of vertical integration. This may be a strange admission for me, but nevertheless I must say that this is the result of their findings.

Mr. Oliver: I would think it was. Just what type would the hon. Minister condone?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: I do not think we want to see it expanded to the place where it becomes wholesale across the province and extends to every aspect of commodity production; and yet, on general principles, after a great deal of thought, there does not seem to be as much opposition to it as there was a few years ago.

Mr. Nixon: I might submit, Mr. Chairman, that the reason the opposition to integration seems to be fading out is that the large number of farmers who were put out of business by vertical integration have accommodated themselves as best they can to other markets and other projects. As the hon. Minister has said, the topic has come up for a number of years now. I hope he does not get the impression that it still is not working hardships on the farmers of the province, specifically in the canned crop field where he has said that vertical integration has continued unabated, and, as a matter of fact, this year is considerably advanced over last year.

The hardship has been one that has been absorbed by the farm community over a period of probably eight to ten years. We have lost all hope that anything the department can do would bring back these cash crops into the realm where the ordinary farmer can take some advantage of them.

The food council that we are discussing at the present time was instituted specifically to be the arm of government which would deal with vertical integration. I remember very little of any ancillary objects that were discussed at the time. I know that there are other objects that have come into more importance as the government has admitted, I suppose, that it is either powerless or unwilling to do anything about the fact that the large processing firms have taken over primary production in a good many fields of the agricultural industry.

I would like to ask my hon. friend, Mr. Chairman, if in fact his admission that some kinds of vertical integration are in the general good would be an indication that, if I might call it the fight against vertical integration, has been lost and the food council is going to concern itself with other matters.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: No, I would not want that opinion to exist. The food council is very conscious of this matter of vertical integration, in fact it has been their continuing objective to in every way relieve and alleviate, in fact not allow, the sudden damaging effect of immediate vertical integration to pertain in an expanding way to some of these agricultural food commodities. I think it has been most effective in limiting the spread of vertical integration, and in fact in some instances it has been responsible for eliminating it altogether. In other areas, there seems to be general agreement, even between the producers and the processors involved, that there is a place for it to a limited degree.

It seems to lend itself to co-ordinated harvesting and continuity of supply to the plants that seems to work reasonably well. Both the producers and the processors have agreed and are working with the food council at every opportunity where there appears to be a threat of increasing vertical integration. So I think we have to recognize that there has to be some reasonable attitude taken to this. Insofar as possible we must guarantee the continuance of contract negotiations between producers and processors, but also we must recognize the place of vertical integration.

Mr. Oliver: Could the hon. Minister tell me what concrete evidence there is that the food council has been instrumental in stemming the onward march of vertical integration? Can he give me one specific instance?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Where they have thwarted it or eliminated it?

Mr. Oliver: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: In tomatoes, for one instance.

Mr. Oliver: That was before you appointed the council, though, you said you had done that yourself.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: No, no; the food council was in operation at that time.

Mr. Oliver: I do not think so!

Hon. Mr. Stewart: The food council completely wiped it out on tomato production. I am flattered that my hon. friend has given me the honour for this, but my humility makes me feel that I must give some credit to the food council for this.

Nevertheless, the fact remains that it was eliminated and is no more as far as the tomato industry is concerned. There are other instances where it was tried and has been stemmed by the efforts of the food council in working towards the elimination of it.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, I would like to make just a brief comment here. I was very interested in the observation of the hon. Minister that vertical integration may be acceptable under certain conditions. The food council or the hon. Minister—let us not quibble on which—may have removed it in tomatoes, they may have limited it elsewhere, but I think quite frankly, as the hon. member for Brant has said, they have just decided that they are going to live with it.

But there is one kind of vertical integration that is not only welcomed, it should be encouraged, and that is vertical integration from the bottom up instead of from the top down. This is where I have my complaints with this government—in their reluctance to give to the producer that degree of control of marketing, if necessary in processing right through to the market, so that vertical integration is going to be a process in which the benefits accrue to the original producer who did most of the work rather than to the man who dominated the heap right from the outset and is just going to extract more of the middleman's profits, as well as his original profits.

In other words, in answer to the question of the hon. member for Grey South thrown in during the course of the debate—what kind of vertical integration is good? I would say vertical integration from the bottom up, where the farmers control it and carry the process right through to the market is not only good, it should be welcomed. I think this government should encourage it and assist it.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Chairman, we are asked, actually, to appropriate $156,000 for the food council. I have no doubt that they have rather elaborate statistical facilities at their disposal. I was wondering if there are statistics available that we as members of the House could look over that would indicate the change in vertical integration in the various aspects of the agricultural economy.

I may have missed the report of the food council—this is quite possible—but I kept an eye out for these statistics and I have never been able to find anything available this year that would indicate just how the statistics are changing with relation to it.

I wonder if there is such material available?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: I do not think we have it here, but we have material in the office we could get for the hon. member on the specific contracts that have been let. For instance, I have been handed a note from my good friend, the hon. member for Middlesex South (Mr. Olde) which tells me that one canning company contracted 250 acres in the Kerwood area this year where none was contracted last year. Now, this is a very large company that I understand was in the vertical integration field some time ago but apparently is going back into the contracting field again. I think this is typical of it.

I do know that in the Exeter area, where there was some vertical integration, Canadian Canners of Huron county have rented some farms and yet they have vastly expanded their contract acreage this year over last year; and last year was expanded over the year before. I have talked to them on many occasions concerning these matters as have the members of the food council. I think we have pointed out to them the dangers that are inherent in vertical integration and our objection to it.

On the other hand, I do not think even my hon. friend would want to draft legislation that would completely obliterate vertical integration because, as I said, there does appear to be some reason for it.

As the hon. member for York South has said, vertical integration from the bottom up is quite acceptable. We have illustrations of that in Ontario today. Now, if you have a law that there can be no vertical integration, then I think you must realize that that law will affect those who are vertically integrated from the bottom up, as my hon. friend says, from producer level to the processor.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Chairman, I am very glad to hear the hon. Minister's views on a proposed law that might control vertical integration, but actually we are very interested in the statistics that would indicate how this problem is changing in the province of Ontario. As a matter of fact, it is not clear at all whether vertical integration is expanding or contracting. Every bit of information that I am able to gather would indicate that it is expanding, notwithstanding the comments that have been handed to the hon. Minister by the hon. member for Middlesex South. It seems to me that if we are going to finance the food council, whose primary aim is to control vertical integration or be the authority on this, that we should be able to expect some statistics from them in the form of a report that would indicate just how this problem is changing.

I will let it go at that, but I would like to see the statistics.

Mr. Oliver: I would like to ask the hon. Minister: Does the food council make a report, a statistical report, an annual report?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: No, not an annual report.

Mr. Oliver: They make a report to which the members have access?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: I do not think so. It is in the Minister's report. I do not have one with me, but it was tabled in the report of The Department of Agriculture.

Mr. Oliver: The food council is made up of representatives of producers and industry; why should they not make a report that would be available to the hon. members of the Legislature? It is not strictly a government commission; it is a commission that is representative of wide, divergent groups and they focus their attention on very important problems.

As my hon. friend from Brant said, it would help us to know whether they are winning or losing and just what the situation is in respect to vertical integration. We do not know anything except what the hon. Minister says and all he talks about is tomatoes.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: In this connection, I think that is a very good suggestion, Mr. Chairman, that my hon. friend has made; but in the Minister's report that was tabled some weeks ago there is a report on the Ontario food council at page 192. It is quite an extensive report. It goes from page 192 to page 198—a six-page report.

Mr. Chairman, we are overlooking the importance of the establishment of the food council and its operation. I think we are doing a great deal of talking tonight about vertical integration in connection with the food council. I want to say that the food council has done more to expand the marketing of Ontario farm food products than any other organization in this government and I think this is where the emphasis should be placed. We have heard a lot less talk about vertical integration since it expanded the market for Ontario food products through the food council's efforts in Great Britain and offshore markets to the point where today, we are hard set to meet the demands of those markets with the products, whether they are vertically produced or whether they are produced under contract.

This, to me, is the important aspect of our whole food council and its operation, the fact that we are able to deal with specific projects, many of them, for instance—and I go back to the red cherries, a problem crop last fall and a typical illustration of this. What has recently happened with the onion problem in the Brantford marsh where they had an enormous crop of onions a year or two ago, and the development of the two-price system there that my hon. friend from Essex South has referred to.

This was a typical illustration of the food council's efforts on a voluntary basis to work with the Bradford marsh producers, and establish a two-price system for onions based on what the overseas market would pay and what the domestic market would pay. By feeding the market as it was required they cleaned up the onion problem and raised the price at the same time to the producer. It was a magnificent operation. This, to me, is the way organizations can and do operate.

We were told in London last fall by the importers over there that we were, at that time, exporting 30 per cent of the entire imports of the British market. The overall annual import from Canada to Great Britain is 10 per cent of the total import to the British market of onions, and to me that is a most significant development. And this has all come about in the last few years.

For instance, last year we exported 1,200,000 50-pound bags to the United Kingdom market. We have virtually provided an export industry for onions through the efforts of the food council and our overseas office in Ontario House. This, to me, is illustrative of the things that can be done, and I think we should be focusing our attention on these kind of things rather than on the matters of vertical integration as they are matters of concern to all of us concerning the food council.

Mr. Paterson: Mr. Chairman, the hon. Minister has answered the great bulk of my questions, but I wonder has there been any firm commitment this year as to the placing of onions in Great Britain?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: I must confess that there are no firm orders for next year's production. It is just planted now. Suffice to say that this market has been built up, and the quality of our onions is well accepted in Great Britain. As a matter of fact, when we were over there we found on the London market that the only onion that was more acceptable to the trade, and selling at a higher price, was the Polish onion. And the only reason that it was selling higher than ours was that there were uniform size onions in each bag. You could not tell the difference in size, they had been so carefully sorted. Our onions were of equally high quality, but they were not sized as accurately as were the Polish onions, so our onions were selling for a little bit less per bag.

I came back and talked to the food council about this, and I made some reference to a consumer group or two about this and I must confess that my wife took me to task for this. She said that she was not so sure that I was on the right track, that when she bought onions she did not want every one of them the same size—one day you want a small onion for what you want to do, and the next day you want a large one. She said that perhaps what I was talking about was something that the housewife does not really appreciate. I found that she was substantiated by other consumers who seemed to know a little more about that aspect of it than I did. So I soft-pedalled that approach, and I think the fact that we have broken into that market to the extent we have is indicative of the fact that we do not have many problems.

Last year we brought over, for the first time, through the efforts of the food council, a group of British food importers and had them here for a period of a few weeks. We gave them the opportunity to visit the production areas, the processing plants and packaging areas of many of these food products that we have here. The result was that they went back to Great Britain tremendously impressed with the potentials of our production possibilities. When we were in London last fall, we had a meeting with them and they were so enthralled by what we had to offer, and the connections that could be developed and expanded, that we formed a branch of the Ontario food council in London, with Ted Merritt, who is our man at Ontario House, as vice-chairman of the food council in charge of the off-shore markets for Ontario food products.

The very fact that we are in the United Kingdom market these last few years to the extent of supplying 42 per cent of the total tomato juice imported is indicative of the tremendous strides that have been made in exporting our food products from this country. I feel that these products that we can export should be exploited to the full, and this summer we are bringing over another group of food importers—food brokers—in order that they might have a look at what we have to offer and thereby establish contact and make purchase contracts. This is the thing we are interested in.

Mr. Paterson: I appreciate the comments of the hon. Minister. I wonder if at this stage there are any specifics available as to the number of acres that have been planted in onions this year as compared to last year. The onion farmer tends to gamble quite a bit on his crop, and I know for a fact that a great many hundreds of bags of onions were dumped in the province this year that were not sold. I have read also that there were a few problems in England with the quality of some of our shipments. Could the hon. Minister tell us how many bags were dumped through regrading in the United Kingdom?

Mr. W. D. McKeough (Kent West): Just the ones from Essex South.

Mr. Paterson: I might mention to the hon. member for Kent West that the top grade onions came from Kent and Essex.

Mr. McKeough: We did not dump any in Kent.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: I am advised that the acreage of onions is up about 10 per cent this year. As far as the onions that were dumped are concerned, there were a few that were not acceptable for human consumption. We ran into a very bad harvesting season right at onion harvesting time last year, I cannot recall the name of the disease—

An hon. member Neck rot!

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Neck rot set in. It is a peculiar problem that developed last year and it did show up in a few in England. We did not find any when we were there, but we were aware that it had been a problem. But the food council had been advised that the problem had appeared in Great Britain and had checked with the various onion packaging plants here who, when advised of the problem, were a little more careful about the grading of the onions as they went into the bags, because the disease showed up after they had been stored a little while.

Mr. Paterson: Will this affect our market this coming year?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: It should not affect it.

Mr. J. P. Spence (Kent East): I might say that I am talking the opposite to what you said with regard to the food council and the fine job they have been doing in expanding our markets, I would like to say that I am on the other side of the picture. Some of the processors of tomatoes and vegetables are concerned about the large number of tomatoes processed in one form or another that are brought from Italy into the province of Ontario. They are selling for more money than our Ontario product is selling for, and yet we have land here in the province of Ontario that will grow these tomatoes. It is a great concern to some of the processors.

I wonder if the hon. Minister has any idea, or could inform me of the volume of tomatoes brought in, in one form or another, into Ontario or into Canada?

Mr. R. K. McNeil (Elgin): Is that not a federal matter?

Mr. Spence: I would not think so.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: I would say that there are sizeable quantities. For example, tomato paste brought in from Italy. I think we can look forward to a lessening of this importation because the costs of producing that tomato paste in Italy are going up, and our people are more competitive now with the people in Italy than they were. We also have a tomato paste factory, I believe, being established in Ontario to produce this very tomato paste. This is being built by an international firm, as I understand it, and I am sure that unless they felt they could be competitive from the production standpoint here, they would not be building that plant and putting that investment in here. So I have good reason to believe that there may be a lessening of this importation of tomato paste. We have certainly more than offset that in the exports of our tomato juice.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Chairman, does The Department of Economics and Development still maintain a committee to foster the sale of Ontario agricultural goods?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: The Department of Agriculture and The Department of Economics and Development work together very closely in this field. We have appointed Mr. W. H. Richardson—I do not know whether he is here with us tonight or not—but W. H. Richardson has been appointed, and his office is in The Department of Economics and Development. He is our man in that department who works with the overseas offices of The Department of Economics where food products inquiries may come to their office. They in turn funnel them through to him, and he in turn works with the food council here in developing and providing the necessary information and in every way facilitating the expansion of our food export programme. It is a very, very efficient and smooth operation, and I think it is working exceedingly well.

Now, we have approval, and we are asking for approval in the estimates this year for an additional officer for the food council in the United Kingdom. We found that Mr. Merritt working in Ontario House just could not possibly cope with the demand for Ontario food products that does exist there.

I was greatly impressed. I could talk for the rest of the night on this subject. I know the hon. members would not want me to do this, but if they will permit me I would like to say that when we were there we visited innumerable food stores, many of them that were not on the itinerary at all for us to do, because many times I just simply went into a store without anybody knowing that I was coming or anything else. I did not find a single food store without Ontario food products. They were there in every food store we visited.

We found, too, that there was some suggestion in Belfast, Glasgow and in Edinburgh food stores—that is with the food brokers there—that they would like to have additional help from Ontario House. They knew our offices were there, they had made contact, but they felt that if there was additional help, there would be a closer relationship with the Ontario food industry. This is our job and this is what we intend to do, Mr. Chairman.

Of course, the food shows that we have had in Great Britain have contributed immensely to an acceptance of our product by the British housewife. And this has built up the demand in the various stores and they are going to put us in there. We are going to Germany to do the same thing at the Anuga show this September, and I think there are great possibilities for expanding the export of many Ontario food products.

Mr. Nixon: At the risk of triggering any further ministerial enthusiasm on this, I would like to ask again about the relationship of The Department of Agriculture with The Department of Economics and Development. I well remember under a former Minister of Economics and Development the setting up of an Ontario economic council and there were subcommittees in that having to do with tourism, agriculture and almost every field. I remember very well the various Ministers commenting about the great era of co-operation. I thought the hon. Minister of Agriculture at that time was a bit less than enthusiastic, although I may have been wrong. I want to know if that committee is still in operation.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: To my knowledge the committee itself is not in operation, but there are represented on the economic council, agricultural representatives. There are at least two or three on that council as such, but I do not believe the subcommittee itself is fully operative, because the responsibilities of that committee have been assumed through the development of the Ontario food council. It has in effect supplanted it.

Mr. Nixon: Does our own food council in this department have any success in penetrating the common market of Europe? I know they have been successful in the British Isles and in certain countries, but how about the common market area?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: I would say that here again an indication, as I mentioned, is the food show in Germany. This is a show that is attended by a million-and-a-half food buyers, or something like that, from well over 50 countries. We think there are opportunities for us to get into that market with certain food products. I think we must be guided by the economics of the possibilities. There are certain commodities that we may be able to sell in the West German market, and in the European market, but there are certain commodities that we cannot sell, and there is no use in us trying to sell something that is not economically feasible.

It is just like talking about selling meat. We know there is a great shortage of meat in Europe, and we would like to sell them meat. But when it comes to economics our price is just too high to sell over there as yet. Maybe their price will get to the place where we can export, I do not know. I hope that that will be the case one day, but today it does not exist. There are other areas where we can compete and those are the products we should be exploiting.

On vote 113:

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Chairman, on the junior farmer loan branch, the provincial auditor had some comments to make about the procedures for the setting of interest, and financing any deficits of the junior farmer loan branch, and actually some other operations of the government. Is the hon. Minister familiar with these recommendations? It is on page 19 of the auditor's report.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: I do not have the auditor's report with me.

Mr. Nixon: Has the interest rate for the junior farmer loan changed in the last year?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: No, it has not changed. It was set at five per cent, and it is still five per cent.

Mr. Oliver: It is right in the statute.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Yes, it is, very much so.

Mr. Nixon: The audit says that the department is losing money on its operation, without suggesting a rate increase—which would take an amendment of the House—but it does say that the estimates should include a sum that would cover this deficit. I may be incorrect in this, but as I read it he draws specific attention to it, and perhaps the hon. Minister might comment on it.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Apparently this matter has been discussed by my departmental officials with the Treasury board, and they have decided to put an entry through to clear up this particular item as a Treasury board order. I suppose it can be done both ways; it can be done through a Treasury board order, or it can be done through an addition to the estimates here to make up for the loss because, as I understand it, it is entailed between the rate of interest that we receive, and that which we pay for the money that is loaned out.

Mr. Nixon: Would the hon. Minister tell us what the amount of the Treasury board order this past year would have been to cover this?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: I have not got it.

Mr. Nixon: Has the hon. Minister any idea what it is?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: I would be guessing, but I know I can get the figure.

Mr. Oliver: On this 113, Mr. Chairman, I have no criticism of the Ontario junior farmer loan board, but I had a young man who wanted to get a loan from them a few months ago and I thought that perhaps we were drawing the lines a little too fine.

This young man had received a loan when the old original junior farmer loan was in existence a few years ago. He is now, of course, over 35, but he wanted to buy the adjoining farm. He is an excellent young farmer, an outstanding farmer in the community. Now I thought that the junior farmer loan board would have accepted his application for an extension of the loan on a new purchase, inasmuch as he had formerly come in under the junior farmer loan board. Now, why would not that be done? They turned it down, apparently, quite flat, and I was a little surprised at the procedure.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Well, Mr. Chairman, I regret that such disappointment was experienced by my hon. friend and his friend. It is quite understandable that when a loan application is turned down there is such a feeling. However, I think we have to recognize the fact that there has to be an age limit somewhere along the line. There are other sources of credit through the farm credit corporation, and it is exactly the same loan as this is and they have no age limit in there. Our age limit is put in from 21 to 35 years.

It is quite conceivable to me that farmers who may have qualified under the old loan from 21 to 35 years may have outlived that loan, we hope, and now find themselves in the position where they want to get further credit, but do not have access to it because of our age restriction.

However, the money is available through the farm credit corporation at the same rate of interest, under almost exactly the same conditions, so I would not feel that there should be any real problem there in this particular regard. I do feel that we have to maintain these age limits. Now this is the reason why this gentleman was turned down.

Mr. Oliver: I could understand if it was a new loan, but actually he was taking an extension of an existing one.

Mr. Nixon: I do not want to delay this, but this seems to be quite an important matter, Mr. Chairman. If I might quote from the auditor's report:

This deficit condition is due to the interest rates on much of the money borrowed being in excess of the rate being charged on the money that is presently outstanding. Although the rate charged currently on new mortgage loans has been increased, it is not expected that the revenue of the corporation will be sufficient to meet the cost of borrowed funds.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: What was meant there was that the old loans that my hon. friend from Grey South referred to a moment ago were at four per cent, and there is a considerable deficit. In fact, the provincial auditor said that the accumulated deficit was $1,010,000, and I understand that on the new loans the interest rate has been raised to five per cent, but that still does not offset the cost of borrowing. So we accumulate a little there, but we are still paying the difference on that four per cent and what money is costing today. So the accumulated overall effect is something less than $2,000,000 of all the losses we have had in this connection.

On vote 115:

Mr. Paterson: Mr. Chairman, on vote 115, I have not been able to find a place to ask a question about the blackbird research work that is being done, and I trust that it will fit in this area. I simply ask, has there been any significant development in the programme that was undertaken last year?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Well, I think this would come up more properly under 121, federated colleges, because actually they are carrying out the programme. It can be dealt with there.

Mr. J. Renwick (Riverdale): Mr. Chairman, would the hon. Minister tell us what progress is being made on the eradication of common barberry in the province?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Well, it is quite—

Interjections by hon. members.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: If it is ornamental barberry, my friend, the hon. member for Riverdale has no problem, because that is exempt. It is not known as a carrier. There are types of common barberry that are carriers for certain types of rust spores. This is the barberry that is being attacked and being eliminated under the programme. It will take about three years at least to cover the province and I am advised that the programme is on schedule. It started off last spring and it is now in its second year and progressing quite favourably and, I think, quite effectively. We are meeting very good co-operation, generally speaking, in the areas in which the eradication crews are working.

Mr. Renwick: Mr. Chairman, is it anticipated under this programme that the common barberry will be completely eradicated from the province in a matter of years?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Yes. For all practical purposes that will be the case. If my friend the hon. member knows of some in the province we shall be very happy to know about it if it has been missed.

Mr. Renwick: Mr. Chairman, I would be interested to know under what conditions payments to municipalities under The Weed Control Act are made; item four of this vote.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Fifty per cent of the cost of the weed inspectors' salary and travelling expenses.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Chairman, since the barberry eradication programme has gone along so well, I am sure the hon. Minister and his advisers are casting their eyes to new fields to conquer. I would suggest that one of the most noxious weeds we have in the province that really has had very little thought on it at all is the common hawthorn. As you travel through the country you can see countless acres being taken over by this tree. It is very difficult to control, particularly where land is being held for a speculative purpose, or being held by an absent land owner. We see this weed tree taking over farm after farm. I wonder if the hon. Minister has a particular programme for the control of this or if he would contemplate something along this line.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: We have no programme under way for this. I think it is just good farming practice to keep thorns under control. As far as we know, there is no real hazard to growing crops as there is with the barberry, so it has not come to our attention that we should go out on any eradication programme.

Vote 115 agreed to.

On vote 116:

Mr. S. Farquhar (Algoma-Manitoulin): I would like to have the hon. Minister discuss veterinary grants for northern Ontario, as we call them here under this vote. First of all, as I understand The Brucellosis Act, this problem has been treated through a programme of mandatory vaccination of young calves, and now this treatment is no longer mandatory. I may not be reading the bill right, but this is the way I understand it. Since I have a concern in this regard, I wonder if the hon. Minister would tell me if I am interpreting the bill properly and correctly.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Yes, that is right.

Mr. Farquhar: In this connection I feel that since it is no longer mandatory, it will not be done by any means on the scale that it has been done. It is of real concern among veterinarians in northern Ontario—two that I know of feel they will have to give up their homes and move. This has been quite a source of their income, and it is going to disappear. This is going to be a real problem. I do not intend to deal with the merits or demerits of the actual cessation of the programme because I do not know them. But I am concerned about the fact that we will lose some veterinarians in northern Ontario as a result of it. I wonder if the hon. Minister would consider, in the light of this condition, a different look at subsidies or arrangements that might be made to make it a bit more attractive to keep these people here? Because if we lose them, quite apart from the merits and demerits of the vaccination programme, it is going to have some other effects, and it is going to be really a terrible effect for northern Ontario.

Incidentally, I know that some northern veterinarians are having a meeting to decide what they can do about this problem and this new condition.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Mr. Chairman, as a department, we are quite aware of the problem that exists as far as veterinary services in northern Ontario are concerned. Our veterinary services branch and the Ontario veterinary association are carrying out discussions now, trying to work out solutions to this great and pressing problem in northern Ontario.

The matter to which you refer here—a decrease in revenue to veterinarians because of the compulsory aspects of the brucellosis programme being eliminated, this cutting into their revenue—is something that must be taken into consideration. At the same time, if this is the case I would say that they would have more time available. I must confess that I would like to see an arrangement worked out whereby the veterinarians in northern Ontario could be worked into the meat inspection service. I think that it could be done, and perhaps the service of veterinarians expanded to try to cover both fields. This is the area in which we are examining the possibilities right now. I had hoped we would be able to announce what progress we will be able to positively make at the time our estimates were being presented, but it has not been finalized as yet.

Mr. Farquhar: Just one more remark in this connection. I am very glad to hear that the hon. Minister is cognizant of the problem, but I hope that efforts will get to their attention very shortly—that they will understand there are moves on foot to keep them in business, let us say.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Mr. Chairman, the programme is mandatory to January 1, 1966. We will have details worked out—

Mr. Farquhar: I understand that. But I hope you do not wait until January 1. In fact, I know of one that is not going to be there very much longer unless there is concrete evidence that they are going to be able to live in the area.

Mr. Chairman: Carried?

Mr. Gaunt: Mr. Chairman, I just want to make a few brief comments in connection with the mastitis programme. I mentioned this earlier on, and my hon. friend indicated that it would be more appropriately brought up under this particular vote.

As my hon. friend is aware, the disease mastitis causes a huge economic loss to the farmers every year—I think it is about $25 million or $30 million yearly, across Canada, certainly a large amount, and one that we should not look upon lightly. I want to be brought up to date on what the department has been doing in the field of controlling this disease. I know that the veterinary services branch has conducted a programme of mastitis control; I am simply asking my hon. friend to bring me up to date on what is being done, what has been done in the past year and what will be done next year to, at least in part, control this disease and keep the loss to a minimum.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Mr. Chairman, I would have to say that the mastitis problem is one of the most pressing in the dairy industry today. I know of no other problem that causes as much concern to dairymen than this problem of mastitis.

The exploratory programme that we carried out was most effective. We found that it really worked, so we have expanded this now into a wholesale control programme across the province, making it voluntary for the farmers to join this programme if they wish. We have a mastitis control policy that has been set out here with various conditions and terms of reference that the farmer and the department sign and carry out in unison. To date, since December 1, 1964, when we inaugurated the province-wide programme, we have 161 herds enrolled; there are more coming in all the time.

I think this is indicative of the interest of a good many successful dairymen in trying to clean up this problem within their own herds. We feel that we can handle up to 750 herds quite conveniently, and we would hope that other farmers would avail themselves of the opportunities that present themselves, in really coming to grips with this problem.

Mr. Gaunt: Mr. Chairman, another matter that I want to raise is the matter of rabies. Rabies has been a problem for a number of years now, and I know many farmers in my area have been worried about it. They have had cattle afflicted with this particular disease and, of course, we all know that once it is contracted, there is no cure for it; the animal simply dies.

We have had this disease with us for a long time, but it has become a problem in the more populated areas of the province within the past three or four years. I wonder if there is any indication that we are close to a breakthrough in terms of controlling this disease? It seems that, until this point, we have been able to do very little to control and pinpoint it, so that we might eradicate it altogether. It seems to me that the disease comes and goes at its own leisure. We have recently had an indication that it is on the way up again. I wonder if my hon. friend would have any comments in connection with it?

I know that farmers in the province have suffered financially because of this, and I am sure that they would be interested in anything new the hon. Minister would have to bring forward at this time.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: I share my hon. friend's concern with this disease. There is very little that can be done to actually eliminate or eradicate it, or bring it under control. We have to confess this. It is so thoroughly established in our wildlife population that it seems to go across the province in cycles, or waves. As the wildlife population is decimated, so the incidence of rabies seems to go down. Then you have the cycle of the increase coming back up again in the wildlife population, and then another cycle of rabies spreading across the province again. I think we are in our third cycle of this now, and the incidence of it is on the increase. It just goes in waves. You will see it start off in the far part of the province, north and east, and it goes across the province. Right now, it seems to be most prevalent in the south-western part of the province.

There is little, really, that can be done. Last year the claims for rabies indemnification was $32,391, shared on the basis of 60 per cent paid by the province of Ontario and 40 per cent paid by the government of Canada, for indemnification for livestock losses due to rabies.

Mr. Gaunt: Mr. Chairman, I would be interested in knowing if any research is being conducted into the disease of rabies. I am thinking of research at the University of Guelph, or any of the other universities across the province, with the idea of eventually controlling this disease and getting it to the point where we can completely eradicate it.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: No. This has been tried generations ago, to find some means of controlling this disease and there has been no practical means found. It is in the wildlife population; I think we have to live with it. It is one of those things, and I can see no sense in standing in this House saying that much as we would like to find an answer, and let us spend public money on research, we know that answer before we start—there is virtually no way of controlling it in wildlife. How in the world can you go out and eliminate it in skunks, groundhogs, foxes and squirrels, even in the bats that fly through the air? This is the problem. So what can one do there? I think we might as well be realistic and face it; say it is a problem and we have to live with it. We have got to be aware of it, we have to be cautious that humans are protected insofar as it is possible. Make everybody aware of it, but live with it. I do not think there is anything else we can do.

Mr. Paterson: Mr. Chairman, I have a question to ask in regard to The Meat Inspection Act. On February 5 last, there was an article in the Globe and Mail headlined: "125 Slaughterhouses Due To Be Scrapped If Changes Not Made." I realize that your programme is getting nicely under way, but I wonder if the hon. Minister has any details as to the number of small plants that have updated and upgraded themselves since the passing of this Act last year, and as to how many have closed their doors?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: I think we were all aware of the fact, Mr. Chairman, when The Meat Inspection Act was introduced that there would be some of the operators of some of the smaller plants who would feel that perhaps it was not worth their while to bring their plants up to the specifications that would be required for inspection purposes. But when our staff went out on the road and interviewed the operators of these plants, we found that at least three-quarters of the plants would qualify for inspection with minor improvements and updating of the standards. I think the preliminary inspection and the interviews with these operators on the spot has worked out very well; they are now in the process of bringing their plants up to the standards that are required with the minor changes that have to be made. Some of them do not have to make any change, and so it is working out very well.

Mr. Paterson: I would like to say to the hon. Minister that I think these facts give a great deal of assurance to our consuming public that things are under good control.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Chairman, I am sure the hon. Minister remembers December 1961, when arrests by the mounted police indicated the scandalous dealing in uninspected and bad meat in the province of Ontario. I suppose it is for a member of the Opposition to say that now that it is the spring of 1965, we are listening to the hon. Minister report that his inspection of meat in the province is getting under way.

I well remember last year when the committee on agriculture met with the hon. Minister and the chief of the health of animals division from Ottawa, when it was made clear that although the Act provided for separate inspection by provincial authority, we were going to do something far better than that. We were going to have federal inspection across this province so that the consumer would be assured of the quality that all of us feel should be provided. I have never really been clear in my mind why it was that the section of the Act which provided for separate provincial inspection was relied upon to bring inspection even as far as it has presently come. Was it that the regulations at the federal level were more stringent than the hon. Minister had expected, or was there some other reason that the present level of inspection was implemented?

I would say, before the hon. Minister answers, that in many areas this is a sore point. One of the first speeches I ever made in the House recommended to him that some form of separate inspection should be implemented—this was in January, 1962—so that perhaps at a slightly different standard we would be able to allow the many small operators in the province to continue the slaughter of animals, and so that trade of the type to which we had grown accustomed before the scandals were revealed, could be continued. Perhaps the hon. Minister would tell us why it was decided to change the basis of inspection. And secondly, precisely what the level of inspection is at the present time.

I understand that there is bound to be a period during which inspectors are trained, but are we in southern Ontario at this point under full meat inspection?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: First of all this is a very large question to answer in just a word. There has been much debate in this House on many occasions as to why the province of Ontario has entered into the field of meat inspection on its own. Suffice it to say that we, with the best of intentions—and I thought with a very reasonable attitude—approached the federal government to work out with them the details of providing meat inspection throughout the province of Ontario. They have their inspectors established in the federal plants now; we felt that, under their supervision and with properly trained lay inspectors, it could easily be expanded to include the smaller plants that are not involved in interprovincial or export trade, which is the responsibility of the federal Department of Agriculture inspections. I thought that this was a very reasonable suggestion. I liked it so well that we talked it over with the people in Ottawa, and they were agreed that this could be worked out.

Mr. Nixon: Might I interrupt and ask a question?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Yes.

Mr. Nixon: What year was it the exploratory talks took place, would it be 1963 or—

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Oh, no. The Act was passed in 1962, was it not? January, 1962, the Act was passed and it was in that year we entered into the discussion with Ottawa to carry it out, because, as the Act—

Mr. Nixon: The Dead Animal Disposal Act, or whatever it was, was January 1962?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Yes, because I became Minister in 1961—we are getting confused about these dates and I do not think it is really important, quite frankly.

Mr. Nixon: Well, I would assume that the first talks took place in 1963—for federal inspections.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Well, it may have been in 1963, I do not think it is a point of great importance.

Mr. Nixon: Sorry to interrupt.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: The fact is that they did take place and we thought that everything was coming along very well. The Minister, his deputy and the director of the health of animals branch—the veterinary director-general under whose auspices meat inspection is carried out—were agreed that this was a logical proposal and that it could work. But when we got around to the actual implementation of it, when it came right down to coming to grips with the small slaughterhouse operator and what he would be required to do, we were of the opinion that the intent of our legislation had not got through to the people who would be, in effect, enforcing the legislation in the country.

This does not pertain to the Minister, his deputy or the top staff at all, and I do not say this in a derogatory way. I want to be as non-political as I can possibly be because there is no politics involved in this. We worked away at it from time to time; we had trips back and forth to Ottawa but we could not seem to arrive at a common meeting ground on making applicable and workable the federal standards as these pertained to small slaughterhouses.

Mr. Nixon: They would not lower their standards; or is that unfair?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: I think this would be about what one could say, yes. And I think with good reason, because they felt that if they were to lower them, someone could say: "Well, you have asked us to accept two standards." Now, we went to Ottawa and simply told them that we were going to embark on this ourselves, I think it was a bit of a shock to all of them, quite frankly. It was to us, but we decided to do it. And having decided to do it, we asked them for the fullest co-operation and they offered the fullest co-operation, and it was mutually to our advantage to accept.

They provided for us top senior people from their staff to inspect the plants throughout Ontario in co-operation with our veterinary director of the province of Ontario, and under his supervision. The survey has been completed. There were 403 red meat plants inspected and 75 poultry plants surveyed in Ontario, making a total of almost 500 plants that had been surveyed. We found that about 75 per cent of them could meet the requirements with very modest modifications.

First of all, I want to make it abundantly clear that there is absolutely no difference in the standards of the meat itself—the health standards of the animal in ante mortem inspection and the standards of the meat in post mortem inspection—they are identical with the federal standards. The difference pertains to the plant standards, the height of ceilings and so on, the various plant requirements that do in some instances pertain. This is where the difference really exists. So our consuming public, when they buy meat inspected in the province of Ontario, will be buying meat that meets exactly the same health standards as does the federally inspected product.

Mr. Nixon: The final part of that question was: Can you assure us then that in the territory covered by the bill, that is, southern Ontario, all the meat is presently inspected?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: No, it is not presently inspected; we are gradually bringing it in. I believe we have the inspectors working now in the Niagara peninsula, it was decided to start the programme in the Niagara peninsula and it is now in operation there. The first group of inspectors have been brought in, have been given a briefing course on our standards and they are now in the field carrying out meat inspections. The second group of inspectors have been engaged and they are presently, I believe, in the plants on actual inspection work with the federal inspectors. They will be starting out into the field as well.

The idea is gradually to cover this with lay inspectors directly under the supervision of qualified veterinarians who are health of animals inspectors, who will be in charge of the whole programme and it will be expanded right across the province of Ontario.

At the time I brought in the bill back in—I see it received assent in December, 1962, the session prorogued on April 26, 1963—at that time I said that northern Ontario might not come in at the same time. Now I am hopeful, recalling previous discussion here tonight that perhaps northern Ontario may get the inspection before parts of southern Ontario, because of the developments we anticipate.

Mr. Nixon: What is the timetable then for the—

Hon. Mr. Stewart: The timetable is to bring it in just as quickly as we can train inspectors and get it into operation. But I want to point out to my hon. friend that if he had suggested to us, as I think he would like to intimate to this House, that we should have brought this in sooner, it could have caused untold hardship to many of the small slaughterhouse operators who were providing a healthy, wholesome product for the people of this province then as now. I think we have to respect their financial position and the contribution that they are making to the community and to the service they are providing. Having borne this in mind, we are bringing it in as quickly as we possibly can, in as efficient and practical a manner as is possible.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Chairman, I was quite ready to accept the information but if the hon. Minister is going to make some comments about what I might have suggested, then I would like to put the facts on the record again: The original scandal causing this was in 1961; your Act passed this House in 1962; we have not got meat inspection in 1965 and I doubt if it will be ready by the end of this year. Now, I agree with the hon. Minister that the meat that has been provided by these small abattoirs is of a high standard, but we do not know for sure and the consumer has not known for sure, although the hon. Minister and I would agree from our experience it is good. Maybe we would have agreed before 1961, when the federal revelation concerning this came out.

I do not want to get out of line on this, but if the hon. Minister is going to get on his soap box, we have a case too, because it was put to him directly from the Opposition that this is precisely what he would have to do. It was put to him in 1962. Now, he has done it in 1965; we hope the inspection is going to be effective, but there is no indication for us to believe that it will be completed, even this year.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Mr. Chairman, I hesitate to let that little remark go by unnoticed. My hon. friend in the Opposition here reminds me—with his very charming personality, a very handsome young gentleman—reminds me of something that I recall in connection with the Royal winter fair. Last year I was out there. Indeed it was the night the hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Roberts) officially opened the fair. There was a young lady there engaged to come into the ring to provide a demonstration of Roman riding—a very charming young blonde lady from the United States, I believe. She came into the ring riding two white horses, driving four ahead of her—six horses. They came into the ring and apparently someone in the ring had got his signals crossed and let her come in too soon. There was a great deal of trouble. However, she managed the horses exceedingly well and finally got them under control. She did a magnificent job of riding two horses at the same time. This is reminiscent of what my hon. friend from Brant said tonight, because I know of no one in this House who has done a better job of riding two horses at once than my hon. friend from Brant in this matter of meat inspection.

And I say this, that he stood in this House—and he knows as well as I do that the dead meat scandal had nothing to do with meat inspection in this province, absolutely nothing.

Mr. Nixon: Oh, the hon. Minister never thought of it before that.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: I said nothing to the hon. member when he was talking. We amended The Dead Meat Inspection Act and we have not had an instance of that problem developing from that time to this.

Now then, meat inspection has been provided in the federal plants for inter-provincial and export trade. And it was only natural that the consumers of the province of Ontario should ask for meat inspection to be extended to all the slaughterhouses in this province. This we have attempted to do, but the hon. member has stood in this House and he has pleaded on innumerable occasions that we should pay attention to the position of the small slaughterhouse operator in the economy of this province, and rightly so. I agree with him that this is the thing to do. Now what would my hon. friends have said to me tonight if I had brought this in here quickly and had said to the small slaughterhouse operators, "Get your plant in shape or you are out of business"? That is what the hon. member was intimating I should have done. We believe that what we are doing is in the best interest of all the people of the province of Ontario.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Chairman: Order.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Chairman, if you will permit me to put the record straight and to clarify the muddled thinking of the hon. Minister, I would say without any doubt—and the record will bear this out—that the first speech I made as the member for Brant—where I must admit that the scandal having to do with meat began—was that the government should bring in provincial meat inspection because the people required the safeguard. And, second, the hundreds of operators who were providing a quality product would thereby be safeguarded. I well remember that my first touch of the political lash came from my friend to my immediate left who said there should be absolutely no compromise with quality and that federal inspection should be applied to everything.

Now, down through the years of debate and deliberation, every member from a constituency representing people who are making a living in the slaughterhouse business, has been adamant that if a slaughterhouse operator is living up to reasonable standards, he should not be put out of business. From the very beginning I felt—and I told the hon. Minister and I told the House—that the way it should be done was with provincial inspection. This is what he has done, and I approve of it, but it began in 1961 or even on the hon. Minister's timetable, in 1962, and it will not be complete this year.

Mr. Gaunt: Mr. Chairman, I want to ask what I hope is a rather harmless question in this connection. I want to have clarified for me the confusion in my own mind that exists in connection with the stamping of the meat.

At the time when the bill was originally introduced by my hon. friend, I understood that all the meat that was inspected was to be stamped with "Canada approved." Now that we are going to do our own inspecting, I wonder what the stamp is going to be. Is it going to be "Ontario approved"? What exactly is it going to be? I think at that time it was felt that if there was one stamp, it would avoid confusion in the public mind, that the consuming public would feel that we had one standard of meat inspection. I would be interested to know what is going to happen in this connection.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Well, my hon. friend likely gets the Ontario Gazette—if he had he would have seen the stamp. Here it is right here—“Ontario approved.” I must confess—the hon. member for York South suggests “Province of Opportunity,” and I would like very much to include that somewhere—but this is “Ontario approved.” It provides the coat of arms within the sign here and the plant number will be in here. This is left blank. It is exactly the same ink as is used on the federal stamp; it will be stamped on the carcass in the same place as the federal stamp and I think there will be a little difference in shape between the two.

Vote 118 agreed to.

Vote 119 agreed to.

On vote 120:

Mr. Spence: Under this heading, under Western Ontario agricultural school, I wish to commend the hon. Minister for recommending to the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Connell) to expand the men's residence and the dining hall in the Western Ontario agricultural school. The hon. Minister is well aware that the conditions there are crowded; with this expansion it will make it possible for more young men interested in agriculture to take courses here. I hope that the hon. Minister will see that that expansion is completed this year. Western Ontario agricultural school will be helped a great deal.

Vote 120 agreed to.

On vote 121:

Mr. Gaunt: Mr. Chairman, I would like to make a few comments on this vote. If my hon. friend were to ask me if I were going to be brief I would tell him yes; I think we are going to be brief. I will not be over 15 or 20 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, it is a well known fact that pesticides and insecticides are here to stay. The economic pressure for them is tremendous and their use is certainly going to be continued in this province by the farm people, and those who are connected with the pesticide control programme in one form or another.

I want to make a few comments about the fact that they have done some rather interesting work in the United States in this connection. Initially, at least, it was in the form of: experiments; later on, it has gone beyond that experimental stage and is now in the stage of being quite a practical programme.

Instead of controlling insects through pesticides and insecticides, in some parts of the states they do it by introducing parasites of the particular insect that they are trying to control. They have had a great deal of success with this particular programme. I can cite a number of cases where this has been so, and I wonder if we have reached the law of diminishing returns in our use of pesticides and insecticides—that is to say, the insects eventually build up an immunity to certain types of pesticides and insecticides. In the United States they have found that this programme has worked much more effectively than has the use of pesticides and insecticides, simply because there is not this build-up. I can think particularly of the house fly and the use of DDT in its control. Over the years, the house fly has built up an immunity to DDT and I am told by my research friends that this is the result of an enzyme within the body of the house fly which changes the chemical organically, apparently, and makes it into a harmless element within the body and so the house fly, for instance, has become almost immune to DDT. So we have a situation where increasing amounts have had to be applied in order to control it.

I mention the introduction of parasites as an interesting theory—at least, I found it so when I first read about it. I studied it further and I find that they are enjoying great success with it down in the states. I am interested in hearing the comments of my hon. friend about it, because I do think it has possibilities. Granted, we have to be careful, and I think it has to be used intelligently. But I repeat that they have had a great deal of success with it down in the United States. I would be interested in hearing the comments of my hon. friend in this connection.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Mr. Chairman, there is really nothing new about the introduction of biological control of one insect over another through the introduction of parasites. This is a fairly old science that has been going on for a long time—I was going to say centuries. It is practised right here in the province of Ontario. One particular illustration I can think of—and there has not been a great deal of publicity attached to it, because it is relatively of minor importance when you consider the broad aspect—is an effective means in certain instances. It does not go as far as one might think that it should.

It seems to me that the whole matter of pesticides is one that we must come to live with. We must recognize the potentials, both from the standpoint of its hazards, as well as its great usefulness and effectiveness. Man-kind, I believe, has approached to the place where he must learn to live with the dangers that are inherent in the unwise use of pesticides. On the other hand, I am sure we would all agree that without insecticides—in fact, all types of pesticides, including herbicides—that today we could find life a great deal more intolerable. I feel that with the study that is being given to this matter of pesticides throughout the world, a quite lengthy article on pest control chemicals in world agriculture, published in the Agricultural Institute Review, is most revealing. It is important to note the outstanding people throughout the world who are associated with this problem of pesticides and the control and the use of them.

I believe that with the co-ordinated approach that is being carried out by the governments of Canada, the United States and ourselves, so far as North America is concerned—all the governments of Canada, for that matter—we are aware of the problems that are involved and we are taking appropriate steps to see that abuses do not creep into the use of this particular product. I compliment my hon. friend for having brought this other method up. It is a method that has been tried and proven, but I do not think we should attach undue importance to it because, frankly, I do not think it is as widely applicable as might be believed.

Mr. Paterson: Mr. Chairman, last year we appropriated some $250,000 for blackbird research studies. I wonder how much of this money has been expended to date, and if there are any encouraging results of the studies to date.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: I understand that $50,000 of that appropriation has already been invested in this study, and that the detailed study of actual damages by blackbirds is being carried out. The study of the hatching areas of the birds in southwestern Ontario is being examined in some detail to see if an approach can be made there.

As for the study of devices to keep the birds away from the crops, I am not too sure that is the best way of handling the situation, because I think you are just driving them away from one crop to another. The control study of chemical compounds that may cause sterility in blackbird eggs is perhaps one of the most promising avenues by which the problem may be brought under control. I would point out that our people at the federated colleges at Guelph are working closely with authorities in the United States who have had this study under way for a number of years. I think we are going to have a breakthrough. It is going to take some time, but I think we will have a breakthrough.

Mr. Paterson: A second question is in relation to a speech made by the hon. Minister of Education (Mr. Davis) in Fergus. I will quote briefly from remarks contained in the press:

The new programme will place emphasis on technical and business courses useful to our boys planning to remain on the farm. It will include, in expanded form, a science-based course in agriculture introduced in 1962.

This is in relation to the four-year agricultural course.

Recently, sir, in our local press, it was remarked that our district high school board planned putting in a greenhouse as part of the educational institute there, but they ran into difficulties in that they did not think they could handle the financing of the operation. I wonder if the hon. Minister and the hon. Minister of Education might give this some consideration, because this area has the largest concentration of greenhouses in Canada, possibly in North America, and there certainly is a need for well trained greenhouse workers, especially in the field of soil and plant testing. I was hoping that some consideration could be given, and that your department would co-operate more fully in this regard and be of some assistance to the area of greenhouse operators.

Mr. H. S. Racine (Ottawa East): Mr. Chairman, in the debate of this department in the last session, I raised the question of educational facilities for French-speaking students, particularly from the eastern Ontario region. In the past few months I have been advised that conditions have not improved in the past year. At a time when we are discussing areas of poverty in this province, has the hon. Minister not noticed that the income of the farmers in the counties of Russell, Glengarry and Prescott is among the lowest in this province? Can that be attributed to the lack of educational facilities in that area? Can it be attributed to the shortage of qualified, bilingual agricultural representatives who are able to speak the language of the predominantly French farmers in those counties? Is it possible, Mr. Chairman, that many of the young people do not go to Kemptville or Guelph because of language difficulties?

I have not consulted the authorities of Ottawa University on this subject, but I would suggest to the hon. Minister of Agriculture to discuss with the hon. Minister of Education and Minister of University Affairs and talk with the authorities of the University of Ottawa about the possibility of opening its facilities for the training of bilingual, agricultural representatives. That would probably contribute considerably to the development of that greatly neglected part of the province of Ontario.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Mr. Chairman, this matter is one of concern. I remember the hon. member raising this matter last year and I referred him to the fact that there are schools in the province of Quebec where there is the opportunity to take agricultural education—Ste. Anne de la Pocatière near Montreal, and in the school at Ville Marie in northern Quebec opposite the Timiskaming area. Some of our students from Ontario have gone to these schools. The students in Laval University agricultural course are in their second year now and we would hope that French-speaking students from Ontario would avail themselves of the opportunity in these French-language schools.

We are continually faced with the very great difficulty of obtaining agricultural representatives and people to work in the extension branch in its various aspects, who are bilingual and who have the agricultural background and training and desire to get into that particular field. On the other hand, I think my hon. friend would agree that it is most difficult to develop such a school where one would have the personnel to teach in the French language within the province of Ontario. There just does not appear to be that much demand from that many students. Admittedly, there are some, and we have encouraged them to take the course in the other schools, wherever it is practical to do this.

Mr. B. Newman (Windsor-Walkerville): Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask one question of the hon. Minister under this vote and that is concerning starling control. Are there any experiments under way with the hope of relieving the cities of the starling problem that they are confronted with during the summer months? I know that my own community has an awful time with starlings from the month of June right through to September.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Mr. Chairman, I would like to say that the problem is not confined to the urban areas; we have problems with them in the country, too. It is all part of the overall blackbird problem and we would hope that the studies that are under way will reveal control methods that will be satisfactory.

Mr. Newman: So when we are talking about starlings we are also talking about blackbirds?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Yes.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if I might ask the hon. Minister—now that the University of Guelph has been established—is it anticipated that any of these grants will become university grants through The Department of University Affairs in future years, or is it expected that what is generally listed in vote 121 will continue to be an agricultural vote?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Vote 121 covers everything: teachers, maintenance, teaching maintenance and research, right up to September 1, 1965. After that it will only cover research and services and they will be paid by grants to the university from The Department of Agriculture.

Vote 121 agreed to.

On vote 122:

Mr. MacDonald: On vote 122 I will not prolong the agony for the hon. member for Kent West unduly, but in view of the hon. Minister's statements on a number of occasions during the last year, he was not able to provide assistance to applications for loans beyond the $100,000 limit that is now in the regulations of The Co-operative Loan Act. I am not raising this point with specific reference to FAME, but as a general proposition whether or not it is sadly out of date to have that sort of limit. If I might go back to the debate on vertical integration from the bottom up, it may well be that in the development of co-operatives in conjunction with our marketing board, to give the farmers a greater control of the market and establish greater stability in marketing, there will be need for underwriting credit requirements. It is quite conceivable, in many instances, that this limit of $100,000 is completely unrealistic. I believe I am correct in saying that this was a limit that was fixed 30 years ago. I do not know whether it has been changed even in the intervening years. I wonder if the hon. Minister could indicate to the House whether or not there is any possibility of introducing a greater flexibility, or perhaps taking the limit out, and judging the merits of each application.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: I must confess, Mr. Chairman, that there has been no consideration given to doing either one. Frankly the $100,000 loan seems to be quite adequate for most of the co-ops that have come to us. I know of none that would want more than that, except the FAME co-operators who came to us and wanted much more. I do not have the figures before me of the co-op loans; they are here some place in this book, but generally they seem to fit in pretty well.

There are several loans up to $100,000 on the books, and in talking to the co-op people who have been in to visit with us concerning the United Co-operatives of Ontario and the application of the loan to various individual co-ops, there seems to be very general acceptance that this is a very excellent programme and a source of credit. It does enable co-ops to modernize their plants and to consolidate operations generally and to provide exceptionally good service to the farm people of Ontario. I would say that it is generally pretty good.

Loans for the last year ending March 31, 1965, amounted to $198,000 and the largest loan was $65,000. There are approved loans—I see there is one here for $100,000. The rest of them range from $15,000 to $85,000 and that is about the range.

Mr. MacDonald: I am not arguing with the hon. Minister that the great majority of them would likely be far below the $100,000—for small, struggling co-ops—but I am just raising the point, and I put it to the hon. Minister for his consideration in whatever idle moments he may have to consider these points, that there may well be occasions on which a ceiling of $100,000 is unrealistic. Am I not correct that that ceiling has been there for 25 or 30 years?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: I think it has been there ever since the Act was brought in; I am not sure about the date.

Vote 122 agreed to.

Mr. Chairman: This concludes the estimates of The Department of Agriculture.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree moves that the committee of supply rise and report it has come to certain resolutions and ask for leave to sit again.

Motion agreed to.

The House resumed; Mr. Speaker in the chair.

Mr. Chairman: Mr. Speaker, the committee of supply begs to report certain resolutions and asks for leave to sit again.

Report agreed to.

THE DEPARTMENT OF EDUCATION ACT

Hon. W. G. Davis (Minister of Education) moves second reading of Bill No. 153, An Act to amend The Department of Education Act.

Mr. A. E. Thompson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, we from our side believe this bill in general has been an advancement and an indication of the desire by the government to provide opportunity for skills and training to young people throughout the whole of Ontario. I know that there have been two points of view expressed about the community colleges, hinging really on the question of parallel courses for university. I think the proponents of both arguments are more moderate in their views than are the views being made about them.

One position that has been made is that we have the presidents of "ivy ghettos" who are terribly concerned that the walls and ramparts of their castles of intellectual aristocracy may be stormed by the democratic mobs who are wanting to come in and take the academic opportunity there. They look on any new avenues or approaches as being a danger to them. I say that these are extremes in the argument, and I suggest, having talked myself to presidents of the universities, that their real concern is that they maintain a quality as well as the maximum quantity we can get into the university, and that they maintain the integrity of their courses in the universities.

I have mentioned "ivy ghettos," and this intellectual aristocracy argument. On the other side is the fact that we believe that education is the right of anyone and that universities should have every type of avenue open into them. Perhaps when an instance of this is given, sometimes the question of quality is forgotten and so is the purpose of university. But I would suggest, sir, that between those two extremes are the university professors and the presidents. They are wanting the universities to be open to everyone.

With the community colleges, we were all concerned on which side the hon. Minister might come down. He has shown himself again not only a man of moderation but I would also say a man of some subtlety in that at first glance it might be hard to tell which side he has come down on, whether he has really held to one side or the other on this thing. But I have concern because of the very title of his community colleges. He calls the colleges, "colleges of applied arts and technology." I would suggest that this shows a certain emphasis, "applied arts and technology." I can appreciate that he might not go to the extent of calling them "colleges of liberal arts," but at least he could, I think, emphasize arts in this title. I suspect that some of the emphasis that he is making on these community colleges may be because of the structure of financing. He recognizes he has a chance to receive from the federal government—if he talks of retraining, training and technology—a 50 per cent grant.

When we think of the imagination of this new approach throughout the province, I would hope still further imagination might have taken place in tackling the federal government to extend its financial arrangements to include liberal arts to be taught if this was necessary.

The hon. Minister has said, Mr. Speaker, that one of the justifications for his community colleges and one of the justifications for an emphasis on applied arts and technology is the fact of the enormous advance that is taking place in this industrial age. We must train people, and he refers to the Deutsch report. Professor Deutsch had mentioned what was certainly emphasized in the manpower study, about which the hon. Minister of Labour (Mr. Rowntree) is so well acquainted, that in the future, and it will not be too far away, every man, no matter what his specializing, will have to retrain into some other vocational approach. Professor Deutsch suggests, I think, that there may be quite a number, and I think with many cases that it will almost be obligatory to do this.

But apart from this, sir, in this manpower commission, the representatives from industry emphasized that a broad knowledge, a broad base was so essential in entering industry. I notice that both at Oxford and Cambridge, in the first year they are emphasizing a broad approach rather than a specialization approach. I suggest that with young people moving into community colleges, particularly if they are going to be specialists in the trades and in new technology, they may be starting some of them at even 15, 16 or 17 to move into this area. There is the ferment of having a liberal arts approach, the ferment of intellectual curiosity being developed from knowing not only how to do certain trades, how to do certain technical things, but also to ask why we do these things.

That is very important because I do feel that often in professional training today there are men—and I refer to engineers and to others—who perhaps would have had much more value from their education if there had been open to them the stimulation of questioning, of philosophy and other courses. I think all of us in this Chamber, if we had the privilege of taking some kind of liberal arts courses, would have in some way been encouraged to assess the values in our society and perhaps we would have been better for this. Certainly as we look at certain trends in industry, we find that the kind of person wanted is not only the technician, the highly skilled technician, but also the man who can question and can make value judgments.

The hon. Minister, and it is only by inference, because he has always had a qualification when referring to the courses, but by inference and by the title of the community colleges, seems to emphasize the know-how and not know-why. I even would suggest that this may mean that there could almost be a lack of opportunity for many young people out in the rural areas, who have been looking forward to getting a first experience of the stimulation of working with professors, and of questioning the values. This is going to be denied them. There are many communities without the opportunities of larger and richer communities, without the arts, museums, theatres and so on. This stimulating environment would be particularly important to them, and yet this seems to be a cold, efficiency approach that is being taken in the enunciation by the hon. Minister of this very challenging new approach which reaches out across the province.

It seems to have downgraded the liberal arts. I would suggest, sir, that even the hon. Minister, in his own pronouncement and statement to the legislative assembly, almost has avoided the word "academic." I do not see it very much in his opening statement. He does say that the exceptional student, of course, will be recognized and could go to the universities, and he leaves it up to the universities themselves, to take the initiative in saying who can come into the university courses.

But again, from my own experience with the manpower commission, we met representation from Ryerson, and representation from other technical training programmes. They expressed frustration in trying to break down the barriers into the levels of higher learning to get some recognition for the students. Some of the universities were accepting them, but the representatives were trying to ask us for our help. I can appreciate that the government should not be interfering with the freedom of the university, but when you have such a challenging concept as community colleges, although the hon. Minister again, as I say, has left qualifications; I would have hoped that he would have given an emphasis to the academic background and to the liberal arts, so that all young people could have not only the opportunity to learn skills and trades and higher technical approaches, but also the opportunity to have the stimulation of social thought and learning about social values and how to question, as well as how to do.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Mr. Speaker, on first reading of this bill I expressed on behalf of our group, almost unqualified enthusiasm for the principle. However, there are a number of questions that I think require some answers and some exploring. I hope to raise some of them now, being quite conscious of the fact that we will be exploring many of them for many years to come. This is really the beginning of a rather lengthy process.

In the course of his introductory comments, the hon. Minister made the observation that the first of the community colleges might have their doors open in the fall of 1966, in time for the first graduates from the four-year courses under the Robarts plan.

Mr. Speaker, if this is the case, it is more by accident than design. I think what has happened here—and I think it is necessary for us to face it rather frankly—is that this has been growing like Topsy. In fact, the Robarts plan anticipated that you were going to have two courses in each of the streams, one of which would go through grade 13 to the university, the other one of which would go through grade 12, either to the technological institutes for post-secondary training, or directly to the labour force.

The fact of the matter is that events have been marching so quickly in the intervening four years—three years it is; four years by 1966—that the Robarts plan has become out of date in terms of being able to meet needs, because a gap was emerging. On the one hand, there is an increasing tendency for our technological institutes to require grade 13, rather than grade 12; and secondly, as the hon. Minister indicated almost with a note of surprise in his voice, following his visit to California, that he was astounded to discover the extent to which there is a consistent demand on the part of industry for at least junior college graduates, not high school graduates.

In other words, we were running into a gap beyond grade 12, even in terms of the technological institutes, and also in terms of the growing proportion of our young people who required post-secondary training before they could effectively cope in the labour market. Clearly, we must do something to fill this gap. So the community colleges have been introduced as a new system which is going to gradually develop across the whole province. I think one should have no illusions that it is going to take a fair amount of time before it will develop across the whole province, so you are going to have a rather serious gap for a number of years. That is the first point to which I would like to draw attention.

Second, Mr. Speaker, there is this controversial issue that the hon. leader of the Opposition has referred to—the question of whether or not the community colleges are going to be dead ends in terms of educational opportunity, or to what extent they will lead to further education at the university level. It is interesting to note that as far as the university presidents are concerned, they argued almost for a dead end—that the community college would be an alternative to the university, but to the extent that there would be an opportunity for young people to go from the community college to the university. It would be on an ad hoc basis, each case to be judged on its own merits. The council of university staffs in the province of Ontario, significantly, disputed this. They felt that it should be on something of a more clearly defined basis.

I think it is interesting to look at the specific recommendations that they made. They said:

We think, however, that there should be a clearly announced policy about transfer, for we see certain disadvantages in leaving it up to the university admission committees to deal with them on an individual basis.

They then refer to a comment of the report of the grade 13 study committee and they say:

We agree with that committee's view that grade 12, plus two years of community college, should not be rated any higher than grade 13 matriculation year. This being so, we see no great difficulty in the universities agreeing on and announcing a policy of admitting to first year—of such courses as do not absolutely require a knowledge of certain subjects at matriculation level—students who had completed two years community college with a certain proportion of academic subjects, and of a high standard of achievement in their community college work. The standard required should be known. It should not be so high that only the occasional person can meet it, nor so low that half or even a quarter of the students would meet it. We suppose that not more than ten per cent would be the “late bloomers” for whom this route to the university it is intended to provide.

Interestingly enough, the hon. Minister, in that supremely adept way that he operates when he is dealing with a controversial issue, has come to no conclusion at all. He has handed it to a committee.

Hon. W. G. Davis (Minister of Education): But I referred to the fact of the association brief on page 28, where I have set forth the principle of establishing some recognized criteria for admission.

Mr. MacDonald: Very good. I appreciate the hon. Minister's interjection and clarification on that. I had forgotten that he had made specific reference and the conclusion that one might draw from that reference. I think it is imperative, in trying to decide at what point one comes down in this argument between—if I may put it in personalities—the Bissells and the Rosses—in the direction of not raising barriers for the “late bloomers,” so-called, to go on to universities. I am content to leave the matter rest there in the hope that the personnel of such a committee will be balanced enough that we can be certain that we come out with the conclusion that I judge the hon. Minister is seeking. That I would support. Another point that I think is rather serious and that we should give some consideration to is one to which I made passing reference in discussion on first reading. The hon. Minister saw fit, perhaps for political reasons—in the more acceptable use of that term, namely, relationships with the universities and a lot of other groups—to suggest that we were not going to be invaded by any alien institutions, or the introduction of alien institutions as part of our educational set-up, and that the junior college in the United States perhaps was not worthy of emulation.

I will be the first to say that there are some things about junior colleges in the United States that should not be emulated. I have for some time wondered whether we were not being a little smug in our attitude towards them, the greater democratic opportunities for education that they have provided, and that there were not some factors that would be worthy of emulation and integration into our new community college set-up. Indeed, I am wondering if the hon. Minister, as I intimated on the first reading, does not himself concur, and if he has not left the door wide open. For example, on page 29 of the mimeographed version of his statement, I quote:

Moreover, I have no doubt that where circumstances warrant it, some of our universities will make arrangements with particular colleges of applied arts and technology, as provided in the proposed legislation, to conduct one or two years of their own degree courses within these colleges. The present university extension courses leading to a general arts degree might be a logical beginning point.

Mr. Speaker, I suggest that this may be the way in which, over the years, we are going to reconcile this. There is one point in the basic case that has been presented by the university presidents, which I think does not really stand up to analysis, and that is the argument that we have provided for enough university spaces for the foreseeable future in the province of Ontario. Indeed, in this they are only parroting what the government has said, and they are using this argument on which to base their case that since this is so, why then do we need to give consideration to any significant number of two-year university places in the community colleges?

However, Mr. Speaker, I think we are ignoring the fact that the figures upon which we have based our expansion for universities, and the number of university places throughout the 1970s, are based on a calculation which anticipates that by 1971 we will have reached a stage where approximately 20 per cent of the age group of 18 to 21 is attending our universities. The fact of the matter is, that in the United States, 43 per cent, I understand, attends universities or junior colleges.

Hon. Mr. Davis: No, that is not right. There is quite a distinction; I will explain it in my reply. There is a major difference.

Mr. MacDonald: Just let me for one moment underline the point that I want to make to the hon. Minister, and I will do it from a source that I am sure he will consider to be unimpeachable, namely, Dr. Robert W. B. Jackson. In his speech to the central educational association convention in Quebec City, in September 1963 he made this point:

As a matter of fact, admission requirements have been steadily raised to the point where, for some universities, up to 40 per cent of the candidates acceptable in my time are now being excluded, including outright rejection of myself, and university authorities have openly stated their intention of raising entrance requirements and standards for each year to even higher levels, understandably enough, perhaps, in view of the increases in knowledge during my lifetime.

In other words, as was pointed out by the Globe and Mail in one of its editorials on community colleges, the only reason why our universities have been able to cope with the population explosion at their level, is that they have been raising standards. This is disputed sometimes, but as a matter of fact, I do not think it can be disputed. Here is Dr. Jackson frankly stating that the standards today are such that would exclude 40 per cent of the people who could have got into university when he was entering, and they would have excluded him. As I said on an earlier occasion, two or three years ago, for reasons with which I will not bother entertaining the House, they would have excluded me too.

Dr. Jackson goes one step further. If we have these pressures, as undoubtedly they will develop, on universities not to close their doors, but to leave them open as much as possible to every student who is going to be capable of absorbing a university education, then we are going to be driven beyond having 20 per cent in our universities—which was set as the objective in the calculations of Dr. Jackson for 1971—toward the 43 per cent, or whatever it is, in the United States. This simply brings us to the conclusion, Mr. Speaker, that it is quite possible that our universities are not going to be able to cope with the number of students seeking a university education.

Indeed, I will say without any reservation that in my chatting with the university presidents, a significant number of them said they believe what I have just stated. The general argument of the government, and the general argument on which the university presidents' case is predicated, is that we will be able to accommodate all who are likely to go to university, but it simply is not the case.

Mr. Speaker, if this is what is likely to happen, then I think we are going to discover sooner than we think that universities are not going to be able to cope with the flood of students, and will resort to the escape that the hon. Minister has put in the bill, where they can make arrangements with colleges of applied arts and technology to conduct one or two years of their degree courses within those colleges. Quite frankly, Mr. Speaker, if it is done under this kind of situation, in effect an affiliation of the liberal arts, or the arts wing of the community college with a certain university, it seems to me that one can protect the desired standards. We could make certain that we are not going to have an ersatz university, as the term has come to be used in reference to the community colleges. I think we could protect the standards ultimately that will carry through from those students into the universities themselves.

Therefore, I venture the prediction that in the years to come, the kind of pattern that will emerge because of the pressure on our universities because of the number of students who will be demanding an opportunity for education at that level, will force us to make use of this escape. If, in the meantime, the community colleges have become firmly established in the field of providing what is the most desperate need, namely, a post-secondary education at the technical and the technological level, we will end up ten, or 15, or 20, or 25 years from now with balanced institutions. They will not be so oriented to the technical side that they will lose an appreciation, and a transmitting to others of that appreciation of the liberal arts that the hon. leader of the Opposition was referring to. They will become institutions that will assist all our communities across the province of Ontario, those communities that are out in what some people rather unkindly refer to as the cultural wastelands, far away from the cultural opportunities normally to be found in the larger cities.

There is one further point that I would like to raise and seek some specific comment on from the hon. Minister. Let me make it first by referring to a couple of observations in his introductory comments. He said:

Our efforts here could, I suppose, be considered also as a co-ordination and culmination of all previous work in this area, a welding into a coherent whole, so to speak, of the parts which sometimes seem fragmented and unrelated so that we have a complete system extending from kindergarten to the post-graduate level.

I should have stated this comment was made in particular reference to the vocational centres and the technological institutes—and other institutions of post-secondary education at the technical and technological level.

He also stated on page 25:

We must decide what part our present institutes of technology, and trade and vocational centres will play in the new plan. It may well be that the provincial council of regents will recommend the complete integration of existing institutions and effort, using the present buildings, staff and programmes as nuclei for the development of the new colleges.

What, in effect, the hon. Minister has said is that we have in this growing-like-Topsy development of the last few years—incidentally, a very belated development, long after it was needed in the province of Ontario—of technological institutes, to the point where we now have eight of various kinds across the province of Ontario; of vocational centres to the extent that we have two, and the prospect of a third one emerging in the Soo and one sort of emerging in conjunction with the rebuilt institute in Hamilton.

The significant thing, Mr. Speaker, is that these vocational centres are a new name for an old idea—a trade school. I concede a broader concept than the original trade school, but as I have so often said in this House, the trade school development in the province of Ontario was envisaged by Dr. John Seath in the first decade of this century. The legislation authorizing it was passed in 1911. We built one trade school in the succeeding 50 years, until the kind of programme that I am talking about began to emerge—technological institutes and vocational centres.

I was interested in some of the news stories that emerged, and were somewhat more enlightening—if I may say so to the hon. Minister—than his original comment, in that they suggested, for example, that the first of the community colleges might well be centred around the vocational centres or the technological institutes in various places. Indeed, I think it was suggested that the first six or eight might be in those communities where these institutions are now to be found. This seems to suggest, and I do not know why there should be any particular hesitation on the hon. Minister's side to be rather frank on this, that what is happening now is that we are going to forget the vocational centres programme as originally envisaged as a separate system across the province of Ontario, and we are going to forget the technological institutes as they were envisaged as a separate system across the province of Ontario; all of them are going to be integrated into a single institution, with these various facets in one large campus—conceivably, a number of campuses—within a single city.

If this is what the hon. Minister has in mind, if I am correctly interpreting the comment that I quoted, this strikes me as plain common sense.

We have been going through a really unplanned development of recent years. We have been rushing madly to catch and keep up with the needs after neglecting for generations the provision of technological education. If we got off to a start of vocational centres to realize, two generations late, the concept of Dr. John Seath, broadened because of the needs of the second half of the 20th century, and if we really got started rather late in the technological institutes, now is the time to wrap it all up in a more integrated kind of fashion. If this is what is envisaged in the community colleges, once again I personally look forward to their development in this province with a great deal of enthusiasm.

I have one final point that I would like to raise, more in the form of a question, seeking the comments of the hon. Minister. That is the point that was raised in the second editorial of the Globe and Mail in comment on community colleges—with regard to what they describe as the portability of the credits which you can get from these various institutions. Once again we are developing almost on a day-to-day or year-to-year basis with these institutions; we are having difficulty in establishing the portability of credits from institutions within our own province. What are the transfer arrangements, for example, going to be from a community college to a university? But this is a country in which our people move frequently from province to province, and it is desirable that we should have as great a mobility of labour at all levels as is possible. Therefore, we should have some clarification, as soon as possible, of the standards of these various institutions in all of the various provinces—particularly when we have such significant variations emerging in the western provinces as community colleges which, by statute have been fixed with the responsibility of providing the first two years of university, something which in Ontario is fought pretty vigorously by the university presidents, so that the hon. Minister has to go through this compromise transition period. I predict we will ultimately end up pretty close to what they have out in BC and what they have in many junior colleges on the American side of the line.

I would appreciate it if the hon. Minister would make some comments on that particular point. There are other details; perhaps we can get to them in committee.

Mr. R. F. Nixon (Brant): Mr. Speaker, when the hon. Minister introduced this bill it was hailed as a historic landmark. I believe that it eventually will be recognized as such. With this in view, we will support his recommendations as far as we now understand them in the introduction of the bill.

But I must say that I am a bit disappointed in my understanding of the new institutions as they are presented in the bill, and in the further explanation given to it by the hon. Minister. As you know, sir, the new institutions were long heralded. I remember reading in several newspapers the report from the hon. Minister's press conference in late November, in which he said that a statement of policy on these community colleges would be available within two or three months. I suppose that is more a commentary on some of the difficulties that arose while he was not only drafting the statute, but getting his own thoughts in line with those that would be adaptable to the many pressures that are exerted on the hon. Minister. We now see the hon. Minister in much the same position as the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Stewart) indicated I was in a few moments ago. Although he is not riding two horses, he is riding one very firmly, but his feet are touching on both sides, because he has certainly given provision in this bill for courses that would be equivalent to university courses if, in fact, some arrangement can be made with an established university. I am rather disappointed that no university president or any authority at this level has come forward and said they would look forward to doing this in conjunction with the community colleges when they are established. As far as I know, there has been no comment on this; all we know is that the general feeling on behalf of the academic community at the university level is that these new institutions should be left with only applied arts and, in fact, not encroach on the academic preserves of the university in any way.

My hon. leader a moment ago said something about the naming of the institutes and the fact that using the word "applied" would indicate the general point of view that the hon. Minister at the present time has towards the institutions. I feel his point is well taken. By using the word "applied" he is, at least in the beginning, hamstringing the development of these institutions, so that the academic life within them will be something less than it might be. I have a special axe to grind, I suppose, but I have felt that "community colleges" was a rather cumbersome name—in fact, even a bit precious, if I am using the word correctly as the hon. leader of the NDP has used it in the past. Although I may be accused of having a vested interest in it, I would suggest that these institutions might be called Ontario colleges, and I would look forward to the day when there would be an Ontario college at Brantford; if anybody wanted to shorten that they could call it Brantford College. I hope the hon. Minister will look into that possibility rather carefully.

Speaking of a community like Brantford—and there are many of them across the province—the hon. Minister's intimation in the press conference that the first community colleges would be established around an already existing nucleus would mean that these communities would once again be passed over for a period of time that might, I submit, go up to six years and perhaps more before the funds would be available. I understand it would require $6,000,000 to establish a new college before the funds would be available to make the system properly available, as it should be, to the citizens right across the province.

While I am on this point, it has already been mentioned that there are certain drawbacks to the fact that the community colleges might actually gather together all these sundry chickens in the educational field, either parallel to secondary education or post-secondary. In this connection, my understanding was that both of the vocational centres would take students who had shown some adaptability in the occupational courses. I know the hon. Minister does not want anything in his system to be termed terminal, and I presume that if a student shows some merit in an occupational course it would be quite possible for him to go on to the vocational centre. I remember visiting the one at London some weeks ago with the educational committee. Although most of the classes we visited had students who had junior matriculation, I was informed that there were facilities for younger students and students with much lower academic qualifications. I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, that it would be very difficult indeed to use these sundry institutions to form a community college if the intention is that these students with lower qualifications would be permitted to enter. I suppose some other accommodation would have to be made for those; that is quite possible.

I was very impressed with the vocational centre in London; a beautiful building, and I was impressed with the work that was going on there. I thought at the time that it might well be adapted to some more extensive application, but there is this difficulty that I wanted to bring to your attention, sir.

In the hon. Minister's remarks introducing the bill, it was quite clear that college parallel courses would be excluded and the emphasis would be on applied arts, where arts subjects appear. Some compensation for this was found in the possibility that universities could take part in a more or less separate programme, in an individual college. Then the hon. Minister went on to use a weasel expression; an expression that carried with it an attempt to rationalize what in fact was a decision on the community colleges, that they would not lead to universities and that in fact, they would be terminal institutions.

He said that no student of ability would ever be denied the opportunity to continue, and this was met by thunderous applause in this Legislature. I well remember reading a similar statement made by the president of the University of Toronto, when he said that at the present time, no student of merit from Ryerson institute is denied the opportunity to continue his education even into the University of Toronto.

But the fact remains that the hon. Minister has said that no parallel courses will be presented, and it would indeed be a rare student who would be able to self-educate himself at the same time as he was taking some other course at the community college, and in fact, pull himself up by the boot straps to the point where his ability would be recognized by the authorities at the community college and by the registrar of some university. I think this would be very difficult indeed, and as a matter of fact, I feel that a great disservice would be done if this Legislature were to establish the community colleges with this terminal aspect in mind.

It is not enough to say piously that no student with ability will be denied an opportunity to continue. There has to be a clear pathway, whereby these students can take a course that will lead them to placement in university.

If these institutions are going to be established across the province, and we must assume that in time they will, there are going to be many people who would otherwise be denied, perhaps not for valid reasons, but denied all the same, the opportunity for academic post-secondary education. We are going to be dealing with what has been called first generation students, whose parents, for economic and other reasons, had not gone nearly so far in the academic process as they would have done at this time. These people are going to be forced, I would say, into the community college system, through the fact that the institute will be close to home and it would obviously be cheaper to go there. They will lose the opportunity for higher academic work that we would hope would be made available to them.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to say something about staffing difficulties in the new institutions. The hon. Minister mentioned these. He said he recognized the problem and certainly did not dispose of it with those words. I know he did not intend to give the impression that it was disposed of, but there is no doubt about it that the specialists at the high-school level, already in short supply, are going to be attracted to the community colleges and it is doubtful whether a properly high standard of instruction can be maintained if, as the hon. Minister suggests, people in the community itself, without any training in teaching techniques are going to be called upon to fill the breach, as it were, in staffing these organizations.

It seems to me that if there were a parallel academic curriculum offered, the suggested trimester system that is already coming into some use in our university community, might well be used to upgrade the community colleges, by having some of the professors at the university level spend a third of the year at the community college, to give this haven of academic capability that would really give the new proposed institutes the academic background and environment that the students must be permitted to take part in.

Another point I would like to bring to your attention, Mr. Speaker, has to do with the fees. It was indicated by the hon. Minister that a nominal fee would be charged. If a graduate of grade 12, who has the option of going into the matriculation year, or grade 13, as it probably would be called for some time, and who takes this option would pay no fee under the present circumstances, and I doubt very much if the hon. Minister would contemplate charging a fee. On the other hand, if he takes the easier course, and goes to the community college, as the hon. Minister has said, there would be a fee chargeable and I would think that this is surely something that is not reasonable or consistent and it is something that the hon. Minister might reconsider.

I feel myself that we have been giving 13 grades of instruction at no direct charge to the students of Ontario, and that it is time this was extended to 14 years, which would permit the instruction at the community college to be given without any direct fee. I hope that the hon. Minister would consider this seriously. Now, I do not feel myself in a position to come down on both sides of the important issue that we are discussing. I feel, without any equivocation on my part, that the community colleges must be constituted with an academic parallel course that would in no sense make them terminal and would in fact give every student who decides to make this choice, an opportunity to go through the community college system and receive, if he is successful, advanced placement at university.

I feel that we are, in this bill, setting up what I might call a caste system in education. There is the feeling in some academic circles that there must always be an intellectual aristocracy. I am not ready to admit that tonight. We have heard of the hewers of wood and drawers of water. I submit that this bill will leave this group intact. They will now be able to hew the wood with power saws and draw the water with complex pumps, but essentially they will be the servers in the community, those who have not had the experience of real academic achievement, or even exposure to an academic community.

With this in mind, I feel that we may be creating an institution of perhaps practical accomplishment, but intellectual apathy, and I would trust that the hon. Minister might make some reconsiderations in his position on that account.

Mr. B. Newman (Windsor-Walkerville): Mr. Speaker, my comments on this bill will not be very lengthy, but having had the opportunity to visit the junior colleges in the state of California, and likewise in the state of Michigan, I had my eyes opened. I hope that in the application of this new method of education, we take the better features that are present in the California and the Michigan systems.

I was most impressed with the fact that the graduates of the California system of junior colleges, or community colleges as they are known, do have the opportunity to attend the universities. The junior colleges work on a Bell curve system so that one-eighth of the students—the top eighth—is accepted at the university level after having completed two years of the junior college. The top third may go to state colleges and these students go right into the third-year programme in both the state university or the state college.

They are not held back a year or two, as may be the case with the setup as is contemplated at present by this bill. In Ontario this is primarily a result of the bypassing of the academic phase of education.

The graduates of the junior colleges in the United States, after having completed their university education, found that they were just as well qualified and were as great a success in later years as were those who attended the universities directly from high schools, bypassing the junior or community college. Another fairly good feature—I hope this is adopted in the Ontario system—is that any individual over 18 years of age is eligible to attend junior college in California. They are given admittance provided their standings for the first semester are satisfactory. If they are not satisfactory then they have to drop out for one semester and are allowed a second chance. Were they to fail a second time, they would drop out for two semesters, and so forth. Naturally, an individual who would drop out for two semesters, more than likely would not return to the junior college. He would realize his limitations and get into some type of industry.

The California system did give the opportunity to the late bloomer to further his education. We in Ontario are in a hodge-podge when it comes to post-secondary education. As it is today, we have a grade 13; we have the junior colleges which will be two years of post-secondary; we will have the institutes of technology which will be three years; and then we will have the university course of four years. There should be a little more clear-cut definition and reappraisal of the purpose of each of these various facets or schools of education.

There is another phase of education that should be taken into consideration in the junior colleges, and some provisions should be made for it. I do not know whether it would go into junior college level; it may go into the institute of technology. That would be the retraining or the scheduling of programme five. An individual attending programme five should be given the same opportunity to further his education and complete his education and eventually obtain admittance into a Canadian university. I prefer the name of junior college to either community college or applied arts and technology, because this college actually is a junior college, it is not a full-fledged, four-year college; it is only half-way there.

It is hoped by many that the government will consider, as my colleague the hon. member for Brant has mentioned, a little further stress on the academic side of education, so that the individual attending this junior college does not find himself attending a terminal type of education as we have today in the four-year programme—the two-year, the three-year and the four-year programmes in our secondary schools.

Mr. Speaker, this is the limit of my comments on this bill.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Perhaps I might reply to this very briefly to sum up the observations raised by hon. members opposite. I might say that the statement I read initially to this House was the subject of very careful preparation by several people over a fairly substantial period of time. Because one of the hon. members opposite suggested that we were endeavouring to come down between positions taken by groups or by individuals, I want to suggest, Mr. Speaker, that this is not the case. We are taking a position that we believe to be academically correct; we believe it to be educationally sound. It is not a case of endeavouring to come down between positions of any individuals or any groups.

I should further point out that as for the question of name—I am not sure how significant it is—it was felt that we should adopt a name suitable for our own province. The term junior college did not, in fact, accomplish what we envisaged. We felt that the term community college did not encompass what we envisaged with these new institutions, and so the name college of applied arts and technology prefixed—of course, by the name of the region that it would serve—perhaps came as close to suggesting the concept of this institution as we could come.

I would point out to the hon. leader of the Opposition that I think his phrase, when he referred to the university presidents living in “ivy-towered ghettos,” is perhaps somewhat unfortunate. I think I should point out, Mr. Speaker, that the university presidents and the academic people have a genuine interest in and genuine concern about the development of an institution of this nature in this province. I think it is proper that their views should not only be heard but should be very carefully considered.

I would also point out, Mr. Speaker, that the study of this particular type of institution has been going on for some two years now. While we have been definitely assisted by the representations that have been made to the department, I want to assure the House that the concept and the overall statement of policy reflect the policy of this government. I think it is one that, over a period of time, will certainly stand the test.

I want to refer to the comments from the hon. member for York South, Mr. Chairman. I think he grasped one of the unique features, and I do not recall using the term alien in my remarks when referring to the American junior college, or community college, system. What I attempted to do was explain that we wanted to develop something in Ontario that suited the needs of this province; it was not a case of a pure importation of the junior college, because if you look at the junior college carefully and its traditional history in the United States, hon. members will find out that it is changing from primarily—the hon. member for Brant will be interested in this later on—primarily an academic institution to more of an institution that gives a composite or comprehensive type of programme. I think the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville must have observed this in his trip to California.

The unique aspect is the possibility of an agreement with an existing university to offer in the college the same programme that is offered in the university itself. I think this is important, Mr. Speaker, because there is a misunderstanding about the parallel course. I might as well get into this now, because I am somewhat disappointed to hear the hon. member for Brant say that he does not appreciate the significance of the parallel course, and the problem that we face here within our own province. The parallel course in most American jurisdictions—and I distinguished this from the transfer course—is the same course that is offered at the university itself. Take the state of California; this is perhaps as good an example of an American jurisdiction as could be chosen. I should point out that they have had community colleges or junior colleges—they use both terms there—for some 50 years, Mr. Speaker, and they are still the subject of substantial debate.

The University of California, which is the state university, is obliged—I cannot recall whether it is under statute or under regulation—to accept 11.2 per cent of the high school graduates from grade 12. They have no grade 13. The students entering the junior college, in many instances, have the same qualifications. In fact, we were told that in some cases they had even greater, or better, qualifications than the students entering the University of California. So the question of movement from one institution to the other is relatively simple, because they offer more or less the same type of course. The authorities there, over the years, built their system on the basis of the state university accepting a small percentage of the total graduates who are qualified to go to the university. Therefore the junior college system has grown in the state of California in order to accommodate the vast numbers of students who could not get into university. In our own province here—and I have made a point of this—our plans are in fairly good shape until 1970—I state that if it is necessary to change the concept to handle the 1970s we will do so immediately, but the present planning in this province is to accommodate as close to 100 per cent of the qualified students as we can within the university itself.

Let us take a concrete example, Mr. Speaker. Take the city of Toronto. Let us be very frank about this. Ryerson, certainly at one stage—whether it has gone beyond this stage I am not sure at this point; this will require further study, but certainly Ryerson, at one stage, if one were to add academic content to the course—such as the liberal arts programme and perhaps one or two other related areas—is as close to a prototype of an excellent community college as you will find anywhere south of the border. If one were to add to this institution, a university parallel course—and this is what the hon. member for Brant is suggesting—one would have students taking the same work at Ryerson polytechnical institute as they are taking at the University of Toronto, with perhaps a duplication of facilities or an unnecessary expenditure of funds.

There is just no purpose in having a parallel programme in many areas of this province where the university is in existence, and I want the hon. member for Brant to understand this. This would be almost an identical programme, where the existing university is in a position to accommodate the number of graduates who are coming out of the high schools. The high schools are, and I think will remain for many years, the prime preparatory institution for the universities. I think this is essential to our system. When one gets into the question of transferability, one can get into many permutations and combinations as to how this is to be achieved; one can take grade 11, grade 12, even grade 13 graduates, and this is why I am suggesting that a committee must be established to lay out some recognized pattern of movement from the community college or the college of applied arts and technology to the university. But these are students, Mr. Speaker, who probably do not fall under the qualification of being qualified grade 13 graduates.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. Minister a question?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Yes.

Mr. Nixon: He has made definite the difference between "transfer" and "parallel" in his original statement when he emphasized the fact that there would be no parallel courses in the colleges. The meaning I took from that was that there would be no courses permitting a person to go from one institution to the other. If he would permit me, my understanding was somewhere between his meaning of parallel and what he has also said in referring to transfers.

Hon. Mr. Davis: I think this is essential, Mr. Speaker, and I am glad the hon. member for Brant will give a little in this area because the question of movement from the college of applied arts and technology is important. The recommendation that the hon. member for York South read from the academic brief is the one that we really have adopted as far as our concept is concerned—that there must be a recognized pattern and that an ad hoc acceptance of an individual student by the university is not in itself acceptable. There must be some recognized pattern. I think we are talking about perhaps ten or 12 per cent, perhaps, of these young people, while this is very, very early to judge. This is the area of transferability or progression from one institution to the other on which I am sure we can all agree.

But about the completely parallel programme, I suggest to the hon. member that if he studies it carefully, he will accept the fact that we do not need in Ontario, at the moment, a parallel programme per se.

Mr. Nixon: I hesitate to do this and you can rule me out of order perhaps—

Hon. Mr. Davis: No, no, I want it very clear—

Mr. Nixon: Just one question. When the hon. Minister talks about parallelism and transfer courses and the fact that he is going to select perhaps ten or 12 per cent of those students—

Hon. Mr. Davis: I am not selecting, I am just saying that this could be—

Mr. Nixon: —that these people will be selected in some way, that they will continue. Surely there must be some sort of course at the community college which they can take. They are not going to be picked right out of an electronic lab or something and be told, "You are the kind of person we want because you have shown that you are a hard worker." There has to be some sort of course that I would call parallel—perhaps the hon. Minister would call it something else.

Hon. Mr. Davis: No. Mr. Speaker, let us take a student who goes to high school, completes his grade 12, goes out to work for a period of time, wishes to go back for some further education, but feels the secondary school is no longer the place for him because of age. He goes back to the community college. At this institution he is able to pick up whatever the appropriate amount of work would be, and through a recognized path, move on to the university. But the parallel programme, if you had it, Mr. Speaker, would be the exact duplicate of the first year, or the first and second year, of the regular university programme.

Mr. Nixon: What name is the hon. Minister going to give to the other one he described, then?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, there is no name being given to it.

Mr. Nixon: That is our trouble.

Hon. Mr. Davis: We cannot use the word "transfer," really, because even in the U.S. the popular conception of the transfer course even could mean a duplication of the university programme. We are concerned about the students who really do not have the qualifications at this stage to get to university; we want to assist them within this new college. I think it is very important we recognize this.

We feel there may be areas in this province where it may be necessary in the future, as the hon. member for York South points out, to have the identical university programme available at these institutions, and this is a unique feature—we did not find this anywhere in our trips south of the border—that we have introduced into this particular piece of legislation. We think there are actually one or two areas in the province where this might have application at this present time.

I would like to make one observation on the question of percentages. The hon. member for York South is quite correct, we hope to have roughly 20 per cent of the age group, say 19 to 25, in the universities by 1970. Whether we will achieve this it is early to guess, but this is our hope.

The universities in the United States, we think, at the present time, have approximately 24 per cent of the same age group in universities, but the figures that are used by the U.S. schools will include the junior college, which is the equivalent perhaps of our grade 13, and in some instances equivalent to our grade 11. So the hon. member for York South has to take the age group, say 19 to 25, to find out the percentages that are in post-secondary institutions. There is some debate even within U.S. circles as to whether the 24 per cent figure is in itself accurate. We do not know. But this is probably as close an approximation as we can reach, and in discussing this with some of their eminent authorities I would say they expect they will maintain this 22 to 24 per cent average for some number of years.

They are moving now into the comprehensive programme within their community colleges because they have discovered this is really where there is a substantial need. If we look carefully at the history of the development of junior colleges and community colleges in the United States, we see that they are moving rather rapidly from the almost straight academic approach to the composite or comprehensive approach, to include technician training and technologist training—and I will get into this in my estimates of The Department of Education, but we may find this filtering down into actual secondary school programmes as well.

I think it very important that we realize that really the figure is probably close to 24 per cent in the United States, and this figure is probably close to eight per cent in the United Kingdom. We are now somewhere between 12 and 14, the U.S. is at 22 to 24, the United Kingdom is probably in the neighbourhood of between eight and ten.

Two or three other questions were raised, one on the matter of staff. We discovered this, Mr. Speaker, in our research in these other jurisdictions, that in fact people can, particularly in the technology field, come from industry and immediately move into the teaching area. California has many highly qualified people, because of the type of industry there, who come on the basis of perhaps two or three hours a week to lecture in these rather complex fields and it has been found that this works out satisfactorily. But I do not minimize for a moment the difficulties that we shall face as far as staffing these institutions is concerned. I can think of several other difficulties and, Mr. Speaker, if I had waited until they had all been resolved, we would not have had this bill here for many years. I think we accept the fact that this type of institution is absolutely necessary and we recognize the difficulties we face and accept these, and move onward to try to solve the problems.

I hope, Mr. Speaker, that I have covered most of the points raised by the—

Mr. Nixon: Would the hon. Minister say something about the fees?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I have to take issue on the question of fees as it relates to the free year of grade 13. I think an essential part of this new concept is that the community colleges be regarded as institutions of integrity and stature. They are not to be regarded as second-rate institutions or excuses for universities; they are to stand on their own feet.

One might successfully argue that we should eliminate all fees for education, but I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that as long as there are fees for universities, as long as there are fees for institutions such as Ryerson, this new concept and new type of institution should be treated in like manner.

As I suggested in my remarks, the fees themselves are modest. The students will be eligible for bursaries and for federal student loans, so we question whether the financial obligations on any student would, in any way, deter him from attending. We question this very definitely.

Mr. Nixon: The fees are there just to give stature.

Hon. Mr. Davis: No, this is not the principle, just to give stature. We feel the colleges should be treated as other post-secondary institutions are at present treated, and if I can leave no other message with hon. members of the House, this is really essential to the new concept of these colleges. That is, they must be recognized as institutions on their own basis, institutions of integrity, and I think, institutions of very significant stature.

There is some question about the cost and whether we should approach Ottawa on a 100 per cent basis. I can assure hon. members, Mr. Speaker, that the question of cost has been very thoroughly explored with the officials in Ottawa and if the hon. leader of the Opposition wishes to add his own efforts toward Ottawa's paying 50 per cent of the total cost of the development of these institutions, I would be most grateful.

Motion agreed to; second reading of the bill.

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we will resume the debate on Bill No. 136, which will be followed by the estimates of The Department of Education.

Hon. Mr. Robarts moves the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

TUESDAY, JUNE 1, 1965

The House met at 2 o'clock, p.m.

Prayers.

Mr. Speaker: Presenting petitions.

Presenting reports by committees.

Mr. D. A. Evans (Simcoe Centre), from the standing committee on labour, legal and municipal bills, presented the committee's sixth report which was read as follows and adopted:

Your committee begs to report the following bill with certain amendments:

Bill 146, An Act to amend The Municipal Act.

Mr. R. Brunelle (Cochrane North): Mr. Speaker, I beg leave to present the interim report of the select committee on mining, copies of which are being placed on the hon. members' desks.

As the House is aware, the mining committee was established on May 8, 1964, with very broad terms of reference, which enabled us to probe into many matters not directly related to actual mining operations. Of the many briefs received to date, some were received by mail and others were presented in person. Though all of these dealt with subjects related to the mining industry, many also reflected concern about matters affecting the welfare of the people residing in mining communities.

The members of the committee appreciated the broad terms of reference which allowed them to examine every phase of the mining industry. Of all the natural resources with which Ontario has been endowed, I think hon. members will agree with me that our mineral wealth is to be envied. The people of Ontario can be justifiably proud of the fact that our mining industry has become one of the major world suppliers of many metals. Few Canadian industries have as long a history as mining, and many men prominent in the development of our mining industry and its laws have sat in this House. For instance, James Conmee, a former mayor of Port Arthur and a member for the riding then known as Algoma West, had an undying faith in the future of mining in northern Ontario. Mr. Conmee can hold claim to being the father of The Mining School Act, and in 1894 he became the first president of the Ontario mining institute.

These few historical facts have long been forgotten by the Legislature and by those in the mining industry. Today the mineral industry ranks second only to agriculture in our economy. I predict, Mr. Speaker, that in our lifetime we will see mining reach the top position.

Select committees are, by their very nature, dependent upon others for information and assistance. This committee is indebted to mining companies and associations, municipalities, service organizations and many others for their splendid co-operation in arranging for us to tour mining properties, plants, mills and the various town sites. In June, 1964, we were fortunate in acquiring the services of Mr. George J. Mason as secretary of the mining committee. Mr. Mason has had many years of experience in government service and his administrative ability has proved to be a valuable contribution to our committee. In January of this year, William D. J. Hunter, associate professor of economics at McMaster University, was retained to act as consultant and adviser to the committee in matters related to the economics of mining.

We frequently called upon the services of the various departments of government for information and technical guidance. A special word of gratitude is extended to the Hon. George C. Wardrope, Minister of Mines, whose open-door policy enabled the committee to make full use of various branches of his department. The hon. Minister also arranged for departmental geologists to accompany the committee on its field trips, to act as consultants. On behalf of the committee I want to express our special appreciation to Mr. Donald Douglass, deputy Minister of Mines; Dr. M. E. Hurst, director of the geological branch; and Mr. Ralph Scott, director of the mining lands branch, who were most co-operative and helpful in providing information and technical advice.

During 1964, the committee held public hearings in eastern and northeastern Ontario. To date, we have not yet visited the vast territory of northwestern Ontario, although we have had correspondence indicating that several mining companies located in the area are most anxious to present briefs to this committee.

The many factors affecting the economics of mining have yet to be examined by the committee. Studies of this nature are presently under way and some months will be required to analyze them.

Mr. Speaker, there is still much work to be done by this committee. In our interim report, you will find listed the many subjects being studied. In contrast, you will note that we have made but three recommendations, since much of the information we require is not yet available. I am satisfied with our accomplishments to date which are due largely to the co-operation I have received from the members of this committee who represent all parties. I am proud of the interest and dedication displayed by them in their sincere determination to make a lasting contribution toward the improvement of the mining industry in Ontario.

The committee still has much unfinished business to deal with and I respectfully request, sir, that the select committee on mining be reappointed to continue its work through 1965.

Mr. Speaker: Motions.

Introduction of bills.

CONSOLIDATED REVENUE FUND

Hon. J. N. Allan (Provincial Treasurer) moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to authorize the raising of money on the credit of the consolidated revenue fund.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Hon. J. N. Allan (Provincial Treasurer): Mr. Speaker, this bill provides for the raising of $150 million, which, together with the amounts that have been authorized and not used, is adequate for the current fiscal year.

Mr. J. P. Spence (Kent East): Mr. Speaker, I have a question to ask of the hon. Provincial Treasurer, notice of which I have given.

The question is as follows: With reference to Bill No. 144, would the hon. Minister please explain to the House why there is a tax of 5.07 per cent on domestic tobacco and only approximately two per cent on imported tobacco under this bill?

Hon. Mr. Allan: Mr. Speaker, first of all, I would like to point out that the question infers that the bill specifically discriminates between domestic and imported tobacco. This is not the case. The bill does not differentiate between domestic and imported tobacco. Indeed, this would be virtually impossible, since the large bulk of tobacco, or a very great deal of the tobacco, is blended.

In the studies leading up to the drafting of this bill, the experience of eight other provinces that tax tobacco products was considered in some detail. It was found that the modern tobacco tax Acts invariably taxed cut tobaccos on the basis of a rate per ounce. In developing our schedule of tax, the department was concerned in not reducing the rate of tax, as it is currently applied under The Retail Sales Tax Act, on higher-priced tobaccos, which incidentally, are likely to be imported. I am satisfied that the schedule as drawn up, does have this effect.

I would point out again that the bill was not intended to discriminate for or against imported tobacco and the figures cited by the hon. member are not representative of the very great bulk of tobacco sales. I would also like to mention that the entire tax formula, as set up in the bill, is expected to bring in a tax of 2.9 per cent, which approximates the rate of tax currently imposed upon tobacco products by The Retail Sales Tax Act.

Mr. Spence: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question of the hon. Minister?

This bill does not correspond with the programme that is carried out by The Department of Economics and Development, "Buy Canadian," does it, Mr. Minister?

Hon. Mr. Allan: I would point out to the hon. member that it does not discriminate against our domestic tobacco.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Clerk of the House: The seventh order. Resuming the adjourned debate on the amendment to the motion for second reading of Bill No. 136, An Act respecting medical services insurance.

Mr. F. Young (Yorkview): Mr. Speaker, in rising to participate in this debate today, I do so with a keen sense of disappointment that this government has not seen fit to follow the lead of so many other democracies around the world, and introduce a genuine medicare bill.

Over the past years, there has been a great deal of discussion all around the world, on this whole field of serving our people in the field of medicine. I have been delighted to see that my hon. friends who occupy the Liberal benches, are now willing to concede that a better bill than this could be brought about, and that a plan which has been outlined by Mr. Justice Hall, and is now in effect in Saskatchewan, should be implemented in Ontario.

I am disappointed that over the years they have not seen fit to do the job that we felt they should be doing, and they are now undertaking.

Mr. R. F. Nixon (Brant): Together we can do great things.

Mr. Young: Yes, I quite realize that together we could do great things, if that togetherness could be meaningful. The hon. member for Sudbury (Mr. Sopha) the other day, expressed his disappointment that we—

Mr. Speaker: Order, order!

Mr. S. Lewis (Scarborough West): Is Mr. Speaker against togetherness?

Mr. Speaker: I wonder if the member now would try to get on with the principle to this bill and the amendment. There are a number of principles connected with it, but I do not think the member is on any of the principles just now.

Mr. Young: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I think the principle is fairly fundamental here, but, I am just saying that I am delighted to find that these people agree with us in principle, so that in effect this is on the principle of the bill, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Nixon: Vote for our amendment then.

Mr. Young: We will vote for your amendment, because we believe that this is progress along the line that we want to see.

Over the years, Mr. Speaker, this educational process has been going on, even here, and I think we have come to the conclusion across the world that medical science can now largely meet the needs of our people. There are some fields in which we have not yet been able to find solutions. Cancer is one of them. But, by and large, for the majority of our people, and in the majority of illnesses, medical science has come to the point where it can meet the needs of our people, that when sickness occurs, we know how to handle it, and when that sickness becomes serious, emergency measures can be taken to overcome it.

One of the things which has been quoted time after time in this House, is the fact that, as Mr. Justice Hall pointed out, the gap between our knowledge and our performance must be closed. There is a very simple thing here which we ought to face up to, and we need only to ask these questions: What is the need in the field of medicine? And what are the available instruments to fill that need? As far as medical science is concerned, that need is filled, by and large. As far as financing is concerned, we have the means by which to do it.

Just this last year, we were told by the last economic survey published by this province, that the gross national product of Canada has gone up by 9.7 per cent—over $4 billion increase in our gross national product in Canada, during this past year. A plan giving us complete medical care would not cost more than a quarter of that amount. So over this past year, we have added to our nation's wealth four times what we need to put into effect a full-scale Medicare plan across this land. So the financial base is there.

Some time ago in the Financial Post, an article by J. D. McGeachey pointed out this fact—that the total of about four per cent of Britain's gross national product was used to carry out their full-scale medical plan, and this includes rebuilding their hospital system. In Canada, we are now spending something like five to six per cent of our gross national product in medical care. In other words, we are spending the money now, but we are not getting the care that we ought to have. We have the financial resources, then, to put this plan into effect. It is feasible. And then we ask the question, why these halting steps?

Time after time, hon. members of the government have told us that this is a step in the right direction. It has been called a timid step by various people, but they say it is a step.

The question we would ask is, why this halting step when it is possible to go the whole way as far as doctor and specialist bills, and part at least of our druggist bills, are concerned right now? It has been proven in one of our provinces that it is feasible, and that it is possible. Democracies around the world which are much less affluent than we are have proved that a full-scale medical plan is a possibility, and that it is feasible. So why do we in Ontario take this halting timid step at the present time?

We must recognize first of all that medical care should be a right for all our people, and this should be a financial right as well as any other kind of a right. As long as we put a financial barrier between people and medical care, then they have not that right in its true sense.

So we have proposed that a minimum premium be charged, which has been outlined by our hon. leader (Mr. MacDonald); that this be supplemented according to ability to pay; and supplemented from the general revenues of this province in certain ways. This will bring the whole Medicare plan within reach of our people, and it ought to be done immediately.

The gap which we have heard so much about is being closed for certain members of our population. We are closing the gap for the elderly and the poor, about a million of them in Ontario. But the fact is that that gap is already largely closed for these people—municipal welfare and the medical welfare plan is looking after the vast majority of these people who will be covered in this way, this million of our lowest income people who pay no income tax.

The other 800,000 will be helped in various measures if they can afford it—and we are putting up a financial barrier here—and if they ask for it. Above this is the standard contract, which amounts to what we now have, private insurance, plus the delineation of a couple of standard contracts, which, if they are bought, cannot be cancelled and which must be sold to the applicant. The risk, if there is a risk here, will be spread among the insurance carriers. In this pattern need does not become a paramount issue. The needs of our people are pushed aside.

It seems here that the needs of the insurance companies and of the doctors, assumes far more importance, Mr. Speaker, than the needs of the people of Ontario. This is indeed a dream of the insurance companies come true, but it is going to be an administrative nightmare for the province itself and for the Minister who administers it. In the hon. Minister's (Mr. Dymond's) own department, as has been pointed out, there will be many people who will be in this plan because they have less than $1,000 of taxable income. There will be others who will go to the private carriers to get their insurance. These must be sorted out. This is true right across the board, in company after company and industry after industry across this province. These people are going to be classified as those who will be helped and those who will go to private insurance companies.

I presume, Mr. Minister, through you, Mr. Speaker, that the rebate, if and when it comes, will come back to the person concerned and not to the company to supplement whatever contracts may be signed here.

Now, the machinery to administer this plan is already available and this is the part which seems incredible to me and to others. The Ontario hospital services commission will have the names of all the people of Ontario, or nearly all of them. The cards are there, the families are delineated, the cards are punched, the records are kept. It would be a very simple thing to expand that office and to put the extra tab on the cards so that these people would now be covered by medical care as well as through the hospital services commission for hospital services and for medical care. If the Medicare plan were a universal plan, this could be done and done readily. But instead of that, we are going to set up a duplicate system, across the board, with duplicate offices and duplicate costs. And the costs of this extra administration will have to be borne by the premiums and by this province.

Some of the administrative nightmare that this will present is illustrated by a case which I have tried to trace out for the benefit of the House. I have given the hero of this story my middle name with the "s" removed. My mother's family, Irish Loyalists—good Tories, I presume, in those days when they came up from the south—their name was Matthews. When I was christened they gave me for my second name, Matthews; so I am going to cut off the "s" to make it easier, and I am going to use this case. I want to trace it to the House just to show some of the problems that can be met.

This man's name is Matthew; he has a job with a small business at a low income level. He has a taxable income of $200. This means that his medical-surgical premium is $29 a year. He has no insurance, because at his income level he has found it hard to pay premiums. His employer has no union and he provides no fringe benefits, so Matthew now comes into his inheritance. He is covered by medical care by the payment of $29 a year. So he decides to pay the $29. He applies, and he gets the insurance coverage. The following year Matthew gets a part-time job to supplement his income, he earns an additional $800. This means his taxable income is now $1,000. On this he would pay $149 for his medical premium. This would be, of course, in the following year. I presume this is an administrative detail that is worked out through the income tax return.

But by the time the premium is due, the extra job has petered out, so he is back on the $200 taxable income, but now with the smaller income he has to pay the $149. True, he has had the $800 extra but that went for furniture and a little holiday which he needed desperately in trying to handle all the extra hours of work. He cannot find the $149 for the premium, so he just tries to take a chance as he had done before, and not bother with the insurance.

Then Matthew loses his job; the plant, marginal at best, closes down. It is winter and Matthew cannot find employment. Someone tells him when he applies for unemployment insurance that he is eligible for free medical coverage so he makes an application. This goes for consideration to the council set up under the Medicare bill. The council deliberates after it meets and finally recommends that Matthew and his family be placed once more in the files of the medical insurance commission.

But, in the meantime, a sickly child has had to have more attention and Matthew has had to pay the doctor himself up to this time. Maybe this would be refunded to him; at least he hoped so. Finally, Matthew finds a job, a better one this time and his wages are higher.

This put him just into the $1,000 taxable range. He is coming up in the world now. His free medical care has stopped and he is told that, by paying $149, he can carry it on with the public plan—but where is the $149 to come from? The sick child worries him and his wife. They decide that the premium must be met and they make the first payment. Then hard luck strikes again. The child dies, and he finds that not only does he have the expenses of a funeral but now one of his income tax exemptions has gone; he is above the government subsidy line and he can no longer be in the public part of the plan. He gets a polite note from the Minister that his subsidy has terminated and that he should make private arrangements for his insurance. This means $175 a year. He and his wife look at each other. The child is gone, the one who most needed attention. The rest of the family are fairly healthy. Perhaps they should let it go for a while.

Then he gets a call from an insurance man. I think he must have been from High Park, I do not know. If the government is really concerned about having everyone covered of course, they will surely release to the trade all the names of people going off the public plan. We take for granted this will happen. We do not know. The insurance man wants to call around; an appointment is set up. They discuss policies. He is told about the standard policy at $175 a year. "But I have been sick," he says. "I am in debt to the undertaker and to other people. How can I pay the $175?" The enthusiasm of the agent cools appreciably. "Well," he says, "we have other policies, cheaper ones, with less coverage, of course. You might consider one of these." But Matthew decides to wait. He cannot afford anything just now. Perhaps after a few more pay days something can be arranged.

During the following week, Matthew is deluged with insurance calls. Everyone, it seems, wants to sell him some sort of policy. Some are better than the standard, at a higher price of course; some are minimal at slightly lower rates. One persistent salesman sticks to him and finally persuades him that he has just the thing he needs. It is a policy which covers catastrophic bills. The subscriber pays the first $50 of doctor bills each year and 20 per cent of all the bills thereafter. It has some little added feature, so it will not exactly be the alternative standard contract.

Matthew is not told, but this means that the policy may be cancelled by the company at any time, as opposed to the standard policies, which are non-cancellable.

Matthew settles for a co-insurance policy. It has some protection, but he hopes that he will never have to pay those first $50 of doctor bills. So he does not go to the doctor when he develops a severe case of indigestion. He tries to cure it with baking soda, that old tried and tested remedy. It will go away soon, he thinks, because he cannot afford the medical bill.

But it does not go away. He has been worried and under severe strain for too long. Finally, his wife calls in the doctor and he is put to bed. He not only has the added medical bills, but he loses wages as well. The doctor sees him again. X-rays are needed. He has insurance, but nothing is covered. He is a statistic on the Minister of Health's records. He is one of the 83.8 per cent the hon. Minister proudly points to as already under the health umbrella of the insurance companies. But he will have to drop even that leaky umbrella, because by the time he is better and back to work, he will be still more desperate financially.

The doctor advises him to drop the insurance he has and take out the standard policy. But if he does this, there is a waiting period, and he has not the money anyway. So he worries, and that does not help his illness. Finally, his boss sends him word that if he does not get back to work, he will have to find a replacement for him. The boss is sympathetic, but he cannot carry him forever. The doctor will not let him go back. So once again Matthew is unemployed and now he can apply for 100 per cent coverage in the medical plan.

So, after the appropriate routine and card punching, the hon. Minister of Health has Matthew as a customer once again. Matthew has a right to health care now, because of his very tough luck.

A bit overdrawn? Perhaps. But this is what can happen to people on the borderline of poverty, and this is what can happen to hundreds of thousands of Ontario people under this medical care plan. The people like Matthew, who live on incomes such as this government pays to so many of its own employees, to these people an extra medical bill, or any other bill for that matter, can start a chain reaction which can spell disaster. A proper medicare plan, such as we in the New Democratic Party propose, could be afforded by every family. It could cover every citizen. The present administrative machinery handling the Ontario hospital services could be expanded to cover the medical plan. The hardship and uncertainty which the proposed Act will inflict, especially on borderline cases, would not occur.

The added expense of all this filing and counterfiling; of the checking and the policing of this incredible hodge-podge of subsidies and standard contracts will add immeasurably to costs. The duplication of staff and organization, when the Ontario hospital services commission organization could be simply and readily expanded to meet the need, is inexcusable.

The cards are there for every family, as I have noted. The names are on them. They are up to date. Yet we face the setting up of a parallel organization, with different offices, staff, machinery, a sheer duplication of costs, which must be reflected in the rates we pay. This is the reason why Mr. Justice Hall says that the private plan such as is being proposed, will cost up to 28 cents for administration, where the public plan will cost about five cents.

So I bring before this House today, this problem of administration, and I have tried to illustrate it for the benefit of the House and for the benefit of the hon. Minister.

We have a multiplicity of contracts, when a standard contract, covered by the province, would do the job. We have divided administration and multiple administration. The cost is not controlled, as has been pointed out so often, by the administrative machinery.

It is controlled in large measure by the doctors, by advertising of the private insurance companies, who will go out on a selling spree to sell plans for their own companies. Then, the means test that is set up, is bad administratively. It is going to be cumbersome, and you will find people like Matthew, moving in and out of the plan, filed and refiled, discouraged and wondering what it is all about.

This plan is being administered for the insurance companies and for the doctors, and not for the needs of the people. It is high time that we, in this province, began to think in terms of what is possible, to meet the needs of our people, in the field of medicine.

Mr. Speaker, I urge that this House support the amendment to the bill.

Mr. A. H. Cowling (High Park): Mr. Speaker, we were talking about cows and bulls yesterday, and there is something I ran across in connection with this bill, Mr. Speaker, and it reads like this:

Definitions: Socialism: You have two cows. You give one to your neighbour and keep one. Fascism. You have two cows. You keep the cows and the government takes the milk. Nazism. You have two cows. The government takes the cows and gives you the milk. New Idealism: You have two cows. The government takes both cows, shoots one, milks the other, and pours the milk down the drain. Communism. You have two cows. The government shoots you and takes both the cows. Capitalism. You have two cows. You sell one and buy a bull.

We have heard quite a bit of debate on the medical insurance bill up to date. I must say that I am not too much impressed with what the hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Thompson) had to say. As a matter of fact, I was going over his speech and he certainly is condemning the government. In one part he says:

It is almost incomprehensible that the government should have the nerve to bring in a dead-end bill like this one.

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): Read the rest of it. It is a good speech.

Mr. Cowling: Well, there is a good piece here that I think you would all enjoy. He says:

And that is not all. Earlier I called Bill No. 136 a patchwork and an administrative nightmare.

The hon. member for Yorkview was talking about a nightmare. I am afraid the Opposition will all have nightmares before this bill passes.

The hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Trotter) was getting really fanatical—I am sorry that he is not in his seat—and during his comments I thought he was going to leap right over on the other side, at one point. But he made a great issue over the fact that the Conservative government have done nothing about the care of the people so far as medical care, hospitalization, and so on, are concerned.

I thought I would refer to this piece, and what the hon. Minister had to say:

To sum up, the government has contributed extensively in health services through mental hospitals and clinics, public health and preventative programmes, tuberculosis prevention and treatment, school health programmes, maternal and new-born care, general hospital construction grants and hospital care insurance.

Which is not bad for health care of the people over the years. I would not say that our government has ignored the people.

The NDP has some great ideas—that was a terrific story, incidentally, although I lost you about half way through it. They say we can give everything to everybody, as long as we put a six per cent surcharge on income tax, and a three per cent corporation tax, and we increase the sales tax. They mention this ability to pay, which I maintain is just a pipe dream, because you are not going to be able to tell who has the ability to pay. Everybody lives in a different way, and thinks in a different way, and spends money in a different way. So how are you going to say, Mr. Speaker, that you pay according to your ability to pay?

People to whom I talk every day say that the taxes are pretty high right now. They look to me, as one of the lawmakers, at least as the representative for High Park riding, to do something about lowering the taxes. So I cannot be impressed by people who say that they will give you all this medical care but it is going to cost a lot more in taxes, Mr. Speaker.

Our plan, on the other hand, says to the 82 per cent or 83 per cent, that if they have taken care to provide their own medical coverage they will simply continue to provide it. And for these who do not have the money, we will pay the premium, which makes sense to me because I have many friends, and I am sure that many of the hon. members have friends who want to make their own decisions. Maybe they do not want to buy a medical insurance plan at all; and if they do not want to, they do not have to. And maybe they do not want to buy the standard plan; maybe they want less or maybe they want more. They have the privilege of making that decision without the government making the decision for them.

Of course, as far as the insurance salesmen are concerned, I think they do a great job in our province too. They make a great contribution; they provide jobs; they provide income tax; they pay their way, and just because they happen to be enthusiastic about the product they are selling, that is no reason to deride them or their product.

Incidentally, I was at a meeting with some of the other Toronto members a while ago, sponsored by the Toronto and district labour council. It was a nice friendly meeting; we had dinner and some refreshment and I met some old friends. I have always been active and interested and close to the work of the Toronto district labour council ever since I was on the Toronto city council. They had a very nice pamphlet. A copy of it is here and I have read it over several times to try to get something out of it, which I cannot seem to get, but they say here:

Write your member in Queen's Park. Tell your doctor to have his association stop opposing any universal plan. Pass this along to your friend or neighbour and do what you can about it.

For the information of the NDP, I have not had one call on this in High Park. I have not had one call from anybody.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): They know there is no point in writing to the hon. member.

Mr. Cowling: As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, you might be interested in knowing that in all this talk and discussion on medical care—and I go right back to the last election in 1963, when medical care was supposed to be one of the big issues. Believe me, in High Park it was not; it was about number nine on my list of things that were important. I had people talk to me every day about many, many things but it was on a very rare occasion when they got really serious about medical care insurance. So I am not impressed with what the Opposition has to say about it; I am impressed with what we have to say about it.

Mr. MacDonald: More particularly, the hon. member is impressed with what he has to say about it.

Mr. Cowling: Mr. Speaker, there seems to be some confusion about the Hagey committee and the Hall commission.

Mr. Singer: That was astute of the hon. member to discover that.

Mr. Cowling: Yes; are there any calls the hon. member could make now for a little while?

The difference is that the Hall commission was set up in Ottawa and the Hagey committee was set up by our government. Now as far as I am concerned, I am much more interested in what the Hagey committee had to report than in what the Hall commission had to report. I am very serious and very interested in the Hagey report. After all, the federal government in Ottawa some day may institute a universal medical plan on the basis of the Hall committee report but, boy oh boy, Mr. Speaker, if we waited for something like that to happen in Ontario, we would all have long white whiskers in this House.

Let us give our government credit; we are proposing something now—today. We have finished with the report and have taken note of the recommendations and now we have come up with a bill, and this bill contains all the things we think it should, within reason.

Now, let us forget about this Hall commission, because in this Legislature we are only talking through our hats on the Hall commission report. It is up to Ottawa. They could consider it for the next 15 or 20 years, as they do on most things—with the present government, that is—but we are moving forward.

I think one of the best—and I have read volumes, as everybody else has in this House about medical care insurance—was an article written by George Hogan about a week or so ago. He talks about Hagey versus Hall in the medical debate, and I think some parts of it would be worth reading here. He says:

First of all, it will be said that this plan is iniquitous because it involves a means test. This is both inaccurate and irrelevant. It is inaccurate because it does not involve a means test but an income test, a very different thing. Every Ontario citizen undergoes an income test every year when he files his income tax return. That test determines whether or not he pays income tax and how much he pays. Exactly the same test, and no more, will determine whether or not he gets a medical care subsidy and how much.

It is irrelevant because any social security plan which requires the payment of a premium, no matter how small, will always find people who cannot afford it. Even Saskatchewan's compulsory medical plan makes provision for complete subsidization of those receiving public welfare. To receive public welfare, you have to pass a means test.

By extending complete subsidization for a much broader group, Ontario's voluntary plan does much more than Saskatchewan's compulsory plan to help those who really need it. But to determine who needs it, Ontario will use an income test for exactly the same reason that Saskatchewan, for a more limited group, uses a means test.

Now I think that lays the means test right on the line.

The second charge will be that for people not receiving a subsidy, the premium will be about $175 a year. This can only be described as deliberate misrepresentation. One of the features of the Ontario plan is that it requires all medical insurance carriers to make a standard medical plan available to anyone who applies for it. This means that many people who cannot now buy medical insurance at any price because of their health record or age or some other factor will now be able to buy it.

Just think about that one.

Mr. Singer: How much will it cost?

Mr. Cowling: About that.

Mr. Singer: About what?

Mr. Cowling: About $175 for a family man.

Normally, the cost to such people would be prohibitively high. To protect them, the bill provides the establishment by the government of a maximum premium which no carrier can exceed. The Hagey committee recommended a figure of about $175. Obviously, only a few people will pay this maximum premium, the vast majority will go on paying the premiums they are now paying under existing plans, which often are reduced still further by employer contributions. There is no reason why anybody who now has medical insurance should have the premiums increased by the plan, but a very large number will have them reduced.

A third charge will be that this plan is simply a means to give more profits to private insurance companies. This is the one I like. If the original Hagey proposal had been followed, there might be some argument for this, but under the government's new legislation there is none whatever, not one cent of public money will go to any private insurance company under this plan. All subsidized coverage will be handled directly through the government's own agency, administered by The Department of Health.

Now we have heard an awful lot in the last few days, Mr. Speaker, about all the money the insurance carriers are going to make out of a new plan, and we have heard an awful lot about the doctors, mostly bad. I think the Opposition has really dwelt mostly on the poor job that the medical profession is doing, and the profits that the private companies are going to collect.

Did the hon. member want to ask something?

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): If the hon. member will permit it.

Mr. Cowling: I do not mind.

Mr. Bryden: I was wondering, Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member has read Mr. George Hogan's column of April 13, 1965, in which he advocated that the government should take over and operate PSI as a basis for its medicare plan, and if so, would the hon. member care to read some of that into the record and comment on it?

Mr. Cowling: As a matter of fact, I did read that article. I read most of Hogan's pieces, some are good and some bad. I was not impressed with that suggestion, I might say, Mr. Speaker, not nearly as much as I am with this piece. Incidentally, the division of the health care dollar—I think this important—quite consistently has been shown to be as follows: Hospital care is the highest, followed in order by physician services, dental services, other health services lumped together, and prescribed drug service. I think that is important, and it was in the piece read by the hon. Minister.

But to go on with this article:

It is true that private insurance companies will still compete in the non-subsidized field, but a big part of this coverage is now provided by non-profit carriers such as PSI and AMS.

Because the plan is voluntary, anyone with the doctrinaire objection of dealing with a private insurance company is fully at liberty to deal with one of these non-profit carriers.

The fourth charge will be that establishing this voluntary plan will interfere with the establishment of a compulsory national plan such as the Hall commission recommended. If the Ontario plan is successful, as I believe it will be, this could very well be true, for if Ontario's people are satisfied with their voluntary plan there is no reason why they should trade it for something else. This is precisely what the advocates of compulsory medical care are most afraid of.

But if Ontario's people decide at a later date that they do want to change over to a Hall type plan, there is absolutely nothing in the present legislation which makes this more difficult. On the contrary, by setting up the machinery for government administration of coverage, and by establishing uniform standards, Ontario is taking important steps to make a national plan easier to implement if ever they want to.

Of all the arguments against voluntary medical care, this is possibly the silliest. The Hall commission itself did not foresee the possibility of a national compulsory plan being in effect in this decade. This opinion was reinforced by the economic council of Canada in its last annual report. Those who say we should wait for a national Hall-type medicare plan are simply saying that we should have no medicare at all.

In the coming weeks, you will hear these four points over and over again, but when you analyze them you will see that each is not a criticism of the Ontario plan, but simply a misrepresentation of it.

I think that sets the stage pretty well.

This bill, as hon. members know, makes coverage available to everybody, regardless of age, state of past or present health or financial status. I think that is very important. It is guaranteed non-cancellable and renewable, which many insurance policies are not today. In other words, if something should happen of a catastrophic nature under the new standard plan, you will continue to be paid as long as you are not able to work.

There are one or two other things, Mr. Speaker, that I think are worthy of note, and that is the criticism of the insurance companies, although in some cases it might be true. But let us give them the benefit of the doubt. After all, it was the private insurance carriers who originally made medical insurance available to the people. It was not the non-profit organization, and it was not government. It was done through private insurance people. They began this system of medical care insurance. Certainly they did not expect that they would have the best type of plan. It was on a basis of trial and error in the early days many years ago, but I think they have brought it up to such a condition at the present time that most people have medical care insurance—and I would venture to say that every hon. member in this House has some form of medical care insurance.

I should point out, Mr. Speaker, that at every opportunity I get to discuss medical care insurance, I always ask those in the audience if they would mind raising those hands, those who do not have some form of medical insurance. It is amazing to find out how few people in any audience do not have medical care insurance of some kind.

An hon. member: Did the hon. member put their names and addresses down?

Mr. Cowling: Yes, I see what the hon. member means there.

So, the situation is not nearly as serious as the Opposition would lead us to believe that it is. I was very much impressed, as other speakers have been, with the series of articles by Joan Hollobon in the Globe and Mail. I read this booklet and I also read the articles. I think she sets it out very fairly and squarely.

Mr. Speaker, I simply say this, I congratulate our government—I support this Bill No. 136—I think it is a great start in the right direction.

As far as I am concerned, we could move into other areas. I think that, as someone has already mentioned here, that we could extend the services to include optometrists, dentists, the chiropractors and others. I think of optometrists, particularly. There are many, many small communities in our great province where medical doctors are just not available for eye examinations. This could be done by the optometrist.

Everybody has occasion to go to a dentist from time to time, and they do good work. The chiropractors are an important part of our society, and thousands and thousands of people swear by them. But I think we have made a real start in the right direction.

Basically we are leaving the medical care insurance with those who can provide it for themselves and for their families, and we are going to pick up the tab for those who cannot. And as a beginning I just cannot possibly see that we are going to have too much objection to it.

So I support the bill. I certainly could not support the amendment as proposed by the hon. leader of the Opposition, and I urge all hon. members to let us stop talking, and let us get on with the job.

Mr. M. Gaunt (Huron-Bruce): Mr. Speaker, may I say at the outset that I am disappointed that the government has not seen fit to bring in a compulsory comprehensive government-sponsored medicare programme.

I was very interested in the comments of the hon. member for High Park as he attempted to rationalize the attitude of the government in bringing in this bill in its present form. He made some rather startling statements there, and I was very interested in hearing the hon. member trying to rationalize the whole affair.

I was also interested in listening to my hon. friend from Yorkview, as he pointed out the administrative difficulties in handling this particular Bill No. 136. I think it would be fair to say at this point that this bill will be an administrative monstrosity. I think that the problems that the hon. member for Yorkview pointed out, are very appropriate, and I would say that it will be a very difficult job to administer such a bill.

I was very interested, when we were on this debate before, some few days ago, to listen to the arguments for and against compulsion. I know my hon. friend, the hon. Minister of Health seems to have a dread, an inborn fear, of the word compulsion, for some reason or other.

Hon. M. B. Dymond (Minister of Health): Distaste!

Mr. Gaunt: Distaste. Well, in any case, whatever it may be, the hon. Minister does not want to move in that direction. At least the hon. Minister is unwilling to do so in this particular bill. I would say that the government is not very consistent in this area, because we have had compulsion in a number of areas. I can think of OHSC. I can think, in the agricultural field of the hog marketing board. Every farmer in the province, every hog farmer at any rate, has to ship his pigs through the hog marketing board. That is compulsory.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Speaker: Order! I want the debate to continue along proper lines without too many interjections, because it does not add anything to the debate, and it is very difficult for the member giving his speech. So I would ask you to give the member your attention, and not interject.

Mr. Gaunt: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I was saying, before I was interrupted by some of my hon. friends, that this government has not been very consistent in the aspect of compulsion. In the hog marketing field, we have compulsion. Every hog producer in the province has to ship his hogs through the hog marketing board. As I mentioned, OHSC is compulsory, and in our school system we have compulsion. Every child under the age of 16 has to attend school. It would seem to me at this point, that this government almost considers the educational needs and the need for training of the mind, more important than the health needs of the people of the province.

I want to say that as far as I am concerned, in my speech today, on second reading of this bill, I want to make a few comments, based partially on my own experience. I feel rather strongly that chiropractic services should be included, as I said in my Budget speech a little earlier. The value of chiropractors has been well established over the years. There are a number of injuries, such as back injuries, and so on, that the chiropractors can treat very efficiently and very economically—I would say even more so, than the medical doctors can.

I would like to speak to the amendment which was proposed by my hon. leader. In particular, as I have said, I would like to point out to the hon. members of the House why we, in this party, have seen fit to include, and press for the inclusion of chiropractic services as ancillary health care services to be phased into our programme.

Dr. J. N. Mennell of the physical medicine and rehabilitation service, Veterans Administration Centre, Los Angeles, California, stated, and I quote:

The public soon came to realize that they would find greater relief more quickly and more economically from osteopathic and chiropractic treatment of their backs than they would from orthodox medical treatment.

Also, in an article in the Canadian Medical Association Journal of July 15, 1958, Dr. W. B. Parsons, of the Parsons Clinic, in Alberta, stated and I quote:

The reason we took up manipulation was an interest in backache with the early discovery that many patients who failed to respond to routine medical treatment went to a manipulator and received immediate relief. This discovery was followed by the acceptance of the classic advice, if you can't whip 'em, join 'em, at least to the extent of borrowing their techniques.

Even a number of the doctors have admitted that there is benefit to be derived from chiropractic techniques, as is pointed out by Dr.

Parsons. However, there are two major reasons why chiropractors should be included, should be phased into the proposed medicare legislation. Mr. Speaker, I want to deal with each of these for a moment or two.

The first reason is that it is important in its own right as a health service. Statistics show that in Ontario, one of every six people utilizes chiropractic services, at a cost of about $6 million annually. This implies that over one million people are now using chiropractic treatment in Ontario and the Ontario chiropractic association reports that they, on the average, have 82,000 new patients per year. Surely these figures in themselves indicate that the profession of chiropractic is important enough as a health service to come under the auspices of the government-sponsored medicare plan.

Saskatchewan, for instance—and I mentioned this in my Budget debate—Saskatchewan included chiropractic care in the Medicare programme last April 6, by a unanimous vote of the Legislature. The governments of Alberta and Manitoba provide chiropractic benefits to recipients of welfare and pensions. Closer to home, right here in the province, we provide chiropractic services under The Workmen's Compensation Act without suffering financial penalties.

In the face of these facts, I think that we should make absolutely sure that there is a place for chiropractic services in the gamut of the health services available to the people of this province. If the patient has the right to choose his own doctor, under a medicare programme, surely this should be extended, so that the patient can choose between the doctor and the chiropractor, without suffering financial loss. A decision by this government which falls short of that aim, would imply nothing less than that the government was making a value judgement about the type of treatment the residents of Ontario deserve. And surely this is not within the powers of this government, or any government.

So the first reason I believe that chiropractic services should be included in the Medicare programme is that it is important, and is increasing in importance.

The second reason, Mr. Speaker, is that we are now experiencing a critical shortage of health care workers. Now, and in the immediate future, I believe we should make maximum use of our paramedical personnel, and thereby reduce the strain that the general practitioner and other physicians are going to face. In my Budget speech, I pointed out, I cited cases where medical people had stated that they worked upwards of 85 hours a week. I also pointed out at that time, that under those conditions, often the doctor suffers, the patient suffers, and everyone connected in the health service field eventually suffers.

An increase in chiropractors would facilitate more adequate and more extensive health services for all the people of Ontario. The Financial Post of November 14, 1964, reports that in 1957 there were 57 per cent of physicians in general practice. By 1961, the percentage had dropped to 50 per cent, and in the past four years it is estimated that the percentage has dropped even further, to approximately 47 per cent. The percentage of general practitioners is decreasing and at the same time, we are insisting that their responsibilities increase. It is a well-known fact that most of the general practitioners, as I have already pointed out, work extremely long hours. If that is the situation today with the general practitioner, then the handwriting is on the wall. The situation will get worse before it gets better. Under pressure of this kind, as I have already stated, either patients or doctors, or both, will suffer in the end.

I outlined this situation, as I said before, in my Budget debate, but I just want to reiterate what I have already said in the Budget debate. This situation is obviously the responsibility of the government and the government should therefore do everything possible to reduce the pressure on the doctors. In line with this, we should not hesitate in bringing the chiropractic profession under our plan.

Speaking as a citizen of the province and as a member of this House, I can say that if people in Ontario want to go to a chiropractor, then there should be no financial penalty inflicted upon them for doing so. I believe that the chiropractic profession is eager to have its role in health services defined more accurately. I know that at the present time it is not recognized as a health service by The Department of Health, but the Canadian memorial chiropractors college, which is the only chiropractors college in the British Commonwealth, is recognized by The Department of Education. It is listed in the department's publication, Horizon, and it has been made eligible to receive loans through The Canada Student Loan Act, so there is a certain measure of recognition, even though the college must meet all of its operating costs through the profession itself. It cannot rely on government assistance, as can other professions and professional schools in this connection.

The enrolment of the college is about 200, and there are about 450 practising chiropractors in Ontario. So we are faced with a situation where the people accept chiropractors; part of the government accepts the chiropractic profession and part does not; and the medical profession, as a profession, is pitted solidly against them.

In the face of this, I say that if the people want chiropractic services phased in under a medicare programme, there is no excuse not to do so. Chiropractic is an important profession. It will relieve the pressure on the doctors. I think it should be phased into the programme as quickly as possible.

In this same connection, I believe that optometrists should be included in the plan. I know that my hon. friend from High Park mentioned the optometrists and the chiropractors, but I would just like to say a word about the optometrists.

At the present time, optometrists perform 65 per cent of the refractions in Ontario. Beyond welfare cases, 2,151,250 Ontario residents and dependants require vision care services on a continuing basis. Six hundred thousand refractions are performed by optometrists, and they have more than 1,700,000 patients in the province.

It is obvious that if the optometrists are not included, this will mean that more than 1,500,000 residents of this province will have to pay for that service themselves, or they will attempt to get the same service by going to an ophthalmologist, and, as I will point out later, the ophthalmologists are already overworked. My hon. friend says that you have to wait three months to get an appointment, and I believe that is so.

However, the fly in the ointment is the fact that 63 out of the 110 Ontario communities with a population of 3,000 or more have optometrists as the only practitioners available to provide the refraction benefits. The same will be true of perhaps all of the communities numbering less than 3,000. This means, in effect, the ophthalmologists will be presented with a work load which will be a physical impossibility for them to carry. It will also mean a transfer of the ophthalmologists' time from the necessary medical or surgical eye care to that area of vision care that the optometrists are already well qualified to perform. It means, in effect, that the patient is not in a position to make a completely free choice of practitioners.

In one case, the patient has to pay out of his own pocket, and in the other, he is covered by his medical insurance. Surely, the hon. Minister of Health must recognize the importance of vision care for the well-being of the people in the province. That being so, I would urge the hon. Minister to include the optometrists, along with the chiropractors, in the bill as soon as possible.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. A. V. Walker (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, during the past few days, much has been said regarding Bill 136, and it is very difficult to say anything which will not be, to a certain degree, repetitious. One of the advantages of following other speakers, is that one has the advantage of dealing with some of the statements which they make.

I listened with interest to the hon. leader of the Opposition as he outlined the Liberal plan for a medicare programme in Ontario. He pointed out that the plan would cost in the neighbourhood of $200 million, and told us very blandly that we could afford it. Unfortunately, I did not hear him mention where the money is to come from, and we are reminded of that other famous Liberal in Ottawa, who was reported to have made the remark: "What's a million?"

It is a simple matter, Mr. Speaker, to stand up in this House and with arms outstretched cry for a compulsory Medicare programme for Ontario. But the big question that we must ask ourselves is where would the finances for such a programme come from. Certainly, this government cannot print their own money. Reliable sources estimate a full-scale compulsory Medicare programme would cost well in excess of $200 million. Welfare, education, municipalities and other departments of government all require increasing financial assistance.

There is a cliché to the effect that talk is cheap, but all the loud talk in the world cannot supply the vast financial sums which are necessary to provide the services of this province. Faced with the heavy burden of financial management, the government cannot set up a province-wide Medicare programme in a dream programme of financing, and just hope it works. They have responsibility to provide the best possible health service within the bounds of the available finances, and in Bill 136 the government is doing just that.

The hon. member for York South presented an interesting argument in outlining his proposals for a Medicare programme for Ontario. The hon. member it seems to me, Mr. Speaker, has the ability to almost make two and two add up to five. But as I listened to the hon. leader and other hon. members of this party, I find that once again, everybody is in favour of a Medicare programme, only at least in the case of the NDP they propose a dream programme of financing.

In analyzing this NDP financial programme—which it is reputed will provide a Medicare programme for Ontario for $165 million—one gets the impression that the hon. member for York South must actually be capable of stretching two and two all the way up to seven.

I had the opportunity of discussing and arguing medical health costs with some very respected actuaries during the past couple of months, and I found this expert opinion at great variance with the NDP programme costs. Even the public Medicare programme costs in the province of Saskatchewan, the very home of Medicare, do not agree with their Ontario counterparts' proposals. Medical records show that Ontario's costs are at least 25 per cent higher than Saskatchewan, and on this basis a Medicare programme based on the actual cost in that province would cost Ontario well in excess of $200 million.

The hon. member for York South made a great deal of the problem of a means test, which he claimed would be used—the government using income tax as a basis for subsidization. In checking over the NDP proposed method of financing, I find that they refer to a six per cent surcharge on income tax. This is not an additional six per cent on your income, but a direct six per cent charge on the actual tax paid, or at least is as I understand it. I wonder who is to collect this tax, and how the persons involved are going to declare just what their income tax is?

It seems to me that this programme of financing is also pretty well tied up with a declaration of income tax. I must admit that I never before realized that there was anything particularly secret about whether or not one paid income tax. This subject quite often becomes quite a topic of conversation among workers in industry, as to how much a man paid, whether he paid and if not, why not.

The argument that Bill 136 contains a means test is, in my humble opinion, quite wrong. If we agree with this argument, it could be suggested that every citizen with a taxable income in Canada takes a means test. Every citizen in Ontario is responsible for filing his income tax return, and the same income tax return will determine whether or not he receives assistance in paying his medical insurance premium and how much.

It is a recognized fact that to secure public welfare, a citizen is required to pass a form of means test. The nationwide income tax return cannot be considered on the same basis and in the same category, I suggest, Mr.

Speaker. This argument is not feasible. I submit that the overall plan of assistance as contained in Bill No. 136 is the fairest possible plan which could have been presented at this time and should not cause any citizen embarrassment.

During the past few weeks that this bill has been under consideration, I have argued, along with some other hon. members on the government benches, for the group in what is termed the grey area and I refer to those citizens in the $3,000 to $4,200 income bracket. I felt that for the family man in this income bracket there should have been a larger measure of assistance. During this debate I have noticed that various speakers have also referred to this particular area of income. It is, of course, a fact that regardless of the point at which the assistance was cut off, there would also be a considerable hardship. The programme which is now before us is as far as the government felt they could go unless federal financial assistance was forthcoming.

Statements have been made, Mr. Speaker, to the effect that the medical health programme as outlined in Bill 136, eliminates the possibility of Ontario entering the national health programme. This, of course, is definitely not true. The present plan has been set up so as to make it adaptable to integration into an overall Canada health plan if and when such a plan is proposed. It is interesting to note that even the Hall commission itself did not foresee the possibility of a national health plan in this decade. The recent report of the economic council of Canada supports this thinking. What the future will bring as far as a Dominion-wide health plan is concerned, is difficult to predict. If the day comes when Ontario decides they wish to join such a plan, there is nothing in the present legislation to prevent this. Setting up the necessary government administration to look after 25 per cent of our people is an important step which will make a national plan easier to implement.

Today across this province there are many, many thousands of organized workers and their families who under union agreements are enjoying excellent medical and hospitalization coverage. Union negotiators have made splendid accomplishments in this fringe benefit field through the past several years. In this regard, I feel we are no doubt far ahead of the other provinces in Canada.

I would be among those in this House who would readily agree that a truly effective Medicare programme which would provide all the various health necessities for our people, is an essential objective. But the logical question would appear to me to be: What would the average industrial worker in Ontario achieve under a Medicare programme? Thousands now enjoy excellent medical coverage, some already enjoy a drug plan and many unions are aiming at achieving such a plan. Even the Opposition in this House admits that the shortage of dentists eliminates a large-scale development of this field of health in the immediate future.

On pages 6 and 7—and I found this very interesting, Mr. Speaker—on pages 6 and 7 of the New Democratic Party programme for Medicare, it clearly states that their programme will be introduced by stages and that the first stage will provide “general and specialist medical services in addition to universal hospital care.” There is no reference to a drug plan or a dental programme—

Mr. MacDonald: The hon. member has not read later editions.

Mr. Walker: There is no indication as to how long the first stage may take.

Mr. Bryden: Immediately.

Mr. Walker: So I repeat the question, what would thousands of workers in this province achieve that they do not now enjoy? Under the New Democratic programme of financing, they would achieve the right to pay a 6 per cent surcharge on income tax where they now pay nothing. In my area this would amount to an average of $25 to $35 a year. There would also be of necessity an increase in some area of provincial taxation—likely sales tax—to help cover the cost of the Medicare programme.

Mr. MacDonald: The hon. member has not read the plan.

Mr. Walker: Certainly I realize that the industrial workers I have mentioned do not comprise all the people of the province. I am also aware that there are pocket areas where medical health coverage with a modest premium is indeed needed, but on the other hand this bill provides free medical health services to approximately one million of our people. Could these people afford to pay even a modest premium?

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that this word Medicare has been exaggerated out of all proportion as it actually refers to the situation in this province. There are people, unfortunately, who have been led to believe that if a Medicare programme were introduced, all their health problems would be over. They would pay a few dollars premium and have nothing more to worry about. This is, of course, not true. A Medicare programme in order to be truly effective must not only provide a comprehensive medical coverage to all citizens at a low premium cost, but must include a dental programme and a drug plan. If I may be so bold as to express a humble opinion, I would say to this House that I do not think we will ever have such a programme in this province until the federal government presents a co-operative financial programme to assist in the financing of such a programme.

Before we cry out in a loud voice that "Medicare is wonderful; it is the be-all to end-all; we can afford it; there is no reason why we cannot have it," let us stop and consider the situation in all its ramifications; let us tell Mr. Average Citizen in this province just what the exact situation is. Let us tell him what he can actually expect to get from a Medicare programme that he is not getting now. Let us tell him how much a Medicare programme is going to cost him from all angles against what he is now paying. Then and only then can our citizens clearly understand what this present argument is all about.

As I previously stated, a great many words have been spoken on this subject, the debate has contained figures, statistics, predictions, comparisons and so forth, but while all these arguments hang in the air of this House. What we are really debating is the basic difference in the opinion as to the best method of producing a health programme for our people. I am sure we all agree on one point, that it is desirable to aim for a programme of the best possible health care for the people of this province. There are various ways of attaining this goal, and here we differ. It is the responsibility of government to determine how the goal is to be achieved. Newspapers across this province, have spoken generally in favour of the government's medical plan. Statements such as, "first phase, and a good beginning," have been repeatedly used.

I submit that Bill No. 136 is a logical step forward in a progressive programme towards achieving this goal. The bill we are discussing here today, puts first things first. The poor, and those who live on low incomes, will be assisted by the taxpayers of the province. This is as it should be; 83.8 per cent of our people are covered at the present time, and there will be no interference with these existing voluntary plans. The legislation proposed in this bill, Mr. Speaker, is not the last word on the subject of a medical health programme for Ontario, but I submit that it is a good beginning, a sound, logical beginning.

In conclusion, I would ask the hon. members of this House: Can we afford to cast aside this medical health programme, which will provide free health services for nearly one million of our citizens, in the low income brackets, and wait until the federal government is in a position to present a Dominion-wide health programme, some time in the future? Frankly, I do not think so.

Mr. N. Davison (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, in approaching a plan for Medicare, my thinking has been based on the answers as I see them, to two questions.

Question one: Are all the men, women and children of Ontario worth providing with Medicare? If hon. members believe, as I do, that the only possible answer to this question is yes, then question two must be, how can we provide this essential service? How can we be certain that every Ontario citizen is protected?

If a Medicare plan is to meet everyone's needs, it must contain the answer to question two. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the plan as proposed by Bill No. 136, fails to provide this answer. Perhaps the creators of the plan started from a different point. I think they did. I think they planned coverage for a certain group of people: those who need its protection the least, the high-income group, and, to give it public appeal, those people who are poverty-stricken. The plan really provides no new protection for a family or individual on welfare because they are already covered under our welfare provisions. The cost for protecting this group of people is simply being taken from a different pocket of the same pair of pants. It is my understanding, and I am sure the hon. Minister will correct me if I am wrong, that persons on welfare were receiving free medical care through arrangements between the government and the Ontario medical association at a special rate.

Under the Act, I have to assume that the medical profession will collect larger fees, since benefits are to be set according to the general physician tariff of the Ontario medical association and that when the patient has been referred to a specialist, he will be paid at the Ontario medical association specialist tariff. Barriers have been erected to those who live on the fringe of poverty, and the middle-income group must help to pay for the higher income group.

The Ontario federation of labour, in a recent study of poverty in Ontario, considers an annual income of $1,000 for an individual or $2,000 for a family of husband, wife and two children, to be destitution; an annual income of $1,500 for a single person or $3,000 for a family, to be poverty level; and an annual income of $2,000 for a single person or $4,000 for a family, to be on the fringe of poverty.

Believe it or not, a man, his wife and two children, with an annual income of, let us say, $2,800, who live at poverty level, as defined by this report, will be required to pay a partial premium for their proposed Medicare. As soon as his annual income is $3,701, the man will have to pay the full premium, in all likelihood, $175. This is an enormous amount for a very limited coverage, more than he would have to pay for PSI—$159 for instance, and PSI provides better coverage.

What portion of this cost is borne by the same family with an annual income of $20,000, which is the average income of doctors in Ontario, a group who have most strenuously opposed providing the people of Ontario with complete coverage at a cost set according to their ability to pay? Why, this $20,000-income family pays exactly the same as the one who is making $3,701.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it will have to be proved to me that there is no barrier to the low-income group's obtaining this insurance. They have the biggest barrier of all. It is made of dollars and cents. Dollars and cents, which a family of four, trying to shelter themselves, to pay for utilities, food and clothing on $65 a week, just cannot find. They have a grim task just existing. There is no area in which they can economize. They cannot say, "We will do without this luxury item or that luxury item, to buy medical insurance," not unless they give up the bare necessities of life.

Is it not obvious, then, that the high-income group is not paying its fair share of the medical insurance costs? They are not paying according to their ability to pay while the low-income group and a large portion of the medium-income group is paying in excess of their ability to pay. Because of this situation, it is really the high-income group which will receive the greatest benefit.

It becomes increasingly obvious that large numbers of Ontario citizens cannot afford it and therefore will not benefit under the plan. If every Ontario citizen is to be provided with medical services, then such a plan must be universal. Those who criticize universal plans, do so in the name of freedom. They cry out against what they term "compulsion."

Well, do we not live a great deal under compulsion? We are compelled to send our children to school at a certain age and to keep them there until they reach a certain age. We do not seem to hear any objections to this type of compulsion today, although when the idea of education for everyone was first introduced, this same type of objection was raised. We think now that everyone must be educated. In fact, we spend considerable time in this Legislature, devising ways and means of encouraging ever greater numbers to go on to higher education. There is compulsion in the field of education, but no one considers it to be a denial of freedom. Instead, it provides us with greater freedom to choose our life's work.

We are compelled to pay for the education, but it is paid out of the public purse and that purse is filled by the ability of the individual to pay. It comes from the provincial share of our income tax and the local area share of our real estate and other civic taxes.

This very government introduced compulsory hospital insurance for the mandatory groups of 15 employees or more. A revolutionary process for a Tory government, I agree, but it did introduce a hospital insurance plan which is largely compulsory. Its major fault is that it is not income-related, but since it was largely compulsory, it was at least possible to keep the premiums low and most of the people who were not compelled to join, could afford to do so voluntarily. What surprises me is, that having come up with such a popular scheme, the government does not use practically the same one for medical insurance.

When the hon. Minister introduced his bill, my hopes were high at one point, when he stated:

Since the first step has been taken, viz the provision of hospital care insurance, it appears logical that our next step would be in the area of physicians' services, and that is the purpose and will be the effect of the bill.

Unfortunately, that is where his logic ended and doctrinaire Toryism took over. And now we are stuck with legislation which does not deserve the name Medicare. Instead we should call it "doctor-care" or "insurance-company-care."

A year ago last February the Hagey commission was advised by the United Church of Canada and the Ontario federation of labour that most Ontario residents polled in two separate studies conducted by these organizations favoured compulsory, tax-supported medical insurance. Every public opinion poll in the last 15 years has given clear indication that the majority of Canadians want universal Medicare.

In June, 1964, the Canadian association of social workers met in Hamilton and they urged that a national health programme be financed by taxation to give full health care to all Canadians. Last February, just three months ago, the Ontario association of social workers, in a brief presented to the Hagey committee, stated that: "Universal coverage is essential," and recommended "a government-administered plan financed from taxes."

There could hardly be a group of people more concerned or better informed regarding the needs of the people of Ontario. Their findings and opinions are not to be lightly discarded and, for this reason, I would like to refresh your memory by reading into the record portions of their brief:

The Ontario association of social workers includes in its membership 1,016 professional social workers in Ontario. Our provincial organization is affiliated with the national organization, the Canadian association of social workers.

Members of the association, through employment in government departments at all levels, private social agencies, public and private hospitals and treatment institutions, encounter daily the social and emotional consequences of illness, as experienced by persons who are sick or disabled, their families and relatives, and the communities in which they live. Our professional concern is for the social, physical and emotional well-being of all people, and we hope that our knowledge and the experience gained in helping numerous people with their social problems will prove useful to the inquiry in its deliberations.

As stated in the national brief, social workers support the democratic philosophy that every person should have the opportunity to develop to his full potential, and to make his most effective contribution as a member of society. We agree that physical and mental health is essential, and that all people suffering from ill health should have the opportunity for the care appropriate to their physical and mental conditions. We know that good health is costly, but we consider that the poor health of its people is even more costly to society. We cannot approve of the provision of health care through a health plan which divides the nation into first-class and second-class citizens on the basis of their ability to pay individually for the medical care they need.

We maintain therefore:

(1) That society has the responsibility of ensuring that the opportunity for adequate health care is provided to all its members.

(2) That a plan to provide comprehensive health service should be established.

(3) That there should be no difference in the kind, quality or form of care available under the plan based on the ability of the patient to pay.

(4) That universal coverage is essential. One of the reasons for recommending a government-administered plan financed from taxes is that it would achieve our goal of universal coverage. We recognize that if the plan is administered provincially, flexibility in the method of financing may be necessary, as in hospital insurance. We would hope that such flexibility might be regarded as a stage in development toward the goals of a tax-supported programme.

(5) That the services should be available to all persons domiciled in Canada without distinction. We recognize that a plan for one province cannot fully achieve this objective, but it should come as close as possible to doing so.

(6) That the plan should be administered in such a way as to provide citizen participation in the policy-making body. While medical decisions must be left to the medical profession, provision should be made for participation in policy-making of the citizens of the country. The consumers of health care have a right to be represented in the administrative body.

Mr. Speaker, the Hall commission reported that the cost of a medical insurance plan with private insurance companies as carriers would be 22 per cent higher than if the plan were operated by the government. These figures are based on a plan covering Canada, but I do not believe they would vary a great deal here in Ontario. The opportunity for profit to the private insurance companies is clearly demonstrated in any case.

Actually, the private carriers of Ontario's medical insurance are in a much stronger profit position, because the basic principle of insurance—the pooling of risk and spreading the cost over the whole population—has been flouted by this government. It has taken unto itself most of the poor risks, and handed over to private companies the good risks.

In looking at some material I have collected over the years I came across a clipping from the Toronto Daily Star dated November 1, 1961. The newspaper reported that the Canadian health insurance association told the Royal commission on health services:

A government-sponsored national health plan is not needed, because its 117 member insurance companies are preparing to drop the uninsurable ban that now denies health insurance coverage to many of the elderly, the medically impaired and those engaged in hazardous occupations.

Dr. James C. Emmett, medical director of the Imperial Life Assurance Company, who presented the policy statement for the Canadian health insurance association told the commission:

The present voluntary plans can be modified and improved to provide this same high standard of medical care through voluntary health insurance at a reasonable premium cost to all Canadians, regardless of age, health or occupation, and accomplished without involving governments at either the federal or provincial level in substantial new costs and extensive new administrative machinery.

The association is aware that some segments of the population are not in a financial position to pay even a most reasonable premium for voluntary medical insurance.

Such persons will continue to require financial assistance from the governments or others. It is unrealistic and unnecessary to institute overall, compulsory, government-sponsored plans applicable to the entire population just to take care of this relatively limited group.

It seems odd that these insurance companies were not prepared to remove these exclusion clauses until it seemed possible that governments were prepared to introduce some type of medical insurance.

One could well believe that Dr. Emmett, an executive member of one of the private insurance companies, had laid down the blueprint for Bill 136. We must give Dr. Emmett, and the Canadian health insurance association, credit for realizing insurance companies were cutting their own throats if they stayed with their exclusion policies, and for endeavouring to keep their industry in the profitable area of health insurance while persuading the government to subsidize the unprofitable area. They did indeed render a service to their industry, as events have proven, but by no means have they rendered a service to Ontario residents.

Pierre Berton called the 1962 Bill 163: "Little more than a minor amendment to The Insurance Act," and he was so right.

This newer version has been improved very little. In some instances it is even worse. It is still obvious that the interests of the insurance industry have been protected, to the detriment of the citizens of Ontario.

Now, I want to lay to rest some of the apparent fears of the hon. member for Scarborough North (Mr. Wells) regarding the reaction of trade unionists. It is a change, and rather nice, for a government member to express this type of concern for labour, even if it is done with tongue in cheek.

First of all, I want to point out that it is a historical fact that the trade union movement has pioneered a great deal of our present social legislation, among others, old-age and other pensions, paid holidays and vacations, shorter work weeks and complete health insurance, including hospitalization. They are leading supporters in the field of health insurance, and have been so for many years.

Trade unions have had considerable success in obtaining this type of protection for themselves in negotiation with their employers. However, the trade union movement has always had a wide social conscience, and they have never limited their efforts to their own narrow interests. They have continued their efforts to obtain social welfare legislation to benefit all the citizens at all times. But to get back to their own particular interests, they will not suffer if they are required to pay as individuals. There is nothing that I can see to stop the employers from paying a negotiated share of the premium cost on their behalf. There is nothing to stop them acquiring extra protection during negotiations.

Hon. members must realize that when union contract negotiations are completed, so much money is available for a package deal. In the past, a large percentage of this has been used for fringe benefits, including just such items as health insurance. The balance, perhaps now, could be changed and more of the available increase be assigned as a direct wage increase.

However, as I said, it is nice to see the hon. member more concerned now than he was last September. At that time, there was a general protest because PSI had announced an increase in their rates, and the hon. member was able to shrug it off—a bit hardheartedly, I thought—with these words: "If you want such services you have to pay for them."

Well, we all know that. What I am concerned with is that everyone pays only according to his ability, and that the burden be shared in a manner that will allow the people of Ontario to have the medical services they need, when they need them.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. W. B. Lewis (Humber): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak in support of this bill, I would say it is a generally accepted fact that the voice and opinions of the people are reflected in the newspapers and magazines across this province. I would also point out to you that my hon. friends in the Opposition agree with this statement; whenever anything appears that is unfavourable to the government they are quick to quote it verbatim at their first opportunity.

So, Mr. Speaker, I would like to put into the record the opinions of many of the newspapers from all sections of our province, and one from our sister province, Quebec, relative to Bill 136.

From the Brockville Record and Times of May 15. They comment:

The approach to Medicare taken by the provincial government on a gradual basis is a wise one. Costs of medical plans can mount rapidly, along with other difficulties. This plan is a first step, a masterpiece of compromise, leaving the way open for future developments.

And from the Guelph Daily Mercury of May 14, I quote the following:

It is hardly to be expected that initial legislation in the immensely complex field of Medicare can meet all wishes and supply all needs. The at-long-last bill the Ontario government has now placed before the Legislature is imperfect, but in average it is an excellent beginning.

Then we move over to the St. Catharines Standard of May 13:

This is the type of programme that many have recommended, for it includes medical services, annual checkups, maternity care, psychiatric treatment and surgeon's care. It is a bill under which every resident of Ontario can obtain medical health insurance, regardless of health or age, and one which provides for those unable to afford such protection.

Then let us go to the other part of the province and quote from the Windsor Star of May 13:

Premier John P. Robarts wisely emphasizes this plan as not the be-all and the end-all of medical insurance. Such insurance, government-sponsored, is still in its infancy on this continent. There should be room for development and improvement.

And from the Kitchener-Waterloo Record of May 13:

No one is claiming that the proposals are perfection. In fact, the opposite seems to be the case, but it is something substantial to cover an area in which nothing is currently available. It is worth a fair trial, subject to constructive criticism, based on facts rather than doctrinal theory.

The Montreal Gazette had this to say:

The plan is being attacked on the grounds that it is not universal and compulsory, but in several ways Ontario appears to be proceeding wisely. Some of the critics of the Ontario plan have called it "timid." Perhaps the plan might better be called "prudent." There is much to be said for doing first things first, step by step.

From the Fort William Daily Times Journal of May 14:

Great numbers of Canadians like to feel free and independent. They rebel against regimentation, resenting growing lists of things they must do or must not do. All this is a background for an opinion on the proposed Ontario medical services' insurance Act, introduced in the Legislature.

That is based on the fact that the plan is not compulsory. They end up by saying: "That is good."

The Port Arthur Chronicle of May 14 has this to say:

The encouraging aspects of the legislation are that a step has been taken to provide the needy with the means of paying their doctors' bills and Dr. Dymond himself has emphasized that the scheme is only one step in developing the health programme of the provincial government.

The Barrie Examiner of May 14 says:

The medical services insurance Act, introduced in the Ontario Legislature this week, is a step in the right direction. Whether it accomplishes what it hopes to achieve remains to be seen. At the moment there is no indication as to the cost to participants, one of the key factors in any scheme of this nature, largely because of the opposition to a government-sponsored plan being handled by commercial enterprises. Mr. Robarts has compromised in his new bill. In doing so, he has accomplished some basically sound results. He has assured coverage for low-income groups and standard contracts for others.

And from the Ottawa Journal:

Even though Health Minister Dymond has emphasized that this is only one step in the developing health programme of the provincial government, it is a momentous step. The government of Ontario has been careful to recognize from the start that a successful medical insurance programme should have the co-operation of the medical profession.

It has taken pains to achieve this without subordinating the general public interests to narrow professional advantages.

And now, closer to home. I quote from the Toronto Telegram:

The Ontario government has moved firmly and with solid strides to bring medical care insurance to the people of the province. The Ontario government is acting sensibly to put first things first. It is a good beginning.

And from the Globe and Mail:

As a first phase, it is a big phase and a fast phase. However, as Dr. Dymond again said, "It is a beginning." From beginnings one continues to move forward.

The Stratford Beacon Herald of May 13 has this to say:

We believe the Ontario government has made a good start in the field of medical care in the bill introduced in the Legislature on Tuesday by Hon. Matthew Dymond, Minister of Health. The bill has weaknesses, but it represents an effective entry into an area that needs the attention of the government.

The London Free Press says:

As first displayed, the plan is a masterpiece of compromise, avoiding most of the pitfalls which have beset other schemes and leaving the way open for further development.

And from the Brantford Expositor, we have this:

The government scheme thus is a cautious approach in circumstances where caution may be just as much a virtue as compulsion and comprehensiveness. It will not stay the demand for state medicine which is an inevitable part of the welfare state to which, willy-nilly, Canada is moving, but at least, it will ensure that the Medicare march in Ontario is begun at an orderly pace rather than in a disorganized stampede.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, a report from the Hamilton Spectator of May 13:

The chief virtue of the medical insurance bill introduced in the Legislature the other day is that it fulfills the basic requirements of any worthwhile Medicare scheme. It ensures that no person may be deprived of care in sickness nor suffer impoverishment as a result. Retention of the voluntary principle ensures that the general practitioner will keep his independence. This is important, compulsory government schemes could turn the profession into another arm of the civil service.

Part of the wisdom of the government's bill lies in its flexibility. In the future, it may be changed in the light of experience or even be merged with the national scheme; in the meantime, it answers the need for medical care to be made available to all irrespective of income and without hardship.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, this new Act differs considerably from the Saskatchewan plan in two main areas. In Ontario, medical insurance will remain voluntary as opposed to a compulsory plan in Saskatchewan, which led to the 1962 doctors' strike and set father against son, family against family, and neighbour against neighbour in a bitter struggle which will take generations to heal. Secondly, everyone in Saskatchewan must pay a premium, but under the Ontario plan those who are in need will be entirely looked after by the government; even those of limited income will have part of their premium paid by the government.

Mr. B. Newman (Windsor-Walkerville): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in the debate on Bill No. 136, an Act respecting medical services insurance, I would like to bring to the attention of the hon. members of this House the stand taken by the city of Windsor with respect to this topic. However, before I do this may I inform the House that the world health organization states in the preamble to its charter, and I quote:

Enjoyment of the highest attainable standard of health is one of the fundamental rights of every human being without distinction of race, religion, political belief, economic or social condition. The health of all peoples is fundamental to the attainment of peace and security and is dependent upon the fullest co-operation of individuals and states.

The Hall commission report states:

The commission is convinced that, quite apart from humanitarian considerations, the health of Canadians is a matter of concern to us as a nation, and that no enlightened government can ignore that the economic capacity of its citizens to be productive depends upon their health and vigour as much as upon their educational attainment.

We accept the statement of Sir Arthur Newsholme.

"Civilized communities have arrived at two conclusions from which there will be no retreat, though their full realization in experience has nowhere been completely achieved. In the first place the health of every individual is of social concern and responsibility. And secondly—as following from this—medical care in its widest sense for every individual is an essential condition of maximum efficiency and happiness in a civilized community."

Ever since 1919, all political parties have talked about implementing a national health insurance scheme. While Canadians talked, other countries acted. Britain in 1948 implemented their national health service and it has remained in effect since then, even though there were many years of Conservative government rule. Successful plans have also been operating in almost every western European country for many years. Therefore there is plenty of evidence that government-operated and controlled plans are effective. Medicare was dramatically introduced in Canada in 1962, when the Saskatchewan government, in spite of doctor opposition, implemented their plan. Even with the short time that it has been in operation, and in spite of this opposition, it would appear that the Saskatchewan plan is here to stay.

The Hall commission report has established a blueprint for the early implementation of a national plan on a progressive basis. It is our duty as citizens to see that it is implemented. Mr. Speaker, the Hall report continues:

The second most revealing piece of evidence was the sickness survey of 1951. It showed the appalling social and economic cost to Canada of ill health, proving that the family and the nation pay heavily in terms of lost production for failure to make available to all Canadian citizens the standard of health services we know how to provide. Nor is it only in loss of production that we pay. Many of our so-called welfare expenditures are the end result of illness, disability and premature death. Not all of these expenditures are avoidable, of course, but clearly many of them are.

To the extent, then, that health expenditures prevent or shorten periods of sickness, reduce the extent of disability, postpone death and contribute to the productivity of citizens, then to that degree health expenditures are investments in our human resources with the prospect of rich dividends.

From these few quotations, Mr. Speaker, it is easy to see why the Hall commission, after its three years of intensive study on a national basis, came to its conclusion that for the greatest public good a public-sponsored, universally controlled, prepaid Medicare scheme is a must.

Mr. Speaker, turning to my own community, the Windsor Medical Services Incorporated offered one of the first, if not the first, non-profit, prepaid Medicare programmes in North America. Since its beginning in 1939, it has pioneered in relieving the burden of medical expenses from the pocketbooks of the residents of Windsor first, then of Essex and finally the counties in southwestern Ontario. It has been so highly regarded by the medical profession that very few doctors today practise outside the plan. It has been so highly regarded that study groups from many universities, cities, provinces and states have visited its offices to get more details as to its operation. In spite of its fine operation and excellent management it has had over the years to raise its fees time and time again to cover its costs for services. The fee increases have been justified, especially since Windsor's aging population is disproportionately large and as a result, demands for health services have been much greater.

Thirty years ago Windsor had one of the youngest populations in Canada, because of the boom in the late twenties when younger people flooded into our community. Now Windsor has one of the oldest populations, well above the provincial average; as of 1961 the provincial average of people 60 years and older was 11.7 per cent. Windsor's as of 1961 was 15.9 per cent, or an average of 36.6 per cent greater than the provincial average. Such large numbers of senior citizens belonging to the Windsor medical services, would only naturally cause the fees for such medical services to increase. In September, 1964, a rate increase of 30 per cent was instituted. Because Windsor is a highly unionized community, a large percentage of its residents have their medical premiums paid by their employers. In addition to medical services, many industries also pay for employees' prescription drugs under a Green Shield prescription plan.

Let me, Mr. Speaker, read to the hon. members of this House, just what the Green Shield prescription plan offers. I will read only a very small portion of it:

What does it offer you? The following medical and dental prescriptions and prescription services are available to subscribers and their dependants from member pharmacies of their choice, subject to conditions listed under waiting period and exemptions.

1. Prescriptions written by a licensed medical practitioner or dentist, which are dispensed by a member pharmacy.

2. Newborn children are eligible for all benefits from birth.

3. If vacationing, travelling or temporarily residing outside the area in which member pharmacies are located, you will be reimbursed the same amount of money as would be paid to the member pharmacy for similar services in your own community.

4. Prescriptions may be repeated but only in such quantities as, and as many times, as are set forth in the service agreement.

These are only a few of the benefits from this Green Shield prescription plan.

Mr. Speaker, you can readily see that Windsor's residents had a very good Medicare plan. However, the Windsor city council, in its wisdom, on March 16, 1964, adopted the following resolution, and I am reading the resolution:

Whereas the enjoyment of the highest obtainable standard of health is one of the fundamental rights of every human being without distinction of race, religion, political belief, economic or social conditions, and whereas a high standard of health must include hospital care, preventive medicine, health education, diagnosis, treatment, rehabilitation of the disabled, administration of drugs and appliances and a whole range of health services to foster and preserve the physical and mental well-being of each man, woman and child, and whereas a voluntary privately administered government supervised medical plan would not achieve these aims and would, in fact, have serious defects, namely, (1) would not provide universal coverage; (2) provides for a means test which is degrading because it fosters first- and second-class citizenship and, therefore, is extremely difficult to regulate and enforce; (3) leaves Medicare in the hands of private insurance companies, eliminating the possibility of providing care at cost, and makes health a matter of private profit; (4) ignores the problem of research, preventive medicine, rehabilitation, drugs and medicine and development of facilities and adequate staff; (5) makes no provision for the encouragement of group practice; (6) does not include a staging provision for a full health insurance programme; (7) represents a complete departure from the principle that was followed by government in its establishment of the hospital care programme;

Therefore be it resolved that the government of Ontario proceed as quickly as possible with the establishment of a universal government-sponsored and controlled medical insurance programme. The plan to be based upon the following principles:

(a) The medical profession will make medical decisions without government interference.

(b) A doctor may conduct his practice completely outside the plan if he chooses.

(c) Doctors will be free to choose their patients, and patients will be free to choose their doctors.

(d) A full and careful consultation with the medical profession in all stages of the development of the plan.

(e) A medical services commission with a varied representation will operate the plan.

(f) A staging provision for eventual full and comprehensive health care.

(g) The plan must be universal in scope with no means test.

(h) The highest possible quality of services must be available to all.

After the adoption of this resolution, the Hall commission submitted its final report. The Windsor council followed by adopting in its June meeting, in 1964, the following resolution:

That the city council endorse, in principle, the proposed plan for a universal government-sponsored controlled medical insurance programme as recommended by the Hall commission on health services.

It was quite evident, Mr. Speaker, that government-sponsored Medicare insurance was in the offing. The Windsor Medical Services Incorporated foresaw this, and so offered an extended health benefits plan in an attempt to ward off public pressure for a government-sponsored comprehensive Medicare plan.

In a very recent advertisement, in fact, May 22, 1965, the following official survey proves that long-term health care costs are divided in the following fashion: Dental care, 10 per cent; general health care, 19 per cent; prescribed drugs, 18 per cent; doctor care, 25 per cent; Ontario hospital services coverage, 28 per cent.

Thus you can readily see, Mr. Speaker, that Windsor medical services, plus hospitalization coverage, covers only 53 per cent of the total costs of long-term health care. If I am not mistaken, Mr. Speaker, the Windsor medical services gives greater protection than do most other medical services plans in Ontario.

Thus, 47 per cent of the remaining costs of a total health plan, or long-term health care, must be borne by the individual. Such limited medical and hospital services coverage is not sufficient. Even the Windsor medical services realize that 53 per cent of health service coverage was not sufficient, and so instituted what is called the extended health benefits plan.

The extended health benefits plan will cover 19 per cent of the general health care, and 18 per cent of prescribed drugs. That, combined with the 25 per cent for doctor care, and 28 per cent for hospital care, would now give approximately 90 per cent of the total health care. This new extended health benefit plan pays for prescribed drugs, dental care as the result of an accident, special nursing services, crutches, casts and braces, artificial limbs, eyes, ambulance services, wheelchairs and hospital-type beds, oxygen and equipment for its administration, laboratory services, care in a licensed private hospital, difference between private and semi-private room in a public hospital, and lastly, emergency accommodation of injured or ill away from home.

Mr. Speaker, having brought to the attention of the hon. members of this House the feelings of the council of the city of Windsor, a city that has pioneered in more social welfare programmes than any other Canadian city, a city with one of the best, if not the best, non-profit Medicare plan in Ontario, this same city now suggests a comprehensive government-operated universal health care programme. I respectfully suggest to the hon. members of this House that they vote for the amendment to this bill as proposed by my hon. leader.

The amendment suggests:

(a) A comprehensive government-operated universal health care programme.

(b) The patient shall have the right to be treated by a doctor of his choice.

(c) Doctors shall be paid on a fee-for-services basis, and shall be free to practise within or without the plan.

(d) There shall be no means test.

(e) Mental illness shall be treated on the same basis as other illnesses.

(f) Dental and optical services for children up to 18 years of age shall be included.

(g) Other ancillary medical and health care services, such as home nursing or orthopaedic appliances, chiropractic services, and so on, shall be phased into the programme as independent health services, in order that the programme shall be fully comprehensive by 1971.

(h) The bill in its final form shall be of such a nature that the programme can be readily integrated into a national health-care programme for all Canadians.

Mr. Speaker, may I conclude my remarks by simply asking that we have no second-class citizens in Ontario.

Mr. E. G. Freeman (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, during the debate on this bill there have been quotations from many sources and newspaper articles, magazine articles, and so on, or references made to various sources of information. Now, there is no point, and I think we all agree, in repeating and going over this same territory again. For that reason only—this is a tremendously interesting subject to me and to my hon. colleagues—but for that reason, the fact that we have had all these quotations from various sources, I propose to make my remarks very brief. But I would like you to feel, Mr. Speaker, and those hon. members who are in the House, that I am very sincere in that which I will have to say.

I would say, Mr. Speaker, that the Medicare health plan introduced by the CCF-New Democratic Party government in Saskatchewan has been—and I think by many hon. members of the government—has been pretty thoroughly investigated; and I think, even against their wishes they are basically in agreement with the fact that it is completely workable, practical and desirable.

Now, in connection with that, I would like to ask the hon. Provincial Secretary (Mr. Yaremko)—who leaves his chair—to recall the last election campaign in Fort William. I think he remembers the incident very vividly, too, and, I hope, these facts, as I think I do. He was speaking, of course, definitely not in favour of Medicare because that was part of our political platform and still is, but the hon. Provincial Secretary on the platform in Fort William or in the environs of Fort William held up a little bottle, I think, of aspirins, and a band-aid. And he stated to the people gathered—and I hope I have these facts correct, sir, and that he will correct me if I am not absolutely right—he held these two little articles up before the people assembled at this meeting, and he said, “This is what you will get under the New Democratic Party medicare plan.”

I would like to have the hon. Provincial Secretary's explanation.

Hon. J. Yaremko (Provincial Secretary): Mr. Speaker, I thank my hon. friend for giving me an opportunity of giving an explanation on the floor of this House. I was very much interested—

Mr. E. W. Sopha (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order—

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: Mr. Speaker, I was very interested in reading an election advertisement on the part of the hon. member. That ad spoke of medical care and it referred to the medical care plan as had been expounded by the hon. leader of the ND Party on a number of occasions—it said this: “This will cost you 30 cents a week.”

Mr. MacDonald: Right.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: And so I got up and I explained to the people that what 30 cents a week would buy was one tiny packet of headache pills and two band-aids. The NDP medical plan is going to cost the people of this province far more than 30 cents a week.

Mr. MacDonald: We have explained it.

Mr. Freeman: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. Provincial Secretary for his explanation and I regret that my remarks encompassed just one band-aid; he suggested two, very generous of him.

However, the hon. Provincial Secretary has a right to his own opinion and as a member of the government he is naturally going to fight strongly in retention of that opinion and he hopes that it will get over to the rest of the people. However, I do not agree with him and with the thinking of many of the other hon. members of the government.

I repeat, Mr. Speaker, that the plan that we have is completely workable, completely practical and desirable. Now I would say too, Mr. Speaker, that as far as Bill 136 is concerned, I think, regretfully, that if this bill carries in its present form, the people of this province will very soon realize that what they have had wished upon them is extremely low-quality medicare at extremely high cost.

I believe, as do my hon. colleagues—and, I think, our hon. friends to the right—that we must have a universal health plan under complete government direction and management. There is no real alternative. There should be no compromise under any circumstances. And I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that the people should not have foisted upon them this pale and utterly inadequate legislation.

Mr. L. M. Reilly (Eglington). Mr. Speaker, in taking part in this particular debate on Bill No. 136, may I say that my first thought is that I would be inclined to favour a comprehensive compulsory medical plan for all the citizens of Ontario. And then, Mr. Speaker, I found that when I began to delve into the particulars, I found that it was absolutely impossible to provide a completely comprehensive plan for the citizens of Ontario, regardless of cost. As a matter of fact, this government, Mr. Speaker, has done a great deal and has taken a step forward, a strong, long step forward—

Mr. Sopha: Where is the evidence of that?

Mr. Reilly: —in providing a plan that is making available to all the people of Ontario a medical health insurance service at a maximum amount of money.

Mr. Sopha: At a maximum fee.

Mr. Reilly: Yes, this is true.

What we have said in this bill, Mr. Speaker, is simply this, that we will help those who cannot afford it; to those who require assistance we are prepared to give it and those who are able to pay for it themselves, we will ask to pay for it themselves. And under those circumstances, we say, regardless of your age, regardless of your vocation, regardless of your medical history, we will make it possible for you to purchase a plan to cover your medical health service requirements.

Mr. Sopha: Now the hon. member has lost me.

Mr. Reilly: And not only that—so that the hon. member for Sudbury will be understood and will understand me—we said to them, “We shall not allow anybody to cancel this plan except you, if you want to cancel it.” We said, “This will be an uncancellable plan and it will be irrevocable; the only person who can revoke it is the person who is insured.” We have gone a long way in Ontario, and I will agree with the hon. member for Fort William that we have a long way to go.

You know, Mr. Speaker, a number of the hon. members in this House have been talking about a proposed income test versus the means test. I know that every hon. member in this House knows the difference between an income test and a means test, but surely you would not understand that by what we have heard in this House. There is no embarrassment from the standpoint of an income test. This is a regular form. It is adopted widely right across Canada; everybody knows what an income test is for and how it is used. It is accepted right across the country. We prepare it each year and all we have asked in this bill, under the circumstances, is that a copy of the income tax form be made available. Now, surely no one under those circumstances can suggest that we are trying to probe into somebody's income or into somebody's assets or suggesting to people that they make disposal of certain assets in order to qualify. All we suggest is, "Here, show us your income tax report and if you qualify for assistance partially or totally it is done on the basis of income tax."

I was somewhat surprised to hear the hon. leader of the Opposition, a man for whom I have a tremendous personal respect, suggest that this was a monstrous fraud on the citizens. I am inclined to think that this language was somewhat intemperate and certainly unfair, because it is an avenue in which he is particularly interested and I think, like most hon. members in this House, he is anxious to do something for the people of Ontario in relation to a medical health or services bill.

Mr. Sopha: He feels the same about the hon. member for Eglinton.

Mr. Reilly: Well, you know, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Sudbury suggested to this House that if education was the care of the mind then perhaps the medical services bill could be considered as care of the body. I will go along with him, but will remind the hon. member for Sudbury that when they started with public schools some 100 years ago they did not start out with a comprehensive scheme for education. They started out with a little red schoolhouse. We have added to that since in the public schools including textbooks and secondary schools and universities; all of this has been done over a period of time.

Mr. J. B. Trotter (Parkdale): Ryerson did it in the last century, and so do you.

Mr. Reilly: And now I hear my good friend, the hon. member for Parkdale. The thing I found out about the hon. members of this House is that they can twist certain things to suit their own particular purposes.

Mr. Freeman: Is that nice?

Mr. Reilly: It may be not nice, but it is true. For instance, in this House last year, during Health estimates, I heard hon. members of the Opposition stand up and say: "What are you doing to us with this OHSC? This is unfair. You are taking our money. We are subscribers. You are not delivering the goods. There is a shortage of nurses. There is a shortage of hospital beds. There is a shortage of doctors." And during this debate, Mr. Speaker, I heard the hon. member for Sudbury stand up and say: "I never heard any constituent of mine complain about the OHSC." I heard the hon. leader of the Opposition stand up and say: "I am proud of the OHSC." I heard the hon. member for Parkdale stand up and say: "You know, the Ontario hospital services commission have 99 per cent who have subscribed. Unquestionably, they are satisfied with what is being received." Then you see what I mean by twisting it to suit their own convenience.

I suppose, Mr. Speaker, that the strongest criticism that has been suggested here has been that the proposed bill is a bonanza for the doctors and for the insurance men. The reference that has been made by many hon. members of the Opposition in this regard, has been the retention ratio. They have suggested that the Hall commission report indicates that it should cost only about five per cent to administer such a plan. With the insurance companies, they suggest their costs are some 28 per cent. On the surface, this sounds like a logical argument until, of course, you delve in to find out what a retention ratio is. I plead not for the doctors and I plead not for the insurance men; I am thinking in terms of trying to be fair in connection with the requirements.

So we have the Hall commission report where it suggests it might be 28 per cent. But what is in this retention ratio of 28 per cent? Perhaps I should explain to the hon. members of the House that if the cost of medical services is $150 million, and if the cost of acquiring this amount is $15 million, the ratio is ten per cent. Under these circumstances, our government and other governments require insurance companies and also some doctor-sponsored groups to have a retention for specific purposes. They must retain a certain amount of funds available to avoid automatic increases all the time, as in the case of an epidemic of some particular kind.

Now, in addition to that, the Hall commission report said nothing from the standpoint of the cost of advertising. Now surely the hon. members of this House realize that if the government was to institute a plan of this nature, they do not go out and institute a plan without making it known to the people of Ontario. It must be advertised; the details must be brought to their attention. It is going to cost money to do this the same way as the insurance company does it.

I agree that from the point of administration that perhaps five per cent might be a fair way of arriving at it. Then we go on from the five per cent and say: "If it has to be advertised then we have to have extra dollars for this purpose." If we are going to say to PSI or if we are going to say to the indemnities companies that you must have certain reserves, then let us not build up the retention ratio on the basis of building in those reserves unless we do it for the Hall or for the other types of reports.

I see that my friend the hon. member for Sudbury has got a worried look. Perhaps I should explain. Let us think in terms of this five per cent, and let us be fair about it. PSI, in the last report of the Hall commission, have showed that they had a retention ratio of some 17.8 per cent. But of that 17.8 per cent, approximately ten per cent was in there for reserve. So the actual retention ratio for cost of administering was 7.8 per cent, not 17.8 per cent. If we are going to say that you must have reserves, then we must show the difference between the cost of acquisition, the cost of administering a plan and the cost of advertising and so on, in connection with it.

In a government plan, you say there should or should not be a reserve. I am suggesting that there should be a reserve. Experience has shown us this; it has shown us in Saskatchewan, it has shown us in the UK, it has shown us everywhere. It is not only a question of administration, because what has actually happened, as we were told in the UK, is they started out not on a guesswork, but on an actuarial basis where they figured it would cost £170 million, and within five years it was £809.

Mr. MacDonald: Let us be fair now, it is a smaller percentage of the greater wealth of the country.

Mr. Reilly: And what we must do, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Trotter: The hon. member ignored that.

Mr. Reilly: No, I did not ignore it. As a matter of fact, I will be glad to answer it.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I would ask the members to desist from interjecting. The member is trying to present his point of view, and I have watched him very closely. He did not interject very much when some of the other members were presenting their points of view, so if you would give the speaker your undivided attention I am sure the chair, as well as the speaker, would appreciate it.

Mr. Reilly: Well, Mr. Speaker, perhaps I am partially responsible for it, maybe I have aggravated some of the hon. members. Maybe it is good natured banter, and I am prepared to accept it in this way. I was suggesting that we have to build in reserves if we are going to pay any kind of attention to the experience that other nations and other provinces, such as Saskatchewan, have had. We should learn from them, and one thing we are going to learn from them is that invariably it costs more money than they ever estimated, or they ever actuarially counted on. This is natural. If you will permit a personal observation I have a plan for my employees in which I have said to them that anybody who is single pays 50 cents a week, anybody who is married pays 75 cents a week, and anybody who is married with a family pays $1 a week, and Len Reilly picks up the tab for the balance.

Some hon. members: Good old Len!

Mr. Reilly: But among them I found that no sooner had the plan been instituted than there were people who made use of it who had had no intention of making use of it before. This happens in every instance, in every type of plan. As soon as it is made possible, many of us will take advantage of a situation. Why? Because we feel that we are subscribers to that plan. We do not care what it is costing everybody, we know what it is costing us individually, and under those circumstances, if we qualify as subscribers, we want to be able to take advantage of the situation. This is human nature.

My friend, the hon. member for Woodbine, has suggested that perhaps $175 is too much money for someone to pay for a medical health insurance scheme, and particularly he was referring to someone in a lower income bracket. Sometimes I am inclined to share his viewpoint; $175 seems like a lot of money for somebody in a low income bracket to pay for medical health insurance.

Mr. Bryden: It is too much.

Mr. Reilly: And so they say it is a lot of money; in fact it is too much money.

Mr. MacDonald: The hon. member should not argue himself out of it now.

Mr. Reilly: Now, is it too much money, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. MacDonald: He is setting up the straw man, then setting it down.

Mr. Speaker: Order!

Mr. Reilly: And then the hon. member for Woodbine says, "We will take $175 and we will add to that the cost of $6.50 monthly for Ontario hospital services and we will add $78 a year, approximately $250 altogether for a person in a low income bracket to pay for health insurance services."

Mr. Sopha: Plus the cost of—

Mr. Reilly: Oh, plus the cost of many things, including a carton of beer if he wants it at the end of the week.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Reilly: Let us say $250, and let us say under those circumstances that this is correct, and that the fellow is earning some $3,000 a year in the low income bracket. Is five or six or seven per cent too much to protect your life and your family and your loved ones from the standpoint of health insurance?

Mr. Nixon: The Hall commission says it is.

Mr. Reilly: The Hall commission does not—not the way I read it.

Mr. MacDonald: Five per cent of $3,000 is $150, not $250.

Mr. Reilly: The Hall commission indicated that somewhere between six and seven per cent seemed to be a fair amount to pay for health insurance, as I read it.

Mr. MacDonald: That is less than $250.

Mr. Reilly: Under these circumstances, the hon. member for Woodbine suggests that this is a Cadillac and that everybody can buy a Cadillac who has the money to buy a Cadillac.

An hon. member: It is true.

Mr. Singer: Now we are getting down to it.

Mr. Reilly: Actually, see what we have done in this particular case—

Mr. Singer: Good health is only for—

Mr. Reilly: For those who cannot afford to buy it. We will provide it, and we will provide assistance. For those who cannot afford to pay any income tax at all, we will buy all the health services.

Mr. Singer: Better go to work for the hon. member and good old Len will give—

Mr. Reilly: As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, there are a lot of "good old Lens" in the province of Ontario; many of them. I had lunch with a chap the other day and I said to him, "With whom are you insured?" and he said, "I have health insurance through PSI." I said, "What does it cost?" and he said, "$13 a month, $156 a year." And I said, "What does it cost you?" and he said, "It costs me 20 per cent because my company picks up the tab for 80 per cent."

Under the circumstances he pays some $31.20 and his company pays $124.80 to make sure that this man and his wife and his family are covered with a PSI blue plan. The hon. member for Wentworth East said there were some 23,000 workers in Oshawa who did not pay a dime toward the medical health insurance plan.

Mr. R. Gisborn (Wentworth East): What a deduction.

Mr. Reilly: All right, call it what you will, Mr. Speaker, I am suggesting that there are a lot of people who are covered. The Hagey report has indicated that some 75 per cent of the people here in Ontario are already covered, plus the 7.5 per cent on welfare, for a total of some 82.5 to 83 per cent. I suppose what is true about this, is that in many cases of legislation we find that we cover the many in order to take care of the few.

In this House, Mr. Speaker, I heard a number of hon. members speak about the Alberta plan. They suggested the Ontario plan is on the same basis as the Alberta plan and that there were some 15 per cent of the people in Alberta who really needed it who did not get medical health insurance services. I am suggesting there is very little comparison between the plan in Ontario and the plan in Alberta.

Mr. Sopha: Tell us the difference.

Mr. Reilly: Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to tell the hon. members the difference. In the first place, we are far more generous with our assistance in the question of subsidies here in the province of Ontario than they are in Alberta.

Secondly, the hon. leader of the Opposition took a case where a man was earning $51 a week, then he got a magnanimous increase of $1 and got $52 a week, and then he had a third child, and the hon. member referred to him as a "three-time Charlie." Do hon. members remember the situation? Actually there was nothing difficult about a situation like this. In the first place, in Ontario, with $51 a week, he is completely covered if he is a married man with a wife and two youngsters. When he comes into the $52 range, the hon. leader of the Opposition pointed out he would receive $2,704 and he runs into a bracket where he would then have to pay something around $4 a month in taxes. Then he goes back with the third child and he has a further exemption. Under those circumstances he qualifies for total assistance. These are the three steps the hon. leader of the Opposition was talking about with regard to the "three-time Charlie."

In Alberta they do not take the steps on a $10 ratio that we have pointed out, but they say anybody who pays no income tax will be assisted, and anybody who earns from zero to $500 is put in a group and assisted. So what happens? In Alberta the man who is at $2,704 and has only $4 above a bracket pays the same and receives the same assistance as somebody who has $459 taxable income. They make no differentiation whatsoever between the chap at $4 or $494. What they have done is to group them all together and give them assistance from zero to $500. And then they go on and make no provision from $500 on!

Mr. Singer: What provision do we make here?

Mr. Reilly: We make a provision up to $500 single; then we go from there up to $1,000 for a married man, then from $1,000 up to $1,240 for a married man and a family—a decided difference and far more generous toward people who really need it.

Not only that, Mr. Speaker, we say to these people: "If you do not want to come into a standard plan similar to the PSI, what you can do is come into a co-insurance plan." I know the hon. member for Parkdale and the hon. member for Woodbine have suggested that perhaps this is not the way to do it, that they have been left with untold bills to pay. Candidly, I prefer a co-insurance plan as an individual, but what my government has said to me is this, "Reilly, you may have a choice; you may have the first $1 coverage if you want it, but if you want to pay less premium you can do so by taking some risk yourself!"

An hon. member: That is good, right.

Mr. Reilly: And by doing this they say, "If you want to take a risk and pay the first $25 for yourself, or $50 for your family, and if you want to pay 20 per cent of the costs involved, you may do so and you will have a substantially reduced premium to pay." I am interested, as an individual, in this; they are not forcing me to pay an extra amount. I think the co-insurance plan is well built and well planned and is very helpful to those of us who want a choice.

The hon. member for Woodbine—and I think I would have done the same thing if I had been a member of the Opposition—points out some situations here where somebody had to pay $2,644 on a co-insurance plan, or had to pay 20 per cent or 23.4 per cent. He illustrated some 21 cases. But do you know that what we have done in our case here, Mr. Speaker, is this: We have said to the people, "If you want every dollar, every first dollar coverage, you may have it!"

Mr. Bryden: That is by no means guaranteed in the bill.

Mr. Reilly: Yes, and instead of paying this $2,644, as was pointed out by the hon. member for Woodbine, the people could have insurance that would cost less than this for ten years or more and cover every first dollar. We have come a long way since 1958 or 1959 when we introduced the Ontario hospital services commission and we said to people: "You have saved up money for your old age and you are not going to allow anything to interfere and dissipate the assets that you have built up." This was a really worthwhile programme, and now we have gone on further and we have said: "If you are going to have any major abdominal or cranial operations that are likely to go into a series of doctors—maybe a battery of five or six doctors where it becomes really expensive—under those circumstances we are going to protect you and we are going to give you peace of mind."

Our government, the hon. members of this House, have done a tremendous job in this field and I think that instead of spending $70 million on it, if we had $270 million to spend on it right now, we could not institute the kind of plan the hon. members of the Opposition are suggesting.

Mr. W. D. McKeough (Kent West): That is right!

Mr. Reilly: That is quite obvious because commissioner Hall himself has suggested, first of all, it should be on a 50-50 basis with the federal government. Number two, he has suggested that this kind of a plan would last until 1971, until we have all the necessary facilities and our government has already started on those facilities.

You recall we suggested we will spend $114 million. The hon. member for Beaches (Mr. Harris) has pointed out that some of this money will be used in connection with training in hospitals and some of the money will be used for training dentists, and for training doctors and we will have more medical students at the end of each year for the next four or five years. Under these circumstances, we are planning—and I am surprised that the members of the New Democratic Party who have consistently said: "We believe in planning," now when we start to plan do not endorse such a plan as we have.

Mr. MacDonald: Does the hon. member call that planning?

Mr. Reilly: Yes, because we have said, "Under these circumstances if we cannot deliver the goods, let us prepare for them." And this is exactly and specifically what we are doing.

Mr. Sopha: No shortage of non sequiturs.

Mr. Reilly: There are some alternatives, Mr. Speaker. We could do what has been suggested, and we could do some more talking. We could wait for conferences with the federal government.

Mr. Sopha: One has been called for July.

Mr. Reilly: We could do nothing under these circumstances and sit idly by.

Mr. Young: Saskatchewan did not wait.

Mr. Reilly: We could wait until the government of Canada said to us, "Here is a 50-50 plan, go ahead." But we are not prepared to do this. Under the circumstances we say, "We are prepared to assist those people who really need it, and under these circumstances we will allow these people who can afford it to pay their own." Now, I am inclined to agree with the hon. member for York South when he has suggested that drugs, perhaps—and the cost of drugs is mighty important and should be considered by the Legislature and should be considered in a plan of this nature.

Mr. MacDonald: Is the hon. member sure he is talking about the government plan?

Mr. Reilly: Now, under the circumstances, I would be inclined to agree that perhaps the cost of drugs could be as high as the cost of the medical services provided. When a doctor calls and suggests that you should get for little Johnny—a dozen pills and they cost you $7.20—and you do this two or three times a week, or two or three times a month as the case may be, for two or three youngsters—the drug bill can be pretty high. There is no question about it. But until the time comes that we can do something about this and make it inclusive, until we can spend the money and make a plan that is really worthwhile, I think that we have taken a first step and a step that is really worthwhile.

I am going to support this bill, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Singer: Not really?

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. MacDonald: The hon. member is riding the hon. Minister of Agriculture's (Mr. Stewart's) two horses now; he is going to fall; they are getting wider apart.

Mr. Reilly: The hon. member for Huron-Bruce suggested a few minutes ago that one-sixth of the people require the services of osteopaths. He suggested that it was something like $6 million involved, and this may be true. I do not know how many people require the services of legal men but I judge the lawyers are paid for their services.

Mr. Sopha: Not always.

Mr. Reilly: And I judge that if they require the services under those circumstances they will be available for them. And I am not suggesting that the osteopath also always gets paid for his services. The chiropractors, the optometrists—I think all of these services are worthwhile—but we cannot and it is impossible to have an all-inclusive plan. I think, if you are going to use the Hall commission report as the bible and an indisputable authority on health services, I have to say to hon. members, that Hall has suggested on page 3 that the individual should look after his own medical health requirements.

It is so easy to take something out of context, you see, and use it to your advantage.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Reilly: And I am just proving to hon. members how easy it is to do it.

Mr. S. Lewis: We are convinced.

An hon. member: I knew the hon. member was wavering.

Mr. Reilly: Mr. Speaker, my first reaction as pointed out formerly was to think in terms of a comprehensive, compulsory, universal kind of health insurance scheme.

Mr. MacDonald: The hon. member was right then.

Mr. Reilly: And under the circumstances, having had the time to study this and having had the time to delve into all aspects or most aspects of it and spent some several hours and several days in connection with it, I have come to the conclusion that no sane, no thinking person, no reasonable person would try to foist upon the people of Ontario some kind of a scheme that would not work. And what we have done is this: We have put first things first—

Mr. MacDonald: A scheme that will not work!

Mr. Reilly: —and we have suggested to them that we will pay for those who require assistance and we will help those who are in a low-income bracket, and we will allow those who are able to pay to continue to do as they have done for years to protect themselves and protect their wives and protect their families on this basis.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, at the outset of this afternoon's session, I had some equivocation as to the nature of my contribution to this debate. But my soul and verbosity have been strongly animated by the hon. member for Eglinton who preceded me. I should therefore like to deal with some of the contentions he put forth to this House, and end with some specific and more modest points that I had intended to propose initially.

The hon. member for Eglinton, Mr. Speaker, is preoccupied with what he called "twisting of words and of legislation and of proposals." I would say to the hon. member that I have heard him sing a fine tune in this House, and he himself does a very commendable twist. We have had it now for the last little while and I would like to deal with certain manifestations of it.

The hon. member for Eglinton's first instincts, as always, were the right instincts. A compulsory universal plan was justified. It was fascinating that a Tory should have such instincts, Mr. Speaker, and it is a happy fact that the hon. member for Eglinton does so. But he said that after having accepted this inclination to a universal compulsory plan, he then re-examined the financial apportionment of the plan and came to the conclusion that it was not practical.

But, Mr. Speaker, he did not take the time of this Legislature to spell out its impracticality and he did not deny the fact that the figures which have been given in the Hall commission report are accepted, authoritative figures on the financing of medical care services across this country—equally applicable to this province. It is not sufficient to give us a facile dismissal of accounting, without giving some authoritative analysis.

Now, I want to offer a model plan operating in this province, a plan which in effect, reflects the Hall figures very accurately and puts to the lie, I think, the propositions of the hon. member for Eglinton and the hon. member for Oshawa who preceded him.

I have an audited statement of the Medical Care Insurance Plan, working in Sault Ste. Marie. It has a membership of some 18,000 people. That is a very small membership, as the hon. members of this House know. The membership incorporates a complete cross-section of the industrial plant and the community. It includes the pensioners and the high risks and many other elements. In 1964, the total per capita cost of the Soo plan was $35.57, total.

The direct patient costs were $27.14, and that includes everything from the proverbial band-aids described earlier in this debate, to direct medical-surgical care. The administrative costs—and I emphasize this for the hon. member for Eglinton—were $6.41, and that included the physical plant, maintenance, lights and fuel. The balance, therefore, was $2.02 for depreciation and general reserves: not ten per cent, but $2.02 of the total $35.57 cost.

Now, Mr. Speaker, that figure is in line with reality. It is a figure which is based on a very small proportion of the population, but one which reflects an excellent cross-section. And if I can inform the hon. members of this House, and bring them up to date, in January of 1965, of this year, the figures for the same plan read as follows:

In a total plan population of 17,691, the direct patient cost was $28.63; the administrative costs $4.21; and the balance of receipts and general reserve $2.16, for a total of $34.08.

Thus, it is completely within the capacity of the province of Ontario to provide a similar plan, at similar costs, for every single citizen in this province. And with administration costs much lower.

So I think that it is not sufficient to deliver the statements, eloquent as they are, filled with congenial bravado as they are, without backing them up with some authoritative analysis.

The second thing is that the hon. member for Eglinton admitted in this House, and one is glad to hear the hon. member do so—I have no doubt but that his voice is the voice of the government—that there was a shortage of nurses, doctors, ancillary staff and paramedical personnel. Further, that this shortage had plagued the government and the province for some time. We quite agree with him. But what, in fact, this plan is doing by specifically excluding all the paramedical groups in the province of Ontario, is to put an ever greater pressure on the limited medical resources available. Indeed, it is pushing them to the breaking point, and it is completely incomprehensible that the hon. Minister should allow it to happen—unless the general practitioner approach is of the same mentality which governs this plan.

Third, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Eglinton said that the retention rate was a matter of great concern, and indeed it is. The hon. member attempted to refute the suggestion that 25 to 28 per cent retention rate was out of line by pointing to PSI with 17.8 per cent last year, of which ten per cent was reserve.

Well, Mr. Speaker, a government does not need reserves in this kind of a plan. The province of Ontario is itself the reserve. To compare it with the inequalities in the United Kingdom, is, I suggest, irrelevant, because although the rates in the United Kingdom have risen and the costs have risen, the rate has remained at precisely the same percentage of the gross national product, four per cent right across the line.

In addition, Mr. Speaker, the cost in Saskatchewan in the first year, was somewhat under the estimates, providing further corroboration that quibbling with the retention rate and pretending that it does not in fact mask an exorbitant profit, cannot be upheld.

Fourth, Mr. Speaker, we talked about the cost and the hon. member for Eglinton had many interesting things to say. The hon. member asked—I am sure rhetorically—whether $175 was too much. Then he added in hospital insurance coverage and asked if $250 was too much. Then, under the urgings and proddings of some of the hon. members in the Opposition, he included drugs and dentistry and the figure augmented—we must have reached the realm of $350 or $400 for total medical services.

The hon. member for Eglinton asked if that was too much, and related his question to the income of a man making $3,000 a year. The hon. member then suggested that the total outlay on medical services would be five, six or seven per cent.

Well, it is not five, six or seven per cent. It is ten, 12 or 15 per cent. If five per cent is abhorrent, then 12 per cent is completely unjustified—no matter what is calculated. The hon. member for Eglinton cannot pretend that a man making $3,000 a year income should have to spend $350 to $400 a year on medical care services. I strongly suggest that whimsical Tory paternalism is not sufficient to make up the difference. The suggestion that the man can buy a Cadillac and that this government will subsidize the low income groups, is not sufficient in any recognized and rational form of social planning.

That brings us to planning. I want to say, Mr. Speaker, in answer to the hon. member for Eglinton, that this is not a plan. This is frankly an abortion. You do not dignify this kind of scheme by using the word planning. This is a desperate effort to keep the finger in the dyke of public opinion, and there is no overall working of this plan into a medical health services framework for the province of Ontario.

There is not a hint of what the premiums will be as yet. There is not a hint of statistical analysis. There is not a hint of further phased portions in the future. There is not a hint of the extent of committee study that this bill might get before it goes through the House. There is not even the semblance or shadow of planning, and it is a mockery to suggest it.

The hon. member for Eglinton says, finally that he will support the plan and it is a good first step. I sometimes wonder that my hon. Tory friends do not grow weary of this first step paralysis of theirs, the fallen arches of the first step syndrome that sits up there on the Tory benches. We never get beyond the first step; we are a province of first steps; we are addicted to first steps; and when a government has an opportunity on the basis of reasons and factual documentation to introduce a bill, it should take something more than a minimal first step.

I want to move to yet another aspect of this plan, which frankly causes me considerable concern—I do not imagine that that concern will be shared by the hon. members opposite, but I shall raise it. There is another principle of this plan which totally flouts all that we wish to have in an ideal medical service, indeed, in any reasonable medical service. I suggest to you that it is a principle which has not yet been discussed on the floor of this House and I want to raise it at this time. It relates to mental health, and it reflects much of the argument and the discussion that has characterized the public press and public opinion for the last few weeks.

This bill, as presently drafted, and with the exceptions it lists, enshrines in the province of Ontario, the distinction between a fee-supported and a tax-supported mental health service. And that, Mr. Speaker, is totally unworthy of any government. It is a serious and unreasoning discrimination against mental hospitals in the province of Ontario. It continues to develop in the public mind and, indeed, in the minds of the practitioners themselves—this iniquitous and odious distinction between mental health and physical health in the province.

One would think, Mr. Speaker, that a Minister who has made the verbal pretensions of the hon. Minister of Health, that “mental health is the number one problem in this province” would use this bill as an avenue to demonstrate the truth of that maxim; to demonstrate the sincerity of what he says. But all we have done again is to maintain the gap and disparity between different kinds of service. It strikes yet another blow at the morale and the kind of service provided and the public response to the mental hospital tax-supported service, as opposed to the other fee-supported service.

What do I mean in actual fact, Mr. Speaker? I mean simply this: That in the private practice of psychiatry in the community and in the psychiatric wings of general hospitals and in psychiatric care in certain community agencies, the psychiatrist will be paid on a fee-for-service basis. In all the psychiatric care in the mental hospitals, we remain on this salaried basis where there is no question that the entire profession and, indeed, the ancillary professions, are grossly underpaid. And this bill contributes strongly to the maintenance of the appalling financial situation in one Ontario hospital after another in the province of Ontario.

Indeed, Mr. Speaker, it may very well be possible under this legislation for a private psychiatrist to treat a patient in a mental hospital and be paid a fee for service for so doing, while all the doctors around him are on a salaried basis. Yet again, I say that we confirm in the profession's mind and in the general public mind, that there is inequality of service, that there is somehow a distinction. This contravenes all the protestations of the hon. Minister. Lest the hon. Minister thinks I am giving personal opinions, let me convey to this House the feelings of the profession and the interested individuals involved.

The Ontario psychiatric association submission to the Hagey commission, recommendation 1:

All prepaid medical insurance plans should cover mental illness on the same basis as any other illness.

Recommendation number 5:

Active hospital treatment for acute psychiatric illness should provide medical fees for specialists as for any other illness and according to the Ontario medical association schedule. Services must be available on medical advice to the individual patient, wherever treated. The principle here is that of designation of patients or illnesses, rather than of location.

Thus would be included hospitals operated under The Mental Hospitals Act, The Psychiatric Hospitals Act, The Community Psychiatric Hospitals Act, and so on.

I would also point out the comments adjacent to these recommendations on page 9 of the brief: “This axiom,” say the psychiatrists, “was accepted by the committee as the basis of the established policy and no further justification is made herein.”

Alas, Mr. Speaker, those gentlemen should have made further justification because it did not penetrate the truculent Toryism of the hon. Minister of Health.

And then we move to the submission made by the Canadian mental health association to the Hagey commission, recommendation number 1:

That any legislation respecting medical services insurance in Ontario be so compiled that it provides for medical insurance plans to cover mental illness on a basis no different from that of other illness.

Recommendation number 2:

That since the type of medical service and care which a mentally ill person receives, is often dependent upon the geographic location of his community, thus resulting in one patient receiving a service which is tax-supported while another receives a service which is fee-supported, and since such a distinction between the types of service is a strong factor in perpetuating the stigma of mental illness, the principle be accepted of insured benefits being made available when and where needed by the patient.

Indeed, Mr. Speaker, that is something which this bill simply does not do. It is utter folly, I suggest, for the hon. Minister of Health to bring in this type of major legislation at this point in our evolution of mental health services. He neglects the warning of the profession in the field at his peril. It will result in, I suggest, a much more difficult time for his department—unnecessarily.

There is yet another point about this bill, relating to mental health. There are specific limitations placed on psychotherapy; limitations much more severe than the limitations suggested by the profession itself; much more severe than that embodied in other plans already operative across the country.

In the Maritimes medical care insurance scheme, the maximum liability for psychotherapy is nil; in PSI the present scheme is more attractive; in Manitoba medical services the maximum liability for psychotherapy is nil; in Medical Services (Alberta) Incorporated, the liability is at least twice that which is being offered by the government of Ontario.

I say to the hon. Minister, Mr. Speaker, that if, in fact, psychotherapy is required, society does not legislate its limitations. Indeed, within the federal civil service where psychotherapy has been included within the the medical services plan, it has worked reasonably as a part of that plan. It has never involved more than 1.7 per cent to 2.5 per cent of the group; it has been of minimal cost, easily incorporated, and is a decent, mature and profoundly important measure in the field of mental health services.

So this bill and the principles which it reflects are inimical to an intelligent evolution of the mental health pattern in the province. I know the hon. Minister will one day have to amend it and I hope when he does, the doctrinaire and myopic attitudes will have departed.

I have one final word to say on this, Mr. Speaker; this business of exclusion and of limitation pervades the legislation. It is not only limited to mental health and it is not only limited to periods of pregnancy and well-baby care and annual checkups—all things which are fundamental and indispensable to a health plan. It also relates to the so-called paramedical groups—and let us clear something up on the floor of this Legislature. Perhaps I can engage in a dialogue with the hon. member for Eglinton again, to which he will, as before, be kind enough not to give answers. It is simply this: We believe, Mr. Speaker, that where services are listed within the OMA fee schedule, which are presently being provided by optometrists, oral surgeons, chiropractors—other than general practitioners—then that group of people, for that group of services, should be compensated. It is discriminatory and unfair in the extreme that they are not to be.

We are not saying, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. Minister should extend the plan to embrace all the services provided by these groups. We are simply saying that where it is written into the OMA fee schedule that such groups can provide this service, they should be compensated. They all ask for it themselves; it is a principle to which we adhere under The Workmen's Compensation Act in many cases, and under their pieces of legislation by this government. I point out to the Speaker and to the hon. Minister of Health opposite, that it is we who passed The Optometry Act; it is we who sanctioned the college of dental and oral surgeons, it is we who legislate for the operation of these groups in the province of Ontario.

Why, then, can they not receive the fees under The Medical Care Act for services identical to those given by physicians and sanctioned under the OMA fee schedule?

In innumerable ways, Mr. Speaker, this bill is profoundly lacking. I suggest that all the fundamental principles involved; lack of universality, lack of total coverage; lack of reasonable cost; lack of removing gradations of citizens who should be subsidized for medical care—that all these things are inimical to decent medical care legislation. We do not have such legislation, and it is profoundly wrong to call it even a first step, because it is in fact retrograde—minimally retrograde, but retrograde. It erects in the public mind and in the mind of the Legislature a rigid, inflexible and inadequate system of medical care. And it has been presented to us without authoritative financial analysis, without authoritative study and without authoritative, if I may say, Cabinet intervention, which I know is destined to come, but which I think should have come in much greater quantity earlier today.

Mr. A. W. Downer (Dufferin-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I would like to present to you some advantages and disadvantages of alternate schemes of Medicare to try to make you aware of the doctors' attitudes, which have been so poorly presented.

Actually, very few of us have any idea about the truth of the doctors' stand on this matter at all. If I can make a few points clear, perhaps we will be better informed and thus vote not from an emotional standpoint, for it is very easy to be emotional in this debate, but from a practical standpoint. This is an issue which will affect not only this generation, but future generations. It is a well-known fact that any government measure, whether it be family allowances, old age security or medical service, is well-nigh irrevocable.

I want to say this. Are we prepared now to set forth the regulations that will bind us forever? Or are we prepared to take one step at a time and thus avoid costly errors in a field where costly errors can mean millions in dollars and open the way to we know not what?

The hon. Minister of Health is giving us a light so that we can go forward. I shall try to prove to you that the doctors are as anxious as anyone—perhaps they are more anxious than anyone—that all people receive the best medical care available at all times. This only makes sense; the issue is how best to provide this care.

The Medicare furor stirred up so much controversy in Saskatchewan that during that controversy many varied opinions came to light, including much antagonism to the medical profession. So before we discuss plans for health insurance or medical insurance, I would like to point out some areas of discontent in the hope that we can help correct these false impressions, and to correct these half-truths harboured by a great number of people.

One of these is that the doctors treat only patients who can pay for treatment. I have never heard of this happening, and I have a great deal to do with doctors. It is true that some people who happen to be in the low-income group may make unreasonable demands and be held off for this reason, but any sincere individual who is ill and needs treatment will never be turned away by a doctor because he cannot pay.

It is widely reported, too, that people delay going to doctors because of lack of money. Actually, they spend a great deal more on patent medicines and alcoholic beverages than they do on medical care; they spend a great deal more than it would cost to see the doctor in the first place.

Many people are convinced that doctors are against any plan of health insurance because it may reduce their income. This is utterly erroneous. They are in favour of health insurance, but they believe that certain of these insurance plans will provide inferior care for the people. That this is so is becoming clear from watching the experience of other countries which have adopted such care. It is very true that quality of medical care deteriorates under bureaucratic control. Governments are concerned with masses, not individuals, and they cannot afford to deal with individual cases. It is too expensive, and medicine simply will not lend itself to mass techniques because no two individuals are exactly the same. Government regulations can only produce average care for the average patient in average communities under an average range of circumstances. That is true. And only the above average produces progress, and I feel this is good enough for us. Government regulations change very slowly, but medical knowledge changes and progresses very rapidly.

I would like to know if we want to be tied to a ponderous slow-moving machine, or do we want something more flexible and free?

I was reading in a very responsible magazine the other day that 90 per cent of all medicines and drugs that are used today were completely unknown 20 years ago. I was also told that 90 per cent of all the scientists who have ever lived are living today. This comes under a free enterprise system.

To come back to false impressions, many people have set forth the idea that the number of rejectees for the armed services in the last war was a shocking proof of inferior medical care. But, you know, actually it was the opposite. Most of these young men would not have survived to apply for the army without exceptionally good medical care because they could not afford it during the depression days; they could not afford medical care, and still the medical men looked after them in spite of the fact that they could not pay.

Now, these are a few of the complaints you hear, and all this sniping has undermined the confidence of the public in a dedicated and honourable group. Having had close contact with two generations of doctors, I know of no walk in life which could demand more in self-discipline, tolerance, compassion, self-sacrifice and humility than the practice of medicine. It is difficult to believe that the general public would accept these criticisms unless they were the result of propaganda by a group whose main business it is to reduce all people to a free Medicare level.

However, there is no doubt that this attitude is doing a great deal of harm. One of the things it is doing is deterring some of the most able and self-respecting young men from entering the medical profession. This is being felt very keenly; we are short of medical men and we cannot get young men to go into the profession. You will find this in Britain, and you will find it in medical schools throughout our own country—

Mr. A. E. Thompson (Leader of the Opposition): The government turned away 255.

Mr. Downer: —and it will do a great deal to lower the grade of medical care which can, and should be, provided in the future.

Now if we can help to correct these false impressions, it will be of great value to all of us.

Let us examine the plans for medical care insurance. In a general sense, there are three, and the details vary in every case. These are the plans. First, voluntary medical insurance, such as they have in Australia, and such as we are proposing here in the province of Ontario. Then you have the compulsory insurance plan such as they have in Sweden, Britain and Saskatchewan. And then you have socialized Medicare—a comprehensive scheme such as we find in the Communist countries. The care is taken over by the state and financed by tax money; all the employers and all the doctors are conscripted for service and on salary. This scheme is only in full force, as I said, in Communist countries. But many facets of the system are found in the British system and the Saskatchewan system. We have to decide, here and now, how far we want our country to progress into a socialist state. Are we sure that socialism is the type of government we want? Or does democracy still hold the same lure for us as for our grandfathers and grandmothers who braved the hardships of this great new land to preserve their freedom? We will agree—we will have to agree—that a government must take over certain areas in our lives to make living tolerable for us—schools and highways and parks and public health. But there comes a time when we must decide on the line between government providing the necessities, or going the whole way and taking control so that our freedom is lost.

This is the issue with socialized medicine. The health of the nation has emotional overtones; it provides a great hue and cry for the politicians. For this reason, the medical profession, it seems to me, is the first with its head on the block.

Then, too, the doctors are too busy with the care of patients to buck this feeling, or even to be aware of what is happening. I want to point out to you again that little-known fact that the doctor's objection to socialized medicine is not that he fears for his income—that is not his problem—but rather he resists the threat to his freedom. He is convinced that such a scheme will reduce the calibre of medical services the people will get.

Let us consider the Saskatchewan medical Act. So few people really know anything about it, even the medical profession. I have been asked on many occasions: "Have you ever read the Act?" I tried to do it last summer, and I tried to do it in the early part of this session when I decided to write this speech. Just a few days ago I looked it up again. It is so couched in legal terms, and thus so clouded, that it is tough going. But the gist of it is this: It is a compulsory scheme whereby every resident of Saskatchewan pays premiums to the Saskatchewan medical care insurance fund. The premiums are collected by the municipalities which are responsible for paying for those unable to do so themselves. If employers have an agreement with their employees for medical care they then advance the premium to the employees and the employer is responsible for any arrears, Mr. Speaker.

Now comes the rub. The Act is entirely administered by a commission appointed by the Lieutenant-Governor in Council, which simply means the Cabinet. Hence it is beyond the control of the Legislature and of the courts and this commission has complete jurisdiction over the medical services of Saskatchewan. It goes far beyond insurance in the normal sense. It actually provided for the control of the practice of medicine in the political, economic and legislative sense, and left the doctors no area of private negotiations with their patients. It is not beyond its powers to lay down the hours during which the doctors' offices may be open, the number of patients he will see in a day, the number of times he may treat a patient for any given condition, or where he may practice, and hence live. And all doctors, at the beginning, had to practise within the Act or leave the province.

Most people have the freedom to leave a job if they do not care for their employer. That is not true, or was not true, in Saskatchewan when the Act was introduced. In fact, I would say it was the most autocratic piece of legislation ever enacted in a democratic country. The doctors—justifiably, I think—refused to practice under this Act. They had no way of forcing the government to reconsider but by refusing their services in all non-essential areas until the Act was amended.

They called it a strike. I do not think it was strike at all. The doctors organized an admirable emergency medical service for the protection of their patients during the 23 days of the sit-down, if you like. The tales reported in the press were frightfully exaggerated. No one died for lack of care; inconvenience was the only hardship reported, and the only hardship the people suffered. The reaction of the people was to support the doctors. The results of the last provincial election amply pointed out where the people of Saskatchewan stood on this issue. They repudiated not only the party who introduced the Act, but the leader responsible for it.

Then they made an amendment. The amendment was really a small victory, but the doctors' colleagues all over America are deeply indebted to the Saskatchewan doctors for their brave stand. If such measures were left unaltered it would be a serious blow to humanity and to future medicine on this continent. The amendments were few and dealt with the basic freedom of the profession. The Act now permits any doctor to practise outside the Act if he so wishes. Approved health agencies such as PSI were allowed to continue to insure people, and the Swift Current board of health was allowed to continue; also, the college of physicians and surgeons now has to be consulted before any regulations relating to rates of payment are altered. It was written into the Act that it was not the intention in any future Act, or at any future time, to put the physicians on salary.

The doctors accepted these amendments and now practise under the scheme. However, as you can well imagine, things are far from running smoothly in Saskatchewan. It is estimated that medicine in Saskatchewan has been put back ten years, at least, by this legislation. What is wrong with this scheme? First, it is undemocratic, to the point of denying basic principles of freedom, and giving a political group complete jurisdiction over the profession. There is no doubt that once government has successfully put medicine on this basis it could proceed to some other group and legislate its freedom away, too. This is the thin edge of the wedge. It was compulsory so that people were forced to accept something which, in many cases, they had already provided for in more efficient form for themselves. Seventy per cent of the people of Saskatchewan were already insured for health services, and more comprehensively than the government provided. This scheme only pays doctors' fees, a very small part of health services. It was allocating large sums of the taxpayers' money in one area which could much better have been directed to more pressing need, such as mental hospitals, more general hospital beds, rehabilitation centres and facilities for training doctors, which the province needs so desperately at this time.

It has been shown to be very uneconomic from an administrative point of view; it is always uneconomical for a government to handle such a service. This is an amazing thing, but during the past 14 years Britain has not built any new hospitals—

Mr. Bryden: They have had a Tory government, that is why.

Mr. Downer: —but she has beautiful buildings to house the administrative staff of the national health scheme, and the staff now far outnumbers the doctors. Private companies can insure people much more economically; competition amongst them keeps up a high standard of services. This has been amply demonstrated in those countries where government has taken over control and administration of health services. There is not the money for research, and finally the quality of health care declines. Britain's health budget has risen from $600 million, counting the pound sterling at $3 per £1, 14 years ago to $2,100 million in 1964. And this figure is still rising.

Mr. Bryden: And what is happening to their gross national product?

Mr. Downer: What other plans are there? I am going to outline to you the one in use in Australia, partly because Australia has an Act very similar to the one we are introducing, and Australia has much the same idea of democracy. I am going to give the hon. members these ideas, because the medical care insurance in Australia is working out very well.

All areas are satisfied with it—doctors, people, even the Opposition parties are in favour, and labour, which originally opposed it, now agrees that it is an excellent idea. It was begun in 1949, so it has had a fair trial; one cannot say that it is something new. Let me tabulate the essential features:

First, it is voluntary. Second, it is non-profit. The insurance companies are private organizations called "funds," subsidized by the government so that the premiums will be kept within the contributor's means. These voluntary organizations are directed jointly by both medical and lay representatives of the contributors. The only government control is that of audit, hence the safeguarding the contributors' money. In order that the insurance funds will not be called upon unnecessarily, the contributor pays ten per cent of the doctor's fee. The patient thus has some direct responsibility for his care, and does not call upon the doctor for every snuffle. It is a fully comprehensive plan, covering all types of medical services, not just the doctors' fees. There is a waiting period of two to three months after joining before the rights to benefits apply. This increases the incentive to insure.

Lastly, the patient is encouraged to pay the doctor's bill personally, and then receive reimbursement from the fund. Where he is unable to do this, his benefit will be paid in the form of a cheque made out to the doctor rendering the service. This preserves the doctor-patient relationship, so vital to satisfactory medical care.

This scheme costs the government nothing at all for administration, except audit and supervision. This, and the fact that the patient pays a fraction of the cost, ensures that the scheme will not be abused and never reach uncontrollable dimensions as it has in England and as it has in Saskatchewan.

To provide for the incurable group, those over 65, those with pre-existing ailments, chronic illnesses and those who receive the maximum fund benefits, special amounts have been set up by all the major benefit societies. If at the end of the fiscal year payments out of these special funds or amounts exceed the contributions credited to it, the government makes up the difference.

Australia also has a pensioners' medical service, providing free general practitioners' attention to all eligible pensioners who qualify on a means test basis. The profession accepts a direct payment from the government for these, just as they do in Ontario at the present moment, at about 50 per cent of the usual fees.

We would do very well to look closely at this scheme. It seems to be satisfactory to all concerned, and the standard in Australia appears to be well maintained.

By this scheme, several basic principles are preserved. Every individual in society has a basic right to accept some responsibility for his needs and essentials. I think we can accept that, and the state should never completely provide these, because it is not economically sound and it also violates the freedom and responsibility of the individual. But whenever the state does this, it must also control, which makes political tyranny not only possible but probable. The Communist states claim this right and therefore they control.

This plan also preserves the all-important doctor-patient relationship, by ensuring that the doctor remains free of any outside influence, no matter how slight the influence may be, in order to carry out his uniquely personal and intimate services to his patient.

What have we got here? Since 1935 we have had a medical care coverage, run by the OMA, under contract to the government, for certain groups of people—the old-age pensioners, mothers on government allowances, the blind, the disabled, the veterans. We have many insurance agencies with various plans available to all who can pay for them, such as the PSI, Continental Casualty, Canadian Health and Accident. Some of these were set up originally by the doctors; the PSI is a non-profit organization offering insurance at a reasonable rate to all who are insurable.

This plan is not perfect, by any means. It allows of violation of this doctor-patient relationship I have been talking about by having the doctors paid directly by the insurance company instead of through the patient. In this way the doctor must divulge the patient's records to a third party. This is always a sore point with the doctors. It violates the Hippocratic oath. This we are not in favour of, and this I say very definitely. Our plan does not have little deterrent fees, which would prevent abuse of the insurance. Now, these defects can be remedied.

We still have a group of people who are not insured—about 20 per cent of the population. Either they are uninsurable, or cannot afford to prepay insurance, although they are not indigent. It is to this group, and this group alone, that the government must direct its planning.

Therefore I am supporting this bill. We would like to have a non-compulsory medical insurance plan available to every resident with no disturbance to the 75 per cent or more of the population who are already covered, no disturbance of the doctor-patient relationship. All residents, regardless of age, physical condition or financial position can now obtain full medical coverage, the government providing the coverage of those not able to do so for themselves. A lot of people, of course, shy at the very mention of a means test. But, you know, all of us take a means test every year when we pay our income taxes. There is no indignity by this plan. I think the provincial government is to be congratulated on facing this issue and devising a scheme which appears to satisfy the many groups of people who will be involved, to say nothing of the general population.

But let us not be pressured into accepting schemes which are neither necessary nor suitable. Let us remember, too, that doctors are not against health insurance. In fact, any of the doctors that I have talked to so far are in favour of it, providing it allows a system which will better the care of the people rather than downgrade it.

Let us remember that the United States and Canada at present provide the finest medical care under the free enterprise system, and the best facilities for training doctors of any country in the world. Let us keep it that way. It is to Boston, New York, Montreal, Toronto and Western University and Chicago that young doctors now look for training. At one time they looked to Vienna and Heidelberg, and London or Edinburgh. Now they look to the medical schools on our own continent and to some of the medical schools in our own province. This is a fine relationship. This is a fine record; let us keep it that way. I support the bill.

It being 6.00 o'clock, p.m., the House took recess.

Mr. P. J. Yakabuski (Renfrew South): Mr. Speaker, I was pleased to see this Bill No. 136 introduced into this House on May 14 last, and I was also pleased to see debate begin on this bill on May 25 because I feel that the hon. Minister of Health (Mr. Dymond), his associates and advisers, have put a tremendous amount of thought into the legislation before us now. The hon. Minister of Health is a dedicated and sincere Minister, and I know of no other Minister in any jurisdiction more sincere and more dedicated than our hon. Minister of Health here in Ontario.

There was a time when certain people felt that the debate on Bill 136, or the Ontario Medicare bill, would be one of the most heated and fiercest of this Parliament, and what looked some months ago like a debate to be remembered has disintegrated into one of very weak argument. We have seen little coverage in the press regarding this legislation, and we have heard very little controversy from our people back in the ridings, or on the home-town streets.

The people of this country have taken for granted that this province would shortly be introducing a Medicare bill. People in Canada have waited 43 years for the Liberal Party in Ottawa to bring out a plan on a national level. I would not be surprised that now the leader province, Ontario, has embarked on a Medicare plan, "Pearson the Plunger" will follow us shortly.

I asked myself when this measure was introduced—or when this measure was contemplated—why was not Ontario the first province in this country to have the Medicare plan? Why were Saskatchewan and Alberta, who are far behind Ontario as provinces, bringing out progressive legislation, ahead of us, bringing out a Medicare plan? But on looking into the matter a little deeper we realize that those provinces, when they did bring out their Medicare plans, had a very small percentage of their people covered by a private Medicare insurance. I realize that the banner province of Ontario, with 75 per cent or more of her people covered by private medical insurance, had no real urgency in going into this legislation.

The people of Ontario who I have spoken to, the people in my constituency who have talked to me about Medicare, have mostly one thought in mind: Will your Medicare plan interfere with our private plan? I have assured them that it would not, because this province and this government is not in the habit of interfering with what already is good insurance.

The people of our province do not want compulsory insurance; the people of our province do not want to be compelled. The government of any province or any country never compels majorities. In some cases, minorities are compelled to accept the will of the people, as my hon. friends to the right have known for some time. Consequently, when our Medicare plan comes into operation, it will be introduced and begin operation in an atmosphere of harmony and peace, unlike the civil war that ensued at the beginning of the Saskatchewan plan.

I have to admit that there was a time when I, too, envisaged a Medicare plan as an all-encompassing one, but on checking statistics, I can readily see why my government, in all its wisdom, is adopting the plan that has been presented.

I have to admit, too, that I might have liked to have seen the ophthalmologists, the optometrists, the chiropractors and drugs covered by our plan. The oculists, I feel, could, by being included, save this province much money in future welfare payments by correcting eye problems today. And, of course, the optometrist plays a large part in eye care and in directing clients to an eye specialist.

The chiropractors, too, I feel, should be covered immediately because they, too, have a large number of our residents who visit them frequently for one ailment or another. They, too, are recognized by the workmen's compensation board, and for that reason, I feel that they are an important segment of health care in this province.

I might mention that I feel that the cost of drugs will have to be included in the Medicare plan in this province. We all realize that it is one thing to pay a visit to the family doctor and perhaps pay him $5 for that visit. Then you are handed a prescription and you walk across the street to the druggist and find that you are paying $8 or $10 for the drug that the doctor has prescribed. Twenty-five years ago, what good Churchill's iodine might have done, now we are required to pay $8 to $10 for some myocetin or other antibiotic. At one time this province did have a Royal commission investigating the cost of drugs and I feel that that commission did not delve deeply enough into the cost of this commodity.

We consider that this is a strong beginning in the Medicare field in this province and I am sure that in the not-too-distant future, the segments that have been omitted and that I have mentioned, will be included. We will hail his plan as another major step in the progress of this province.

I have made certain observations in listening to hon. members of this House participate in this debate and I was most interested in the statement made by the hon. member for Huron-Bruce (Mr. Gaunt), when he was mentioning something about being consistent. We all recall that frosty Friday morning in March, 1964, when the then member for Dovercourt, now the hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Thompson), rose in this House—

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Yakabuski: He rose in this House on that frosty Friday morning and made a very impassioned speech with regard to section 14 of Bill 99. As a matter of fact, if the hon. leader of the Opposition ever made a speech, that was it.

An hon. member: What side is the hon. member on?

Mr. Yakabuski: On that occasion, in his best form, he came out against this government and the province encroaching on the rights of individuals, and now, when we are debating our Medicare plan, he feels that we should have a compulsory plan. The hon. member who, a little over a year ago, would not encroach on any of the rights of the citizens of this province, now feels that it is quite in order to do so. I ask the hon. members of this House who is being consistent?

It is easy for the official Opposition and the NDP to scream for this and for that, for schemes of all descriptions that would be beyond the financial ability of our people. Many are sound businessmen in their own ridings, but as members of the Opposition they become spendthrifts and lose sight of the sources of our revenue and how far they will go toward meeting the most urgent needs of our people. It is quite easy to talk; it is quite easy to advocate many things. If one does not have to put up, it is pretty hard to get them to shut up.

I might say, Mr. Speaker, in closing, that I am supporting this bill completely because I feel that this will be the beginning of the greatest health plan known anywhere on this continent.

Mr. H. S. Racine (Ottawa East): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak on this bill, I recall vividly being part of a group of persons who presented a brief to the Royal commission on health services on behalf of the Canadian welfare council. The comments from Mr. Justice Hall and several other members of the commission—and I would like to say that most of the members were either former Tories or present Tories—were very favourable and many of the recommendations of that brief are now included in the final report of the Hall commission. I mention these facts, Mr. Speaker, to show that I was interested in that problem long before fate would have it that I take part in the debate on this bill.

I heard many comments from hon. members on the government side to the effect that the Liberal Party had changed its position over the years on this important matter regarding the health of our people, and I say, why not? Our party is, has been, and will always be the party of reform and we cannot but go along with the Hall report because it is in accordance with the views of our party after very thorough research in this field.

May I make a comment or two on some of the remarks made in this debate by some of the hon. members on the other side of the House? The hon. member for Oshawa (Mr. Walker) said this afternoon that the people of Ontario cannot afford the cost of the complete programme of medical services. They receive these services by either paying a premium to a private insurer or a co-operative such as PSI or AMS. Many have gone heavily into debt because of serious illness in their family in order to obtain medical services. The only people who do not have to worry about the problem are those who are now receiving welfare allowances and this bill does not change this situation.

The hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Downer) has succeeded in giving us the Tory approach to this Medicare programme. His remarks have convinced me that this province cannot afford not to have a comprehensive, universal health insurance plan.

Mr. Speaker, first of all let me commend the hon. Minister of Health for his honesty and his complete frankness in introducing this bill. As he stated in this House last week when he introduced this so-called Medicare, this bill is by no means the final word in health care in Ontario. For recognizing this obvious fact the hon. Minister must be commended, but we on this side of the House are disappointed, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. Minister did not have the courage to admit what must be apparent to everyone that this bill is not even an adequate beginning.

To give the hon. members some idea of the inadequacy of this bill I would like to quote now from the May 27 edition of the Globe and Mail, on page 7, and show some of the inadequacies in the preparation behind the bill. The report in the Globe and Mail reads, and I quote:

In the introduction to the bill, Dr. Dymond admitted we would still need to know a good deal about the adequacy of insurance contracts in force.

Again:

We have scant knowledge of how much care is provided for those who have no insurance and cannot pay for their health care, nor have we any reliable statistics of the cost of such care. Of course, we could apply national or provincial averages, but there are many factors involved in health care so that at best such averages might be little other than educated guesses, Dr. Dymond said.

Still quoting:

All this vagueness is odd, for as Dr. Dymond declared when asked about certain criticisms of the proposed Act, "This bill was not created overnight, you know. I have been worrying on this exactly six years."

That is the end of what I want to read from the Globe and Mail.

The hon. Minister has been working on this Medicare bill for six years, and yet in that period of time he has failed to collect the accurate statistical information that is absolutely necessary to draft adequate and proper legislation regarding medical health insurance. Small wonder that this bill is inadequate.

The hon. members on the government side cannot deny that this bill is inadequate. They probably will deny that this is Medicare. They will undoubtedly object that this bill is not referred to as Medicare or as a Medicare bill, but as a medical services insurance bill, and that nowhere do the terms Medicare or Medicare insurance appear in this bill. Of course, they are right. Medicare is a word which has been coined and it is not the kind of word which one would expect to find in a bill of this nature.

Yet the hon. members of the government cannot deny that this bill is called a Medicare bill by the press and accepted as a Medicare bill by the public. In this sense the government of the province is deceiving the people of Ontario. This bill is not Medicare, and the sooner the government admits that to the people, the better off it will be. If this is an attempt at Medicare then it is a crazy patchwork attempt, a hodge-podge of ideas, a bill which complicates and confuses basic principles so much that we on this side of the House must wonder whether the government is really that naive about the legislation it drafts or whether it is so much in love with the administrative red tape and outdated philosophy that it consciously chooses the worst methods available to achieve politically desirable goals.

I have said before, Mr. Speaker, that this is not really Medicare and I feel I must explain further what I mean by this. Medicare is an artificial word, and so it has many meanings and many connotations, but one thing which it definitely does imply is universal coverage for illness. By universal coverage I mean that adequate health services shall be available to all the people of Ontario, regardless of where they live, their present or future state of health, their financial resources. This is something which the present bill does not guarantee and so it cannot truly be called Medicare.

I know that in this explanatory note attached to the bill, it is stated that the purpose of the bill is to make medical insurance available to every resident of Ontario regardless of age, state of past or present health, financial means or occupation, and to do this the government intends to provide, through The Department of Health, medical services insurance for those people who are unable to pay the whole of, or part of, the cost of such insurance.

This all reads very well but is this actually what the bill does? I say, no, Mr. Speaker, it does not. There are three economic sections in our economy. There is the lower economic group on relief and on pension; there is the middle group, the low-income group, and there are those in the higher bracket. The ones in the lowest economic group are cared for. They can get their insurance through the government; whether they will take out insurance or not is another matter entirely, and which I am sure will be discussed in much detail before this debate is over. The fact remains they can get it, they are cared for within their very narrow limits of coverage offered by this bill. What of the higher income group? Obviously, they can buy it, so we have disposed of the two extremes.

When we come to the middle group, the low-income group, that is another matter. Contrary to whatever the government says in that nice little explanatory note attached, so that we will not read the bill too carefully, the low-income group actually suffers under this bill. Why? Because they are making too much money to qualify for government assistance and not enough money to pay for health care. This is not just a theoretical argument, plucked from nowhere, but is borne out by the statistics which abound in the Royal commission on health services report and which the government chose blatantly to ignore.

The information in that report indicates that the total costs of health care, including medical, dental, drugs and other services, is approximately $346 a year for an average family. The report goes on to point out that the maximum any family should spend on health is seven per cent of its income. This implies that, in order to get full coverage, a family would have to be making $4,930 a year. The average family with two children must start paying taxes after it makes $2,700; thus, when its income reaches $3,700, it is not eligible for any government subsidy at all and yet it is still $1,300 shy of the income that the Hall commission recommends is minimal to buy adequate health coverage.

And now the truly shocking thing: Over 20 per cent of all the families in Ontario fall in this income group. That is, one-fifth of Ontario's population will not be able to afford to buy medical insurance under this plan—and the government calls this a universal plan! But the fact that it is not universal, Mr. Speaker, the fact that it is not Medicare is only one of the glaring deficiencies of the legislation we have before us. If the government were to admit to the people tomorrow what is certainly the truth, that this is not a Medicare scheme, that it applies to only four-fifths of the province, we would still take issue with this bill and this government.

Let us examine the implications of the government's so-called income tests. I say,

"so-called" because it is a means test and not only a means test but one of the worst kind of means test. A test that determines only income and not ability to pay and a test that is impossible to enforce in any case. We in the Liberal Party are opposed to means tests but, at least, we realize that means tests do determine ability to pay. Income tests do not even do this, they merely determine income and the two things are not necessarily the same in every case. So we are opposed to an income test on this ground and we are also opposed to it because it is impossible to enforce.

Presumably the hon. Minister of Health or his new creation, the medical insurances services division, is just going to open up an office somewhere and say to the people: "Come on in, sign up for free medical insurance; by the way, how much income tax did you pay last year?" The people do not have to tell them, the government has no way of checking; Ottawa will not release the figures. I can walk into the hon. Minister's little office and say: "Look, I did not pay any income tax last year." And he will not know whether I am telling the truth or taking the government for a ride. And what is more, he cannot find out. If the government had looked at Alberta they would have seen that this scheme is full of loopholes and escape clauses. They would have seen that Alberta runs a similar income test and approximately 2,000 people a year lie about their income tax returns; at least they think so. They cannot find out for certain and neither can the government of this province. This is not a nice thing to say about the people of Ontario that they will falsify their tax returns but unfortunately it can happen. It did happen in Alberta, and it can happen here.

Mr. A. Carruthers (Durham): Is that a Liberal decision?

Mr. Racine: And if the hon. member does not believe it, then let him go into a liquor store some day and read the signatures and addresses on the order slips.

Interjection by an hon. member.

Mr. Racine: So now we have a government bringing down a plan which leaves four-fifths of the province of Ontario no better off than they are now, and administering a test which is clumsy, inaccurate and cannot be verified. In effect they are handing out over $70 million of public funds a year on the honour system.

Mr. L. Letherby (Simcoe East): I take it he does not like this bill.

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): The hon. member is right.

Mr. Racine: There is another more subtle aspect of basing free coverage on taxable income, which this House should consider. What are the psychological effects on the people of the middle class income groups? We have seen that economically they will not be able to afford to buy medical insurance. The Hall commission report makes this evident. Psychologically the damage may be much more serious. Our whole society was founded and has progressed on the basis of an incentive philosophy. People struggle to get ahead, to better themselves, and this is right and just the way it should be, but now the government is planning to move in and put the lower-income groups on the same level with the higher-income groups with respect to getting medical insurance easily and quickly.

What effect does this have on the small-income groups? They can go down now, as well as up. Their incentive and their desire to get ahead is no longer so important. If they slip back into a lower-income group, it is no longer so bad. In fact, it may be easier for them. This is a tremendous danger which the government has not foreseen. And providing free psychiatric help, as they do in this bill, will not help much in correcting it.

Consider an individual example: Let me quote to you from an article by Pierre Berton in Maclean's magazine. This article is dated June 15, 1963. Mr. Berton writes:

Most people don't want charity. Like Terry Louth, a Toronto chartered accountant who had suffered through five major operations for an ulcerous condition, they want to say "It's true," as the medical association keeps saying, "that no needy person has to go without medical care." But must Canadians be beggared before getting help? The Louths are certainly needy today. They spent all their savings, $3,000, sold their car, furniture, everything, before accepting welfare. Yes, they had a group insurance plan too, and it was not enough.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have a letter here from one of my constituents, in which he relates the fact that his wife was taken ill and had been in the hospital for many months. He was covered by two separate plans of insurance; one, at a maximum of $15,000 and the other at a maximum of $5,000. This man has had to spend considerable time minding the children at home, and when he was not doing that he was working in a second position in order to cover medical expenses. This man has been trying to get some relief—he may get it because of some error in the plan, but this man has certainly suffered considerably because of the fact that he was not covered by a plan such as we are recommending.

Mr. Speaker, you can see what that implies. The broad principle of equality of opportunity which is fundamental to this society is being ignored and even subverted by this government bill. The bill claims to provide equality of opportunity by allowing all people to purchase medical insurance, but what about people like the Louths, people who are just over the limit where the government will help them with their health problems? Are these people getting equality of opportunity or are they being encouraged to give up, to stop fighting serious crippling medical expenses, or to become wards of the state? In its psychological effects this bill is more than bad, it is downright dangerous.

Of course, you know our proposals for a comprehensive universal medical insurance. They have been outlined and will be outlined again in this debate, but I would just like to go over a few points in the programme of the Liberal Party. First, we will not use an income test, which has proved unworkable in other parts of Canada; second, coverage will be extended to all on the same basis and through the same machinery through which Ontario hospitalization is now available. This will ensure universal coverage, since more than 99 per cent of our people are now covered by Ontario hospitalization and will also eliminate the tremendous wastage that the government plan involves through high administrative costs. These points will be further brought out and explored before this debate is over, of that I can assure you; and as the debate proceeds I can assure you, also, that this fly-by-night bill, this piece of political pragmatism, will be shown up in its true light and exposed as what it truly is, a Medicare myth, designed to alienate no one and satisfy as many as possible, without really doing anything at all to provide universal, comprehensive health insurance in the true sense of the phrase.

Mr. Speaker, together with the other hon. members of my party, I propose to vote for the amendment proposed by my leader, the hon. member for Dovercourt.

Hon. M. B. Dymond (Minister of Health): Mr. Speaker, before I start to make remarks anent this bill, I would like to deal very briefly with a few things which the hon. member for Ottawa East just said.

First of all, he was quite right in saying that we would tell the public, tell you, sir, and the House through you, that this is not

Medicare. We have never pretended that it was Medicare. First of all, I do not know what Medicare is; I take it that Medicare is a complex of two words, medical and care. No government—I have said in this House many times—no government can provide medical care, because no government is capable of practising medicine.

Mr. Singer: What did the government say on its platform in 1963—

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Throughout all of the election campaign, sir, I defy any person in Ontario to find where I used the word “Medicare” as a part of the Progressive-Conservative Party’s platform.

Mr. Singer: Not you, but the government in their propaganda.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Mr. Speaker, I have noticed that running through the fabric of all the statements made by the Opposition, Medicare is used in conjunction with reference to the Hall commission report. Now, from that I have come to the conclusion that what they are trying to tell us is that, in their opinion, Medicare is what the Hall commission proposes—which is a total health care plan, and not only a plan that will insure people against the costs of physicians’ services. This is the purpose and intent of Bill 136.

The hon. member for Ottawa East said that four-fifths of the people will be no better off than now, because they have statistics and several hon. members of the Opposition benches have remarked that we did not have enough statistics; we have piles of statistics, Mr. Speaker, but it would not add anything to the debate by reproducing them here, except to fill a great deal of space in Hansard. Four-fifths of our population, we know, are well covered already by comprehensive insurance that provides protection against physicians’ costs, and by the terms of this bill—as is already evident, and we shall go on to show again—25 per cent are provided for under the terms of this bill.

I was rather interested to hear him say, sir, that the Liberals do not believe—and I think I quote him accurately—in the means test. I just leaned over to ask my colleague, the hon. Minister of Public Welfare (Mr. Cecile) if the federal government hands him out all the assistance for his welfare programme without insistence upon a means test and he assured me that this is not so. If the Liberal Party in Ontario does not believe in a means test, it is rather unique in Canada insofar as Liberals are concerned.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in listening to the hon.

leaders of the Opposition and the NDP (Mr. MacDonald)—and I tried to listen to them carefully—first of all, I was bound to come to the conclusion that the hon. leader of the Opposition apparently does not understand Bill 136, or if he does, he then, deliberately, I take it, or I hope unwittingly, made some completely wrong statements. First of all, he said that the plan was made to order for the insurance companies. Now, sir, if one reads the plan, nothing can be further from the truth, for the insurance companies are the one group involved against whom we have legislated. We have told them, for instance, that they must provide a standard contract for all of the people, that they must not cancel it, that they must guarantee to renew it, that they must not sell it at more than a government-approved maximum premium—and all of these things they must do on pain of losing their licence.

And then, Mr. Speaker, he said—and reading from a report which I gather he attributed to some labour organization—that the medical services insurance council would ignore the rights of the public. Yet the bill specifically states that the council shall consist of nine members, five to represent the public, two to represent the medical profession and two to represent the carriers, the three groups most intimately involved.

I was rather interested in his hypothetical case, sir. If he had only thought about his hypothetical case himself and read the terms and provisions of the bill, he would have seen that Charlie was all right and would have been well looked after.

I notice that he espoused the word “universality” and I have noticed that word running through the comments of all of his people. I wonder why they so meticulously avoid the word “compulsion.” From their statements, I gathered that by “universality” they actually meant “compulsion.” I went to the New Oxford Dictionary tonight and I found that there is no relationship between these two words. With a plethora of words which were very obviously put into the mouth of the hon. leader of the Opposition, he has said to us in effect, “Your plan is not compulsory, it does not go far enough or fast enough.”

He, too, cited the Hall report in many instances and he spoke about its recommendations, but he did not point out to the House, sir, that this report is predicated on federal participation, indeed this is the foundation of the report and this is the foundation upon which all the recommendations of this report are predicated. This being the case, what about recommendation 199? When is the federal government going to implement this recommendation, which according to Mr. Justice Hall was the first that ought to be recommended because it calls for the summoning of a Dominion-provincial conference on this subject within six months of the tabling of that report in the House of Commons.

Interjections by hon. members.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: We were supposed to be in Ottawa now and the conference was cancelled.

Mr. Singer: Is it not scheduled for July 1?

Hon. Mr. Dymond: I have not heard of it yet.

Interjections by hon. members.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: And then, Mr. Speaker, the next thing that puzzled me all through the hon. member's remarks was why he has been unsuccessful—or if he has tried, and I presume he has—in selling his beliefs and his gospel to his federal running mate in the same riding he represents, Mr. Gordon, who has a very great deal to say in the councils of the federal government.

The hon. member for York South (Mr. MacDonald) also insisted upon compulsion. He is completely and totally frank about it; he complains of the greater cost. Mr. Speaker, I cannot for the life of me see where there is anything in Bill 136 that will affect the cost of insurance now in effect. There will be no interference—and this we have specifically stated—in the insurance carried now by existing groups or other contracts, be they group or individual. So why he and his colleagues should have a fear of a possible increase in costs because of this bill, I cannot see.

There can be increases in costs if there is an increase in demand for service. The cost is intimately and directly tied to the utilization and this is an inexorable law of insurance life. The maximum premium, the premium that is to be set by government or approved by government, is to be set for the high-risk cases only and it will not automatically mean that the premium for all individual contracts will become the maximum premium. This is a highly competitive business and I can see no reason to expect that all of the insurance carriers are suddenly going to up their premiums just because a maximum has been set for high-risk costs.

The hon. member for York South complained about a greater variety of policies.

Again this Bill 136 only makes provision for one policy—the same policy, be it first-dollar coverage or a deductible co-insurance contract, but it is the one policy and this is all the bill will add. While it will be uniquely identifiable, it will not be any different from many comprehensive policies which are now on the market and have been sold for a long time. The standard contract is the only stipulation of the government bill and it is to provide for the physicians' services by and large required by the average family in a normal lifetime.

The hon. member suggested that the standard contract, in its provisions, was not as good as the PSI blue plan, and I have to differ with him in this because it certainly is. We have not physiotherapy or radiotherapy in our standard contract, but these are already provided under the extended insurance benefits of OHSC, as were approved last year or were announced to the House last year.

The hon. member for York South is afraid that we will find ourselves in the same position as Alberta perhaps has found itself and I can appreciate his concern about this. I was very distressed myself when I read that 15 per cent of the low-income group in Alberta had not been included for some reason or another, but it is not for me or for us here to criticize or find fault with, or to condemn, a programme initiated and carried on by another province.

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): The hon. Minister did not take that view about Saskatchewan.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: I did not criticize it.

Mr. Bryden: The hon. Minister certainly did.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: I asked some questions about it. All I said, Mr. Speaker, in the first reading was, "Need I repeat what happened in Saskatchewan?"

Mr. Singer: Oh, now you are playing with words.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: No, I am not, read it in Hansard.

Mr. Singer: Do not look so innocent.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: I am, of course; you must realize that.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): What happened was that all parties ended up supporting Medicare—including the Tories.

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): The government was defeated.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: And the leader of the government was defeated, the first time in his experience. It is rather strange, is it not?

However, I did look, with a view to determining if we could avoid any pitfalls, at what apparently caused difficulty in Alberta. I came to the conclusion that a large number in Alberta had been excluded because of the fact that the government assistance was not high enough. They have not at any time provided total coverage for the non-taxable income groups.

Indeed, sir, this is one of the reasons why we diverged from the recommendation of the Hagey committee, which proposed that the earners who were in the non-income-taxable group should be subsidized to the extent of, say, 70 per cent. There is not much use, Mr. Speaker, in saying to a man, "Here is a loaf of bread for 10 cents," if he has not got the 10 cents. We did not think that it mattered very much where one drew his money, whether from welfare assistance or other social assistance, or whether he earned that amount of money. If he were in receipt of an income not subject to income tax, we believed that he should have 100 per cent coverage. I believe herein our proposal differs largely from that of Alberta.

Of course, in Saskatchewan, here again all the people do pay premiums. I have to criticize this because in Saskatchewan, Mr. Speaker, with a compulsory plan and everybody paying a premium, albeit a small one, what is the use of giving the man a loaf of bread for 10 cents if he does not have 10 cents? There, they put him in jail, and indeed I was shocked to read in the Regina Leader Post of an old man of 75—

Mr. Singer: The hon. Minister was not shocked enough.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: I was shocked to read of an old man of 75 years of age, dying on the courthouse steps, going in to answer a summons because he had not paid his premiums.

Now, I have to be critical, sir, because I am simply rebutting criticism that has been levelled against our government on many occasions by my hon. friends of the NDP. I almost said the NDP party, but I forgot my hon. friends told me that "P" was redundant.

In Saskatchewan, sir, they demand that the municipalities must pay premiums for certain persons. I think that we would have little difficulty in finding recorded in Hansard many instances where we have been criticized by the representatives of the NDP in this House, because we were inflicting these matters on municipalities. Indeed, I think one of the points of which my hon. friend from York South made a good deal when he was debating Bill 163, was the fact that in that bill we made provisions that municipalities may make provision for assistance to certain groups. He will be pleased to know, I am sure, that we have withdrawn that from the new Bill 136.

In his comparison of costs, the hon. member spoke about the cost in Saskatchewan vis-à-vis the cost suggested by the Hagey committee for Ontario, but in Ontario the only cost the government will have anything to do with will be the cost for those whom we support in whole or in part, and the maximum premium.

Then he said, and I think this was the pièce de résistance, that the Saskatchewan plan vindicates the Hall proposals. One of the other hon. members of his group, the hon. member for Yorkview, also said this afternoon that Saskatchewan has a Hall plan. This, sir, is just not right. Saskatchewan has not got a Hall plan, because, I repeat, the Hall proposal is for a complete health services plan; not only physicians' services; not physicians' services in hospitals; not physicians' services, hospitals and drugs; but everything bound up in one. That is the only Hall plan that I can glean from a reading of the report and I have read both of them; I have read the main one three times over.

Sir, if the Saskatchewan plan vindicates the Hall proposal, I am quite certain that Mr. Justice Hall would be very disappointed, because no other jurisdiction in the country has seen fit to follow the lead of this province.

Then my hon. friend from Parkdale (Mr. Trotter) made some statements, he made a very impassioned address. I have to say he was a little confused on certain things. He complained, as did the hon. member for Ottawa East, a few moments ago, that we had been studying this for six years and we did not have all the answers. I make no apology for that, sir, and if I study it for 60 more years, I do not expect to have all the answers. My hon. friend gave me a very good bit on which to hang my hat here. He said that the European plans, having been in force since 1880—I think it was 1886, was it, that Bismarck introduced his plan in Germany? Germany is still today looking for answers, many of them, as is every jurisdiction that has ever undertaken this plan, and we will continue to look for answers, because we never will find all of them. All of them are not in this tremendously comprehensive volume, commonly called the Hall report.

Then my hon. friend said, "What choice is there, if there is no government plan?" Mr. Speaker, as I see it, and as I know the health care insurance field today, there is a great number of choices, a great variety of choices available to the public today. One can almost get a health-care plan tailored to suit his wants or his needs. That is how varied and how numerous they are. And yet my hon. friend from Parkdale says, "What choice is there if there is not a government plan?" But on the other hand, he and his party obviously want one plan, a government plan. He is worried because there are no choices with a government plan, and then he wants us to do away with all of the choices that are now existent and introduce only a single government plan.

I agree with him completely there are many loopholes in the present plan, and this is one of the reasons, one of the fundamental and important reasons, for Bill 136. This is one of the very substantial benefits that will accrue to those who will provide their own, because at the present time—and all of us have had experience with these things—if they are stricken with serious or long-lasting illness, or if they are past that magical age on the calendar of 65 years, a great many contracts now in force have the right to cancel them or to refuse to renew the contract. Bill 136 makes this impossible.

My hon. friend from Parkdale had one spot where he was tremendously inconsistent. When he was saying it, I could not help but recall something that the hon. member for Grey South (Mr. Oliver) said when we came in for the first session of this Parliament, following the election of 1963. He spoke of the plans for the future of his party under his guidance, and he spoke about consistency, and I wondered what had happened to that consistency when my hon. friend from Parkdale complained because the health insurance companies used health care insurance as a loss leader, and yet in the very same breath, he screamed about them gouging the public because they wanted to make high profits. You cannot have both. He spoke, and many other spoke at length—

Mr. Singer: Once get your foot in the door and you are in.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: —about the indemnity companies having a retention factor, or a profit, I believe he called it on one occasion, although I will not vouch for that. I only made notes from memory. He spoke of the indemnity companies having a retention factor or profit of 28 per cent, but he ignores the fact, sir, that these very same companies, are in competition with the non-profit or the prepaid plans, and on many occasions are underselling them today. I am quite certain my hon. friends in the NDP from Hamilton will know of cases where in that city, groups have dropped the non-profit plan and have taken on insurance under indemnity plans at a better price. I cannot just recall now the union which told me of that.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. J. B. Trotter (Parkdale): The hon. Minister does not understand the insurance business.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: I believe I understand the insurance business as well as my hon. friend understands the practice of medicine. The fact does remain, sir, that almost from the beginning of time, when the insurance carriers got into this field, they have been in direct competition with the prepaid plan, and I believe they sell just a little more than 50 per cent of the insurance. But this is good for the public. I really cannot become worried about whether the insurance companies make a profit or not. I remember one of the hon. member's previous colleagues, who left us at the last election, complained that the insurance companies would not stay in the business because they could not make money. At that time I said I could not care less, they were big boys, now; they can look after themselves; and if to gain business they enter into competitive price cutting, the only person I can see gain, sir, is the consumer. They can cut their costs as low as they like, as long as the consumer gains. That is my only concern.

Now, the hon. member for Parkdale made a great deal, sir, about the Liberal Party speaking for the little people. You know, that is a word I do not like. I cannot think of any of our people being little people, sir. However, a rose by any other name—

Mr. E. W. Sopha (Sudbury): No! You divide them into classes.

An hon. member: They are all first-class.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Again I have to say to my hon. friend from Sudbury, sir, that the word was of legal choice and I was advised again, after I paid attention to his proposal. I went back to my legal people and they assured me that this was proper legal language.

Mr. Sopha: The hon. Minister ought to be ashamed of them, then.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: I will have them talk to the hon. member, sir. However, I do not think that any one of the three groups in this House has a corner on this "concern" for the ordinary folk, for all of the folk of Ontario. We believe as a party and as a government that this is our duty, this is our sacred responsibility, sir, while we stand in this House, to speak for, and to represent all of the people of Ontario. These little people have been our concern. It has been our concern to see to it that through the legislation we bring to this House we keep ever foremost in our minds the interests of the people of all the province of Ontario.

How my hon. friend decided by the terms of Bill 136 that we were giving millions to the insurance companies, sir, completely eludes me because it has been made eminently clear that not one dollar of public money will go to any insurance company, be it indemnity or non-profit plan.

My hon. friend from Huron-Bruce put forward a very good plea for para-health services, but there is no discrimination in this. This was a very difficult problem with which the committee wrestled and I have met all of these people, and in spite of all the woeful and dreadful things that my hon. friends fear—because my profession happens to be that of a physician, and the unfair, or the biased, or prejudiced approach I may take in dealing with those things, sir. I do not really believe that, with the exception of one group who did me the honour of speaking to the Hon. Mr. Justice McRuer, submitting I should be cited for discrimination or something of the kind. I think that was the greatest compliment that was ever paid me.

However, apart from that one group, sir, no group in the para-health field has ever accused me, to my knowledge, of being prejudiced against them. So long as I occupy the chair of the Minister of Health, sir, my only concern is to see that these services which the people of Ontario want and look for are the best possible under the circumstances. To that end all my actions have been directed and will continue to be directed so long as I am in this chair. I forget my professional loyalty, sir; I have one loyalty and that is to this government and to the people of Ontario.

The hon. member for Hamilton East (Mr.

Davison) compared the proposed individual family premium suggested by the Hagey commission report with the group family premium charged by PSI, and I am quite sure he would not want to leave any wrong information in the minds of the House, sir. You cannot compare a group premium with an individual premium. Individual premiums to which the hon. member should have referred were $207, not $159 or $160.

Mr. Singer: What premium is the hon. Minister going to charge?

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Universal—again in keeping with most of the hon. members of the Opposition, sir, the hon. member for Hamilton East said a great deal about universality and we are all in favour of universality. Indeed this is one of the basic principles of our bill, that medical services insurance shall be universally available.

Then, of course, we come to my hon. friend from Sudbury. In the first five or ten minutes he speaks—I love to listen to him, sir. He was concerned, and I give him great credit for this, about the numbers who are living on the edge of poverty. And again I say that no political party in this province has any corner in that concern, sir. Everyone of us is concerned about it. One has only to look at the great volume of legislation that passes through this House every year to realize the concern of this government for those who live on the edge of poverty, to see all of the things that are being undertaken and done in an attempt to lift our people out of this group altogether, and to lift them off the edge of poverty and give them an opportunity to rise above their present state. But I did wonder, while my hon. friend was speaking, why he did not try to pour out some of his oratory upon his colleagues at Ottawa in the hope that they would perhaps alter the income tax exemption levels. Now, he spoke at great length and so did some others about compulsion in education and compulsion in health. Of course there is compulsion in education, Mr. Speaker; we do not want an illiterate population. But he forgot to state further that the compulsion in education stops when the child reaches the age of accountability. As soon as the child reaches the age of sixteen and can make a determination for himself he does not have to go to school any more. He makes that election for himself or in concert with his parents if he is well trained and well raised.

And then the statement of the philosophy that my hon. friend tried to weave around this business of freedom, that there cannot be true freedom without economic security. I would agree with that, sir. But how in the name of reason is one any more secure economically because the government takes his money from him and spends it rather than leaving him to spend it himself? This will not enhance his economic security nor will it enhance his freedom. I say to you, sir, the more government takes away from the people the more likely they are to become enslaved. In the history of society, all the great nations, all the great empires of the past, as I read history, fell for two reasons: They depended too much upon government; they became enslaved, they became soft and faded into oblivion.

If this, Mr. Speaker, is to give true freedom to the individual; if the government is to look after him as far as health care is concerned; providing he is capable of looking after himself, then why not look after him so far as his food and clothing and shelter and all of the necessities, the basic necessities of everyday living are concerned?

Mr. Singer: Or his pension, or his hospitalization.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Now, Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend spoke about priorities and I am going to leave that for the moment and come back to it.

Mr. Speaker: Order, order. I would remind members that the Minister is making the speech. I think he was quite reticent when other members were speaking and I would ask the members to give him the privilege which he should have when he is presenting his remarks.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: I touched a raw nerve apparently. Now, Mr. Speaker, to get back to the matter in hand. All in all, throughout all of the speeches of the Opposition there are some common threads running through the whole fabric. I do not need to say, because it is perfectly apparent to all of us, not only to us who sit in this House, but to all of the people of Ontario, that we know exactly where the New Democratic Party stands on this matter.

Mr. Bryden: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: And they do deserve to be commended for this, sir, because consistently and without deviation they have stuck to their programme and stuck to their policy. I recall when I first heard it—I was a freshman, I believe in university, beginning to cut my political teeth. I had just recently qualified to become a Canadian and I wondered how I should vote. I thought the best way to learn was to hear the representatives of all of the political parties who were periodically invited to speak to the student body. The first one I heard was a man whose figure and manner and everything else made a serious impact upon my memory, but what he said did not.

He was nonetheless a great man, the late J. S. Woodsworth. His missionary zeal and his passion for his cause could not help but impress me. Mr. Speaker, those were the depression days, as you will recall. But the thing that impressed me was that the full burden of his theme was that government should do everything for everybody.

Mr. Bryden: The hon. Minister did not listen to him very well.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: And here we were, sir, a group of young men and women about to embark on a life's career, hoping to make some contribution to the society which was then helping us, and Mr. Woodsworth did not challenge us to face up to and grasp the opportunities which this great province and this great nation offered us. He expounded his party's policy on Medicare—even then.

The next man I heard was W. L. MacKenzie King—

An hon. member: With his crystal ball!

Hon. Mr. Dymond: No, Mr. Speaker, he neither had with him his crystal ball nor his dog.

Mr. Trotter: What has this got to do with the principle of the bill? Wandering all over the place.

Interjections by hon. members.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Having said that, Mr. Speaker, we know exactly where the NDP stand. They have been consistent in their stand and they have never deviated from it; they have enunciated frequently in this House and I do not believe that the enunciation has deviated one iota. The last was the same as the first, so that there is not any doubt in their minds, nor in our minds on this stand. But I had to say to you, sir, a great gulf is fixed between them—and even the engineers of The Department of Highways would never be able to build a bridge long enough to get across that gulf.

We cannot, however, say the same of the Liberal Party, sir.

Mr. MacDonald: Medicare if necessary but not necessarily Medicare.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: The third man was the late Mr. R. B. Bennett and he, of course, sold me.

Mr. MacDonald: Proves what a Tory the hon. Minister is. Bennett retired to the House of Lords.

Mr. Speaker: Order, order.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Now, Mr. Speaker, having said that we know where the New Democratic Party stands I have to say we cannot say the same about the Liberal Party. We do know that the late Mr. W. L. Macenzie King paid lip service to health care insurance. First in 1919—and then at every election thereafter until he left the Canadian scene.

An hon. member: A great Canadian.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: A great Canadian, it is true; I am not questioning that in the least.

Mr. MacDonald: He was one step at a time, don't you know?

Interjections by hon. members.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: He paid lip service, sir, but took no action. And now my hon. friends in the Liberal Party, I know, are very touchy about history so we will come a little more up to date to August 2, 1962, when the whole Liberal attitude is well summed up in the Toronto Daily Star of that date, and I quote:

Neither Mr. Wintermeyer nor any other responsible Liberal spokesman has yet spoken up clearly on the issue. A party which endorsed a national health insurance programme as long ago as 1919, should have no hesitation in 1962 in declaring where it stands.

Now, Mr. Speaker, here is the difference in philosophy between the two but it does appear from what the hon. leader of the Opposition has said, and what all of his colleagues have said, as if they would like to embrace the policy so long enunciated by the NDP. The only difference, sir, is again that the NDP is full steam ahead and damn the torpedoes.

Mr. MacDonald: For once the hon. Minister is right.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Mr. Speaker, there is a very great deal of talk about government responsibility in a matter of this kind. It is a question I have often asked myself, and it seems to me that many of us have been asking ourselves questions recently. Government has a responsibility in this field but I believe that its basic and most important responsibility is to see to it that health care insurance is available to all, regardless—as we state it in our bill—of age, state of health past or present, or financial status. And to see to it, sir, that this insurance will not be cancelled at the whim of a insurance carrier, usually at a time when the person needs it the most. There is not any use—

Mr. MacDonald: Infringing on the rights of free enterprise!

Hon. Mr. Dymond: There is not any use in selling something to a person, and then, at the time when the need arises that they must have it and must benefit from it, to tell him that its benefits are not available. This has happened, and this can happen quite legally under existing contracts at the present time. I think that government has a responsibility to exercise reasonable controls on costs and for that reason we have placed within the terms of the bill the right that government shall approve the maximum premium that can be charged—the high or bad insurance risk cases. And to see to it—and this is another very important matter—because the conscience of Ontario society would have its government see to the provision of essentials for all of those people who, for a variety of reasons cannot look after themselves—under the terms of this bill that this medical services insurance is provided at public expense for those who cannot afford it. Further, we will assist those who are in a stated low-income bracket, and all this we have done, sir, under Bill 136.

Let me submit a quote to you, sir:

The state in organizing security should not stifle incentives, opportunity or responsibility, it should leave room and encouragement for voluntary action by each individual.

In case my hon. friends are trying to remember who wrote that, before they put their foot in their mouth, it was Lord Beveridge. And Lord Beveridge certainly was never a Conservative.

Mr. Bryden: No, but he certainly would not have supported this bill.

An hon. member: Who can say? He advocated complete medical care.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Well, now I think, sir, there has been great and meticulous care on the part of the Liberal Party particularly, to avoid the word “compulsion” except to point out that I was afraid of it. I am not afraid of it, I detest the word, I hate the word. Anybody who has been taught "Scots wha hae wi' Wallace bled," could not do anything but hate the idea of compulsion.

Now, in these days we are very prone to point to certain things and say that they are trends of our time. Many of these are good but many, many of them are questionable and, in my opinion, sir, one of these questionable trends is the very marked tendency to compulsion by governments. Does the government know, after all, what is best for the people in all things? When the good of the public at large is at stake, of course, the government must take a stand and do this, but is the good of the people at large suffering because we do not compel everybody to buy medical services insurance? Is it better to compel everybody to buy it, sir, and then because they do not pay the premium, be it big or little, to put them in jail? Is that a good thing, is that a good feature?

An hon. member: Who did that?

Interjections by hon. members.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: There is a very dangerous tendency growing on the North American continent, Mr. Speaker, to believe that election to a Parliament vests one automatically with the ability to spend the earnings of the citizens better than they who do the earning. And then, in our times too, there is a great deal of talk about democracy. A democratic form of government is defined as that form of government which interferes least with local and individual liberty. And lest, again, my friends say that is from a 19th century dictionary, let me assure you it is from the latest one I could get.

Now, again, we know exactly where the New Democratic Party stands on this matter of compulsion. They have been completely frank and open about it and they have never changed in this instance, but we do not know where the Liberals stand and we do not even know from their discussion today, where they stand on it. Nor can I glean this from the amendment which they have proposed to Bill 136.

We will not go very deeply into history at this time but let us listen to the former leader, Mr. Wintermeyer, quoted from the Toronto Telegram, Wednesday, June 3, 1959. He said: "I think it is a shortcoming of our system to require everything to be done in compulsory fashion."

And I have not the slightest doubt in my mind, I do not recall the occasion, but I have not the slightest doubt in my mind that if he said it here everyone of us would have thumped our desks because this is sound thinking in a free nation.

The Toronto Daily Star, during an interview of May 29, 1959—he was interviewed and questioned by Mr. Beland Honderich of the Toronto Star—and here is what Mr. Wintermeyer said:

At the present time I do not think it is feasible in Ontario, I think we can eventually pursue a programme of medical protection on a voluntary prepaid arrangement.

Only two years later Mr. Wintermeyer proposed a compulsory medical services plan for Ontario. If, again, I read aright the true meaning of what the hon. leader of the official Opposition and his colleagues have said, they too are advocating a compulsory plan but they have not yet said it, Mr. Speaker. If they want to be honest and frank with the public of Ontario they ought to say it and they ought to put the proper word upon it.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Speaker: Order, order. The Minister can state his views. There are other members left to speak in the Liberal Party who may disagree with what he has said and so they have an opportunity to reply later.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I would ask the Minister to continue and also ask the other members to give him their attention. Members are supposed to speak only once on second reading, and I would remind the member for Sudbury that he has spoken on second reading.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Mr. Speaker, I have just checked again on my notes and I apologize humbly to the hon. member for Sudbury. I see I have a note here that he is the first to use "compulsory" in connection with their scheme. I take it back.

Mr. A. E. Thompson (Leader of the Opposition): On a point of order, I would like to assure the hon. Minister that I used "compulsory" and tried to interpret to him the great fear of compulsion that he had in connection with hospital insurance. I hope he is not suffering at night from an uneasy conscience because every piece of legislation that is passed is compulsory.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: I did say at the outset of my remarks that the hon. leader of the Opposition had used "compulsory" in respect of me, but I have not heard him use it in respect of their own proposals. I still must maintain that I have no record of having written that down but I might have missed something. I will check Hansard.

Mr. Speaker, to get back to the bill, labour too has had something to say about compulsion which was very revealing to me. Hear this:

Compulsory social insurance is in essence undemocratic and it cannot prevent or remove poverty. Compulsory sickness insurance for workers is based on the theory that they are unable to look after their own interests and the state must use its authority and wisdom and assume the relation of parent and guardian. Workers adhere to voluntary institutions in preference to compulsory system which are held to be not only impractical but a menace to their rights, welfare and liberty.

That, Mr. Speaker, came from the tongue of no less a man than the late Samuel Gompers, the founder of the AFL, and one of the greatest—

Interjections by hon. members.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: It sounds to me, Mr. Speaker, as if the representatives of labour in our day have repudiated one who laid the foundation upon which their strengths and successes have been raised.

Mr. Bryden: Why does the hon. Minister not read something from the 20th century?

Hon. Mr. Dymond: The hon. members asks me to read something from the 20th century. Hear this then, Mr. Speaker. First, I would like to remind the hon member that Sam Gompers' words were spoken in the 20th century, I believe the date was 1903. But this is 1965. Mr. Speaker, this is a statement from 1965 and it is from the voice of labour:

The time has arrived for the labour movement to mount a massive drive to throw off the yoke of compulsion.

That is from the tongue of Mr. Sefton as reported in the Globe and Mail of May 4, 1965.

Mr. Bryden: Has the hon. Minister heard what Mr. Sefton said about his bill?

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Mr. Speaker, it does not matter about what was said, sir, he is speaking of compulsion. One cannot adopt a policy of one kind in respect of one question and another in respect of another question.

Mr. Speaker, I am not going to thresh over the old straw that has been threshed so many times about this means test. We have stated unequivocally that this is an income test because it is based on the mechanism of the personal income tax, which most of us have come to accept. Indeed, this is one place where compulsion does obtain in this land and we must accept it whether we will or not. But if this is an iniquitous means test—and the words are not mine—then great numbers of us—not those who are seeking to extract moneys from the public Treasury but who are being forced to put money into the public Treasury—have been subjected to it for a long time and I have never heard any of us complain of any damage to our dignity resulting.

This is a reliable way, in our opinion, of determining need without prying into the most private and personal affairs of the individual. In spite of all the discussion about this, only one of those who have spoken in the debate made any note of the statement written by Joan Hollobon, who made a very objective study of this whole matter across Canada. She said that more than 80 per cent in the group which she questioned in British Columbia did not have any strong feeling about it.

A very great deal has been made about the cost of public and private programmes and there is much in the Hall commission's report about this. Mr. Speaker, in spite of all that is written in the Hall commission's report about this, I submit to you, sir, we have no record of any controlled studies having been made in this area. Of course, statistics of existing companies have been checked, both private and public, but there has been no controlled study done to ascertain whether a public programme can be operated at less cost than a private one.

For instance, the Hall studies all but ignored the group insurance mechanism which has been so successful in the medical care field, particularly in our province. There is no intention under this bill and there is no authority under this bill, to interfere with existing group plans or the existing individual plans, provided the people are satisfied with them. I submit to you, sir, the Hall report overstates the comparison of expenses of a voluntary insurance programme with a government-operated one, and again I submit this on the basis that there is no real factual knowledge on which to base this.

For example, there are group plans in operation in Ontario which provide insurance for $3.90 for an individual per month, or $13.25 for a family, and these are actual prices quoted from a service or non-profit plan just last week. A similar plan can be had from an indemnity carrier—Mr. Speaker, this is a plan offering the same benefits for $3.03 for an individual, or $10.04 for a family. An individual contract from a service plan is available in Ontario today at $6 a month for an individual and $17 a month for a family. From an indemnity carrier such a contract can be had for $5.50 and $15. So there is now ample evidence that competition does operate and should continue to operate to the benefit of the consumer.

From such experience, sir, who is to say that government can operate a plan any more economically than private enterprise? In our proposed programme we believe that there can be comparisons made. The experiences will be useful to us although not exact, since it is suggested that the group covered by government will include a large percentage of high-risk cost and high-risk cases.

The Hall commission report speaks of conditions in the nation. It does not point out that the figure already covered by medical services insurance in Ontario is 80.8 per cent and this has increased steadily and progressively during the last five years. There have been far too many statements about costs, or overstatements, which are just not true. For example, in the Globe and Mail on May 14, 1965, we read:

Dr. John Hastings contended that public schemes are almost more responsive to the needs of subscribers and less expensive to the public than private plans. He offered as evidence the fact that the premium for Ontario's proposed plan, which is to be provided by private carriers, as outlined in the Hagey report, is expected to be $175 a year, compared to Saskatchewan's $24 per person charge in its tax-supported plan.

Mr. Speaker, if Dr. Hastings had wanted to portray an accurate picture, he would have given the total cost of the Saskatchewan plan, just as he did in quoting the figures which he extracted from the Hagey committee report. Who knows exactly what the total cost of the Saskatchewan plan really is? I have asked many people, and I know that my hon. friend put on the record figures which were purported to be exact, and to the best of his knowledge they are exact; but many people to whom I have spoken in Saskatchewan very seriously question many of those figures.

There are many questions which will arise out of this programme. We are quite aware of them, we know that they will come up and will have to be answered.

First of all, it has been suggested time and time again that we are going to upset what is being done in the province now. I say to you, sir, again, that there is no authority nor is there any provision in Bill 136 to interfere in any way with any existing group or any individual contract, either with the provisions or with the costs. Only the maximum premium for standard contracts will be controlled and this is only to protect those who ordinarily could not get medical services insurance because of age, state of health or their financial status. I submit to you, sir, that this will provide much-needed protection for many, and it may well be at a lower price than they are now paying, if they are able to secure it at the present time; but the great majority now insured will go on as at present.

If those who purchase their own insurance do not want to buy from private companies, there is wide choice and they may freely go to the non-profit or the service plan. There are some 44 such plans operating all across Ontario today. There is no obstruction to those who are going to provide coverage for themselves going to these plans to get it, Mr. Speaker.

This programme need not cause any obstruction. There is nothing about the programme that will cause any obstruction to any other programme that may be developed, indeed, the opposite is the case.

I think that the way this is being administered, it will be a very simple matter to greatly broaden the scheme as time and experience would dictate. Much has been said, particularly by my hon. colleagues on the government side of the House, about priorities. I am very much disappointed, sir, that the Opposition has glossed over priorities, because they are of very great importance indeed.

Have proper priorities been observed? We believe they have, and that by this proposal we have planned wisely. We have tried to put first things first and at the same time meet needs which are very real for many people in the lower income bracket—those who need protection most; those, according to the statements made by many critics of this bill, sir, who are prone to a higher morbidity rate than are others. These are in need of coverage, and for them we have made adequate provision.

Every possible effort will be made to acquaint all concerned with the programme on its introduction. We will use every useful information medium, municipal authorities, doctors, public health nurses and welfare authorities to make known to our people what will be available to them.

These are but a few of the questions that will have to be answered, but I assure hon. members that every aspect will be given careful and thorough study and consideration. We are not going to jeopardize the programme by any precipitate, ill-considered or careless action.

There has been much talk about what the maximum premium will be. I have to say to the House, sir: According to the terms of this Act I cannot tell the House what the maximum premium will be, because it is specifically stated in the bill that the function of the medical services insurance council which will be established under the Act is to recommend the initial and future maximum premium levels. Until the medical services insurance council is set up, I cannot presume to set a maximum. We have had actuarial studies because we have to reach a cost on which to base the coverage for those whom the government will support in part; and for those who will be assisted by government, the premium rates will be $72 for an individual, $144 for a couple and $180 for a family.

Now immediately we will be told that these rates are higher than group rates now in operation. Of course they are, because we have been told that at least 45 per cent of those whom the government will insure are over 65 years of age.

This, of course, bears out what my hon. friends across the way have said, that the government is carrying the high risk cases, taking them off the hands of the insurance companies. But how shallow is that argument, Mr. Speaker, when you look at it. Suppose we put them on the insurance market—they have to be covered and the costs will be no higher and no lower—they have to be covered and so the insurance market will have to add enough to every premium now existing to cover the additional costs created by these; so the people would be paying no matter what happens. In this way the people are paying through taxation, in the other way they will be paying through this insurance premium.

For all of the broad sweeping statements that have been made and the recommendations that have been quoted here anent the Hall report, very few recognized or said anything about the emphasis that Mr. Justice Hall and his colleagues put upon all health care needs and also upon setting up realistic priorities. Some of these, for the education of professional personnel and the recruitment of staff and all of these things—

Mr. S. Lewis (Scarborough West): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I merely wish—having missed it on this side of the House—to ask the hon. Minister what precisely were the figures that he quoted in his lead up to this, the figures that ended with $180, I think it was, for a family. Which figures were those?

Hon. Mr. Dymond: This will be the premium structure, if you will—for those who will be partially subsidized by government.

Mr. S. Lewis: What were they?

Hon. Mr. Dymond: They were $72, $144 and $180; to meet the very pressing needs to which I had reference previously, to look after those in the non-taxable income group. Those who, as several hon. members across the way recently stated, are now being looked after. I think that this should be made eminently clear. While some care has for some time been provided for those on social assistance, it has been rather minimal care and certainly not the type of comprehensive coverage that is envisioned in the standard contract.

To meet this pressing need and to fill this gap in our medical care services, this bill is now before the House. We believe that this bill, through its provisions, does fill the insurance gap in Ontario.

The hon. member for Scarborough North (Mr. Wells) already dealt with this. I am not going over all of the figures, other than to remind hon. members that the insurance gap, according to the statistics which we have—and we have reason to believe that they are very soundly based statistics—the insurance gap in 1965 is estimated to be 968,000. Yet we have made provision under this bill to provide total coverage for a non-taxable population of 977,000, or a favourable balance of 9,000. Now how this comes about, of course, is difficult to understand. It is quite possible that coverage is already being provided for or by some of these people. So we point out to you, sir, that the insurance gap—again I repeat, according to well based statistics—is 9,000 less than the non-taxable population. These we propose to cover entirely out of public funds under the terms of Bill 136.

In addition, we propose to assist a further 800,000 in low income groups, although they have income subject to income tax.

We repeat, sir, that on the basis of these findings, support of the non-taxable population, as we propose, to the extent of 100 per cent, would more than cover the insurance gap that now exists in the province of Ontario.

In summary, this bill provides that everyone in Ontario, regardless of the age, state of health or financial position, may protect himself and his family, or be protected, against the cost of ill health and physicians' services. It will be guaranteed, non-cancellable and renewable; it will not exceed in cost a government approved maximum premium; there will be no interference with doctor-patient relationship; there will be no interference with those already covered by groups or individuals; those who have a non-taxable income will be provided with standard contract coverage, fully paid for out of public funds; and assistance will be provided for a further group with a taxable income up to approximately $1,200.

My hon. friends on the Opposition benches, in their submission to the public, I presume to the public on the facts of Medicare, make one or two mistakes. I hope my charity will stretch enough to look upon them as mistakes, but they state that our plan goes nowhere while theirs emphasizes preventive care and well-baby care. Again I have to say they did not read the provisions of the bill, because we have made provision for well-baby care and preventive check-ups once a year. In response to the fear of my hon. friend, the member for Scarborough West, that the psychotherapy and the well-baby care provisions were not adequate, these I say to you, sir, were arrived at in discussions with those involved. We changed our well-baby care provision because the pediatricians were at odds with me on it. I bowed to their superior knowledge since this is their field. We came to the decision about our psychotherapy provisions after consultation with representatives of the Ontario psychiatric association and we were assured that they were good provisions.

The matter of pointing to the difference between the patient under the private psychiatrist and the patient under the salaried psychiatrist does not obtain. Ever since the province of Ontario got into the business of providing health services this has obtained. This is going to obtain more and more, because more and more, in certain types of health care facilities, we will find salaried personnel. The tendency now is more and more for chronic care and convalescent care institutions to provide salaried physicians; tuberculosis sanatoria provide salaried physicians; mental hospitals all over the world, I believe, provide salaried physicians and there will be no difference in this regard. Of course, we will have to keep salaries in tune with the times and this, I am assured by the civil service commission and The Department of the Civil Service, is constantly under review and will continue to be.

And now, I have to repeat, sir, for the last time, at no time has this government ever implied that this bill is Medicare, nor have we ever said that this is our last word on health care provision for the province of Ontario, but we do state without equivocation, sir, that it is a logical progressive step forward in a plan that is steadily unfolding.

It is therefore, sir, with great sincerity that I submit it to the serious consideration of the House.

Mr. J. Renwick (Riverdale): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in the debate on the principles of this bill, following the hon. Minister of Health, I can only say that he obviously must understand the practice of medicine and understands it very thoroughly, because he obviously does not understand anything else related to the provision of a method by which the people of the province of Ontario will have the advantage of medical services, from the medical profession, at the least possible cost.

We agree 100 per cent with the hon. Minister that his duty is, as he stated it, to represent—and he said his sacred responsibility—all of the people of Ontario. We agree that this is his duty. We think that sometimes he represents some of the people at the expense of others, and this is what he has done this evening. The remarks which the hon. Minister has made were nothing short of an insult to the Legislature of the province of Ontario. They were pedantic; they bore no resemblance whatsoever to the current trend of political thinking in the province of Ontario, or in the western world. He quoted only one person who I would say had any merit in the remarks which he addressed to the question which he has put before this Legislature and those were the remarks of Lord Beveridge. Lord Beveridge—when he produced the plan in England during the war, which was the forerunner of the medical plan that was introduced into England for the care of the health of the people of Britain—was speaking as a Liberal, and the plan which he formulated and put into effect was put into effect by a Labour government. And the issue on which we are speaking tonight in this Legislature is far too serious for the hon. members of the government to think that in any way they can, on this occasion, divide the members of the Liberal Party from the members of the New Democratic Party.

The Opposition in this House this evening is united and determined to oppose this bill. The Opposition in this House and the New Democratic Party in this House will oppose this bill because they represent something more than 50 per cent of the people of the province of Ontario.

Mr. Speaker, I would say to you that this bill as presented to this House is regressive, inequitable, economically inefficient, discriminatory so far as part of the population of the province of Ontario is concerned. It is wrong in its basic approach, and the government itself has failed to give us, until the last few minutes of the hon. Minister's address, any statistics of any kind on which we could base any assessment or pass any judgment. And we can only assume that his reluctance to give the figures was a calculated reluctance to have those figures debated in this Legislature.

The hon. Minister has sacrificed the interests of the people of the province of Ontario to the interests of his own profession.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Mr. Speaker, I think that is a rather shameful accusation and nothing could be further from the truth, and I would respectfully ask that the hon. member withdraw that.

Mr. Speaker: I would remind the member that in any of his remarks he cannot impute an improper motive to any other member.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Speaker: Order!

Mr. Renwick: Mr. Speaker, I had no intention to impute a motive, I simply stated that the hon. Minister of Health had sacrificed the interests of the people of the province of Ontario to his own profession.

Hon. C. S. MacNaughton (Minister of Highways): Well, withdraw that.

Mr. MacDonald: Why? That is what the Globe and Mail—

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Renwick: Mr. Speaker, it has been stated in this House—and I do not think anyone in the Legislature will gainsay the proposition—that the medical profession—the doctors in the province of Ontario—are, on an average, the highest earning income group in the province of Ontario at the present time.

Hon. A. Grossman (Minister of Reform Institutions): Some lawyers do pretty good.

Mr. Renwick: The doctors in the province of Ontario have been granted by this Legislature a monopoly in the practice of their profession. How have they exercised that monopoly? In the way in which any monopoly is exercised, they have limited the right of entry into their profession and they have established fees which bear no relationship whatsoever to what those fees would be if there were a competitive medical profession in the province of Ontario.

Mr. Bryden: They could allow more into the profession, but they do not.

Mr. Renwick: Mr. Speaker, it is quite obvious that the medical profession in the province of Ontario has within it the ability the capacity to forecast the number of doctors who are required for the province of Ontario. Of all the manpower requirements of any given area in our society, the one which is most readily calculable is the number of doctors required in our society. The reason for that is quite simple. All the doctors are registered within the college of physicians and surgeons. It is well known as to the number of doctors who are in fact practising their profession, the ages of the doctors are known who are practising their profession, and it is quite possible from those details and from the world health organization tables to calculate the number of doctors that the province of Ontario requires to meet the needs of the people of the province over the next 25 years. This has not been done. It requires the intervention of the government to even enlarge the areas in which medical education could be obtained to bring the number of doctors that are required in the province of Ontario up to some reasonable minimum; and anyone would be able to assume that, within that framework, the fees which are now charged in the schedule of the Ontario medical association are not fees which can be left solely to the dictates of that medical association to establish.

The government has enshrined those particular fees in this bill because the particular section of the bill states unequivocally that the benefits under the plan proposed by the government as to standard contracts will be the schedule of fees of the Ontario medical association. It has then stated that the government will determine a maximum for the premium which may be charged, or the rate which may be charged for that insurance coverage. It does not matter what the government says about that maximum; that maximum must of necessity—because of the legislation which is before this House—be more than the schedule of fees of the Ontario medical association. There is nothing in this bill, once it is passed, which permits anybody—the Lieutenant-Governor in Council, the medical carriers incorporated, the medical council or the Minister of Health—there is no one once this legislation is passed who can prescribe a maximum premium that will not cover whatever fees the doctors choose to set up in their schedule under the Ontario medical association.

I think that this is a grave mistake in a bill which purports to suggest that medical services are going to be provided for the people of the province of Ontario at an economic level. It is just not economic.

I would like to look just for a few minutes at the 1,800,000 people that the government so gaily announced to us are those who are deserving of care within our society. It is only a short time ago that we in this House stated that there are more than 2,000,000 poor people in Ontario. Of these, 700,000 are destitute and abjectly poor, 500,000 are living in poverty at a bare subsistence level of existence, and 800,000 are in want of the comforts and necessities. Those are 2,000,000 people. Give or take, if the government will, 200,000 people, we are not very far off in our calculation as to the number of people who are below any acceptable level in our society at the present time.

Mr. White: It depends on definition.

Mr. Renwick: We are using yours.

Mr. MacDonald: 1,800,000.

Mr. Renwick: We then went on to say that there are another 1,000,000 people in Ontario who are just able to make ends meet, and if the government has put forward the proposition that there are 1,800,000 people, we happen to say 2,000,000 people who are living below a level which is acceptable in our society. I do not think it is up to the government to say that there are not another 1,000,000 people who are just able to make ends meet, living in our society. And what does this bill do? This bill provides that those people will pay the same number of dollars for their share under this bill as the person who is earning $10,000, $45,000 or $100,000. And that is inequity in the language which I speak.

Mr. Bryden: That any humane man speaks.

Mr. Renwick: Just look again at who these people are. There are 1,800,000 of them, or 2,000,000 of them. In the language which I speak tonight there are another 1,000,000 people, so we are speaking of between 40 and 50 per cent of the people of the province of Ontario, and I would ask whether they were ever represented in anything which the government did to decide what scheme would be used to provide the prepayment of medical care in this province.

Were they represented on the Hagey committee? The Hagey committee was made up of three physicians, three representatives from the medical insurance plans operating in Ontario, two nurses, a member of the Ontario hospital association, and a business man, a farmer, a lawyer-businessman and a representative of organized labour. The people who were not represented on that committee, whose views were not canvassed before that committee, and whose views if they were canvassed by any of the people who made representations to that committee, were discarded, are precisely that 1,000,000, 2,000,000 or 3,000,000 people in the province of Ontario who, as was said on another occasion, are voiceless.

They are not organized. They have no way of expressing their needs, their wishes, in our society. The only possible place that those needs can be recognized is in this Legislature, and this Legislature under this bill is not prepared to do so. The reason it is not prepared to do so is because it is going to take 1,800,000 on the calculations of the government, and the government is attempting to suggest to us that there is no means test involved because it is using the income tax method of determining eligibility for the subsidies from this government.

First of all, let me say that the income tax, as I understand it, is comprehensive, universal and compulsory. Everybody files a return. Everybody files a return, there is no distinction between one citizen and another. But it is not possible for this government to say that if a limited number of people in this province file a copy of their income tax returns with us, we will then determine whether they fall within the categories which permit them to be subsidized. It also is not possible to say that that is not a means test because it makes a very substantial difference between the group of people who choose to file their income tax returns with this government and those who do not choose to file their income tax returns with the government.

Just as a sidelight, of course, as I understand it, the government has no authority whatsoever to obtain any information whatever from the government at Ottawa about those income tax returns to verify them in any way at all. I think it will be necessary for the government to introduce some kind of legislation to give it that right, because one of the most carefully guarded rights under The Income Tax Act of Canada is the information which is filed with the government of Canada, and it is confidential.

I have said that this is a regressive bill and it is regressive in any sense of taxation economics, because a regressive tax is a tax which when it is imposed, imposes a tax which bears a larger proportion to the income or the assets of one section of the population as against another. This particular bill does just that so far as at least 1,000,000 people in the province of Ontario are concerned, because the 1,000,000 people somewhere just above the level at which they will be subsidized are going to pay the full premium for their insurance coverage, equal to what anyone else at a higher level of income in our society will have to pay for their coverage. In that sense it is a regressive tax.

How would we propose that it be not regressive? Premiums levied on each individual in our society should be at a level which eliminates to a great extent that regressive feature, and the other aspects of the revenues which are required to run such a plan should be charged by way of income tax and by way of corporation tax. In that way they are taxes which are related to surpluses, either personal surpluses paid through the income tax, or surpluses in the companies paid through the corporation tax. In this way the regressive feature could very well be eliminated by this government. It is an inequitable bill because it distinguishes between all types of people in our society.

I have tried to illustrate in my way why it is inequitable so far as the 1,000,000 people, at least who are immediately above the subsistence level, are concerned. But I think it is inequitable in another sense. It is inequitable in terms of the children of the province of Ontario. This comes somewhat toward the question of compulsion, which the hon. Minister of Health has made a great to-do about in this Legislature and tried to draw all sorts of analogies to the educational system.

The educational system is a compulsory system but there is no one in this Legislature who would think for one moment that if the compulsory requirements under the educational system were dropped, many children would stay away from school, because the parents in this society would see that most of the children in this society would go to the schools. The area of compulsion is therefore related to a very small number of families who would not otherwise send their children to school, and that is the sole area of compulsion involved in education in the province of Ontario. It is available to all, but it is compulsory for those who do not choose to avail themselves of it.

Under the bill which is before this Legislature, if a family chooses not to take out medical insurance, whether it be subsidized insurance or whether it be from one of the medical carriers, the children in that family are not covered. They are not entitled to the care, and I happen to think that the children of the province of Ontario should be entitled to medical care under any scheme which the government is going to put into operation. It would not come as some type of new legislation from this government, if it were to require in this bill that everyone take out medical insurance, because it would make certain that the children in the province of Ontario, the limited number for whom the parents would not otherwise make provision, would have provision made for them.

I would like to turn briefly to the question of the economics of it. I am not an economist, but my understanding of it is that a considerable amount of time and study has now gone into the question of the factors which go into the national productivity of any country. Contrary to what has been understood in classical economics, at the present time there is great debate as to the factors which do in fact make up the productivity of a country. It used to be capital and labour. But the analyses which have now been made show very clearly that of the additional factors which lead to an increase in the productivity of any country are the education of the people and the health of the people.

The combination of the two are essential ingredients in the increased productivity of the national economy in Canada and of the economy of the province of Ontario. We in this party take the view that if the community of the province of Ontario, through its government, through its Legislature, choose to divert certain resources of the community of the province of Ontario toward health and toward education so that the productivity of the province will be increased, then we think that it is nothing to which the people of this province will object if it is made compulsory for the limited number of people within the province who might not otherwise avail themselves of this opportunity of taking out this kind of insurance.

I would like to comment again briefly on one other aspect of this particular bill before us. By dividing the community up into two groups, one of which will be subsidized by the government—and by the way, these people do not quite have the same choice otherwise that the rest of the province do, because they must take it from the government, and of course the other part of the province of Ontario, sir, must take it from the private carriers, so we really do not have the same choice within the province of Ontario at all. Once one divides the province into two groups, as the government has done in this bill and proposes to do, then they automatically increase the overall cost of medical insurance to the people of Ontario.

Mr. J. H. White (London South): Not necessarily!

Mr. Renwick: Yes it does. It must do so.

Mr. White: The hon. member is not speaking as an economist now.

Mr. Renwick: If the hon. member would look at it in terms of the people who are going to be subsidized in their medical insurance premiums by the province of Ontario, he will then find that the remaining people in the province of Ontario are going, through the general revenues of the government, to pay the additional moneys required to provide that subsidy.

In addition, those same people are going to pay for their own insurance, which is going to go to medical carriers of one kind or another.

Mr. White: That is what the hon. member has been advocating.

Mr. Renwick: No, it was not.

An hon. member: The hon. member listens poorly.

Mr. White: The hon. member does not know what he is talking about. He was talking about regressive taxes. This is the opposite of regressivity.

Mr. Renwick: But it will mean that if the government would, in this small opening which they have left themselves, perhaps in the future, move into the kind of Medicare that we are speaking about in this House—and I am limiting myself to the question of prepayment of medical services—if the government would open that door and allow everyone in the province of Ontario, if they chose to do so, to purchase from the government a standard contract, I think the hon. Minister would be quite surprised at the number of people who would avail themselves of that opportunity.

If one looks back at the hospital insurance scheme, which this same government put into force, by requiring that the first 60 per cent of the population had to partake in that particular hospital insurance scheme it automatically cut the insurance carriers out of that type of insurance, until at the present time in the province of Ontario it would be very difficult to walk around to an insurance company and obtain standard hospital care insurance coverage. The only place one can now obtain it is from the province of Ontario.

We would like to have, in this province, that same kind of system put into effect. If the government chooses to adopt the very method which they used in the hospital insurance, well this would be fine. We would prefer the government to come out and say, yes, it will be compulsory or obligatory on all people, because it is in the interests of everyone in the province of Ontario to have that kind of coverage, to have that kind of security and to have that kind of well-being.

I think the government quite often fails to understand the drains on the income of a person earning anywhere up to, say $5,000 a year in our economy. There are very few people earning somewhere up in that range of income, who are not already committed substantially for credit purposes for many of the luxuries or the amenities that they are attempting to enjoy, and who have those obligations and will continue to have them.

A great deal of the time and effort of this government is directed towards persuading them to consume more and more, and one of the methods by which they consume is to extend their credit. For many people, their credit is now fully extended. To saddle those people with an additional charge of, shall we say, $180 a year, or whatever lesser amount is going to be charged, is an undue burden on the people of the province of Ontario.

The other day we had the debate about the portability of pensions in this province. We in this party choose to believe that the individual man should, if he is labouring, working and is entitled to certain benefits from his employer—whether they are medical benefits, group insurance benefits, pension benefits, whatever they are—should be able to take them with him wherever he goes. One of the factors which I do not like about the perpetuation of this system is the fact that it is going to mean that many employers in this province are going to be able to hold employees in their employ because of the fringe benefits which are provided, just as the lack of portability of their pensions until they will be 45 years of age and have 10 years' service is going to accomplish the same purpose. We think that it is in the interest of the people of Ontario, in the interest of the economy of the province of Ontario, that there be the greatest possible area of mobility among the people of Ontario in moving from one job to another job. One of the ways in which this can be accomplished is to have the premium an equitable one, not a regressive one, and to establish an efficient premium to provide the services which they personally may need wherever they are in the province of Ontario.

I can only say, in closing these remarks on this bill, that it is essential that this government not pretend any longer that they are providing in this legislation something which they are not providing. The only thing that this bill does provide is exactly the recommendations which were put forward before the Hagey commission by the Ontario medical association and by the Ontario health insurance association. They are not the views which were put forward by, for example, the social planning council of Metropolitan Toronto, who represent the 1,800,000 people for whom, presumably, this government is now going to provide a subsidy.

If my economics happen to be somewhat less than sophisticated, I would simply refer to a recent article in the Globe and Mail which stated that:

Canadians should be wary of claims that high and expanding government expenditures for health and welfare services act as a drag on the nation's economy, Arthur J. R. Smith, director of the economic council of Canada, said in Toronto yesterday. Mr. Smith, speaking to the Canadian health insurance association, said it is virtually impossible to find any clear correlation between rising government welfare expenditures and rates of economic growth.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Read the first paragraph of that report. Read Watson's words.

Mr. Renwick: I will come back to that, be glad to. I just thought I would deal with what the one man said before I dealt with what the other man said.

Mr. Smith, speaking to the Canadian health insurance association, said it is virtually impossible to find any clear correlation between rising government welfare expenditures and rates of economic growth. Nevertheless, he said, two facts suggest the need for caution against exaggerated claims that the tax levels created by welfare service expansion erode incentives to work and promote national bankruptcy.

First, Canada ranks far down the list of industrial countries when it comes to the proportion of national income devoted to social security expenditures. Moreover, many countries having relatively higher social expenditures have at the same time experienced much more rapid rates of growth than Canada.

He also said that although some people are worried about expanding Canadian social security, this country still devotes a relatively small proportion of its national income to taxation. He said that according to the latest figures, Canada is well behind the United States and most western European countries when reckoning the proportion of income contributed to direct and indirect taxes.

An hon. member: What are his politics?

Mr. Renwick: He is a Tory. The first part of the article which the hon. Minister of Health wished me to read, which I had not intended to read, but I think is worth quoting, says:

The Ontario government's medical services plan will allow health insurance companies to prove that they can voluntarily bring coverage with efficiency and complicity to the province's population, G. N. Watson, president of the Canadian health insurance association said yesterday.

Mr. Bryden: They got the support of the insurance companies, there is no doubt about that.

Mr. Renwick: Quoting further:

Mr. Watson, a vice-president of the Crown Life Insurance Company, Toronto, said the government's recently established plan embodies principles first advocated by his association in a submission to the Hall Royal commission in 1962.

Mr. Bryden: I am glad the hon. Minister had him read that.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Renwick: Mr. Speaker, I simply ask that the government would this evening reconsider, and withdraw this bill for further consideration before presenting it for the approval of this Legislature.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Speaker, in my time in this House I do not think I have experienced a debate such as this one before. This debate has gone on now for some three days and I would estimate that perhaps 30 different hon. members have taken part in it. It has been very interesting to sit and listen and watch the various speakers who took part in the debate. I do not think it is too surprising that from both Opposition parties, first the hon. leaders took part, and then—in the case of my hon. friends to my left here—I think all of the hon. members of that party have partaken, and a very substantial proportion of our members have taken part in this debate.

The fascinating thing to me, Mr. Speaker, has been to watch the various speakers that the government put forward, and as I watched them stand up one after the other, I must admit I had to ask where the bright young boys are who were supposed to have joined this House as members of the Progressive-Conservative Party? As I listened to them, Mr. Speaker, I recognized that the people who were put up were the old Tory moss-backs, both in age and in philosophy. I recognize, Mr. Speaker, that we did not have the bright young men who took exception to Bill 99; they did not stand up and say, "This is our view on Medicare." We did not hear a Cabinet Minister in this debate, Mr. Speaker, until the eleventh hour.

Hon. G. C. Wardrope (Minister of Mines): The hon. member will see how they vote.

Mr. Singer: Oh yes, we know how they are going to vote. I am sorry that my friend, the hon. Minister of Mines, did not get in and add some of his eloquent philosophy to this debate. It would have just been the thing that we needed to put the icing on the cake.

Mr. Sopha: He just wandered in.

Mr. Singer: But as we listened, Mr. Speaker, I think it was most significant that at long last we are able to draw from the words of the various government members—judging from the type of speaker that the government ran in this debate, and the government controls the speakers who go on—the type of philosophy that it wants to present to the people of Ontario.

Granted, Mr. Speaker, a few of them talked about this being a first step, but I wonder how serious a part of established Tory thinking the words of the hon. member for Oshawa really were, or was he speaking to the union members in a union town? I wonder if the true words of Tory philosophy did not come from my friend, the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe and from the hon. Minister of Health.

The hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe likened Medicare at least to socialism, then he mentioned communism sort of in passing. I would not want to put words in the hon. member's mouth, but certainly the message that he was carrying back into the rural highways and byways was that if we are going to have Medicare in the province of Ontario, we are verging on the edge of communism.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Singer: They can "oh" as long as they want. The philosophy that comes forth from the hon. Minister of Health comes from the same man, Mr. Speaker, who stood before a Tory convention in 1961 and said, "I don't believe in Medicare." He is the same man who went to Ottawa in 1962 and told the Hall commission, "Medical care is not the responsibility of government." And he is the same man who now has been reluctantly pushed by his party into taking this halting and slow, careful step, and he stands up now in an attempt to justify it.

But as you listen to his words, Mr. Speaker, and I made some notes about what he said, you can see that really his thinking has not changed. Really he does not believe in this. Really he does not want the government in the medical business at all. He says—and he chooses his words carefully; he is a clever man, my friend, the hon. Minister of Health—"I never said anything about Medicare." But he was a part of that team which advertised in the papers in the election of 1963. They had these charts with the scoreboards and the tick marks, and one of the phrases that ran through that ad, day after day after day—it was a cleverly conceived campaign and the people of Ontario went along with—said "Medicare for all the people of Ontario," and that was tick-marked.

What did the government have on that day, Mr. Speaker? It had a bill it had introduced into the House, given first reading and then taken back. At that time, that was "Medicare for the people of Ontario, done." And at the same time it was being done, my friend, the hon. Minister of Health, was going to the Hall commission and saying, "This is not a problem for government. Let the people look after themselves."

Mr. Speaker, this is a party that has grown old and tired. The years have begun to catch up with it. Mr. Speaker, in an effort to wave off the ravages of time, in an effort to assuage some of the younger thinking—the so-called progressive thinking that we hear about from time to time—this bill has come forward with all its fanfare, with all the careful precautions that have been written into it and with all of the things that have not been said, in order that the real philosophy of the Tory party will prevail.

Mr. Speaker, let me say that the people of Ontario want Medicare. They want a universal plan. They want a compulsory plan and they want a government-run plan. And I may say, Mr. Speaker, that when the hon. Minister was talking and said that nobody over here had said anything about compulsory, I say he was quite wrong. Several of my colleagues did, and to remove any doubt from the hon. Minister's mind, I say that the only way this plan can work and will work is if it is compulsory. We want it to be compulsory; and that is the only way that it should be.

Mr. Thompson: Hear, hear! He speaks for us.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Speaker, the hon. Minister's concern about this word compulsory is very hard to understand. Surely to goodness we can expect some consistency in government; in the various plans it puts forward. We had a committee that sat and investigated automobile insurance for some two years, and one of the things that we studied very carefully was the advisability of compulsory automobile insurance. You could see at that time, Mr. Speaker, that amongst the government members of the committee the word "compulsory" was a bit of an anathema. But what did we do? What did the committee do, and what did the government do, as a result of the committee's recommendations? Mr. Speaker, if my memory serves me correctly, you were a member of that committee at that time. We made it so difficult and so impossible for anyone who drives an automobile in the province of Ontario to drive without insurance that the figures rose from some 89 per cent insured up to some 98 per cent insured. What can you call that, if you do not call it compulsory?

Hon. J. R. Simonett (Minister of Energy and Resources Management): It is not compulsory.

Mr. Singer: Oh, nonsense. Utter nonsense. Mr. Speaker, when you get 98 per cent of the people participating in any plan that government initiates, and you make it so difficult for them to stay out by providing penalties if they do not carry cards saying that they wasted $25 which gives them no protection, a rose by any other name can smell just as sweet. We have a compulsory automobile insurance plan in the province of Ontario. There is no question about it.

We have compulsory hospitalization in the province of Ontario. Why did we get that, Mr. Speaker? We got that because the people of Ontario wanted it and because the people of Ontario eventually got it with the co-operation and assistance of the federal government.

Mr. Speaker, we heard in the last election the dangers of a compulsory pension plan. This was a great issue that my hon. friends took out into the hustings.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Oh, no. You took it out.

Mr. Singer: All the woes and all the trials and tribulations; Ontario is going to go to pot. The whole province is going to collapse if we had a compulsory pension plan. Mr. Speaker, we have a pension plan. All of the objections that my hon. friends brought into the last election, all of the warnings of danger, all of the infringements with private initiative and all of the infringements on local autonomy were all swept aside. This is a government that pays lip service by and large to these phoney phrases. That is all they are. Local autonomy, private initiative, individual efforts and so on. Now there are some of them that really believe it. And they bring it forward on occasions like this. The hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe and the hon. Minister of Health really believe this, but they only get their way at the beginning of a step.

Mr. Speaker, this first faltering step that the government is introducing today, and calling Medicare, is nothing more than a pale, paltry excuse. The attempts to blame the federal government really fall on deaf ears. This province is rich enough to do it. This province can afford to do it. This province will do it. Mark my words, Mr. Speaker, we will have a compulsory Medicare plan in the province of Ontario before the hon. Prime Minister calls the next election. This is all that the government is waiting for. They are not ready for it now, and they are paying lip service to the idea as put forward by my friend, the hon. Minister of Health, and my friend, the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe.

Mr. Speaker, let us listen to some of the views. The hon. member for Humber (Mr. W. B. Lewis) referred this afternoon at great length to a selected group of news clippings, and very few of them came out and said—hardly any of them said—this was any more than a beginning. I do not recall one that said this was the answer to the health problem in the province of Ontario. He deliberately avoided, Mr. Speaker, referring perhaps to an editorial that says the hon. Prime Minister is trying to foist an immoral mockery of a Medicare plan on the people of the province of Ontario. He deliberately avoided, Mr. Speaker, the views—

Hon. Mr. Roberts: I did not see that one.

Mr. Singer: You did not see that one? That one was in the Toronto Daily Star on May 27, 1965. I will send it over to my hon. friend if he wants to read it.

He deliberately avoided, Mr. Speaker, the views expressed by the Ontario federation of labour in its papers issued in May and June, 1965. He deliberately avoided the views of the farmers union and the people they speak for. He deliberately avoided the various briefs submitted to the Hall commission. He deliberately avoided the opinions of the Ontario association of social workers. He deliberately avoided the opinions of the Royal college of dental surgeons of Ontario and the Ontario dental association.

He made no mention at all, Mr. Speaker, of the views of the Ontario federation of agriculture. My hon. friend from Oshawa made no mention at all of the views of the Canadian region of the international union of the united automobile workers.

Mr. A. V. Walker (Oshawa): I will make my speech, you make yours.

Mr. Singer: I think, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member for Oshawa, having made his speech, should be prepared to say—

Mr. Walker: You make yours—you usually twist the facts.

Mr. Singer: Well, we will make it known for him, Mr. Speaker, if he is not prepared to do it. We will make it known for him, that the hon. member for Oshawa, speaking in this House this afternoon on this debate, completely neglected to mention the views of the united automobile workers in his plant, and I think they should know about it. Mr. Speaker, we heard no mention today about the views of the united electrical, radio and machine workers of America; we heard not even the views of the board of evangelism and social service of the United Church of Canada. And I would have thought that the least that could have come forward from the government benches was the views of the board of evangelism of the United Church of Canada.

An hon. member: We will get you Anglicans.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Speaker, I am not going to quote all these views at length, but just let me quote what the Reverend Stuart Crysdale, assistant secretary of the board of evangelism, said:

We have recent evidence that the members in adherence to the United Church in Ontario solidly support the contention of the general council that a medical insurance plan should be universal, comprehensive and contributory. A systematic random sampling indicates that our people, furthermore, believe that such a plan should be government operated and tax supported. We are now conducting a national survey of the United Church and returns to date show that 67 per cent of the members of the church and adherents in Ontario favour a plan having these characteristics. By direct inference, the United Church rejects the limited coverage proposed in Bill 136.

Mr. Speaker, it was very fascinating, as I say, to watch the selected group of hide-bound mossbacks that the government chose to put forward this afternoon to express the views in support of this faltering one step forward—the one-step polka, I think, could well describe it. It really means nothing at all insofar as advancing the real interest in health of the people of the province of Ontario.

Mr. Speaker, I am not going to deal at any great length with the plan that was put forward. Mr. Speaker, I am sure that my hon. friends in the House know me well enough to know that applause for that sort of remark only encourages me, and perhaps with that kind of reaction I will feel called upon to speak for another hour or so.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Speaker: Order!

Mr. Singer: Mr. Speaker, I think we should pay some attention to just a few of the remarks that I wrote down as the hon. Minister of Health spoke. He says and these are his exact words: "We have a plan to suit your wants or your needs." If there could be anything more typical of the real approach of the hon. Minister of Health, I think it could not be better contained than in that phrase, "to suit the wants or the needs." Does the hon. Minister of Health have a crystal ball into which he can gaze and tell a person what his health needs are going to be a month from now, six weeks from now, a year from now, two years from now? Mr. Speaker, if he did, there would be no problem, there would be no problem about running government at all. This would be a simple matter. So he is going to have a plan that is going to cater to our needs.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the hon. member would let me correct him?

Mr. Singer: No, Mr. Speaker, I would not like him to correct. My hon. friend had an opportunity and his words—

Hon. Mr. Dymond: He wants to stick to the wrong statement.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Speaker, his words are there, his words speak for themselves; I was very meticulous in writing down the quotations and this is what the hon. Minister said. He said he has a plan "to suit your wants or your needs."

Dealing with the part about needs, I say the hon. Minister, or any official, or any board that he is going to set up to deal with needs, is going to have to have a crystal ball to determine it. I suppose, Mr. Speaker, the wants relate to the ability of some people to want better care than others. Those wants really must relate to the economic ability, the financial ability, of people to pay for them. It is unreasonable, I would imagine, to expect that people who are on the lower income levels will want, even though they might need it in the future, the sort of medical care that people who have several times their income are entitled to.

So when my friend, the hon. Minister of Health, says, "We have a plan to suit your wants and to suit your needs," he is really in effect talking about a plan that is tailored according to the economic scale that applies in the province, and that is gauged on the workings of some sort of crystal ball arrangement that is going to allow somebody to determine what a person's need is going to be a week or a month or a year from now. This certainly typifies the whole approach and in fact implies, Mr. Speaker, a real means test in perpetuity. It categorizes the people of Ontario, it places people on different levels and it establishes far better than anything we on this side can say, out of the hon. Minister's mouth, the real philosophy that he at this moment is trying to put forward.

He says, "I can't become worried whether insurance companies make a profit or not." I think, Mr. Speaker, when this plan is established, if it goes forward in its present form, the hon. Minister has to become worried whether the insurance companies make a profit or not, because while on the one hand he takes 1.8 million out of the group, he forces the rest into the hands of the insurance companies. He provides for the insurance companies by the removal of the bad risks, and when he says he cannot care whether the companies make a profit or not, I am suggesting to you, sir, that he really cannot care whether this plan is a success or not, because the two things go hand in hand. As he drives people into the plan and as he drives people into the plans handled by the insurance companies, if his approach is in the manner that he expressed it this evening, if he does not care about the profits, then he does not care about the health needs of the people of the province of Ontario.

He says, "Our duty, our responsibility, is to speak for and to represent all of the people of Ontario." Mr. Speaker, how can you reconcile that phrase with his idea that this is a plan to suit everyone's wants or needs? How can you reconcile that sort of thinking—the idea that he and his hon. colleagues are speaking for all the people of Ontario—with the idea that he is going to categorize people according to their wants—which must be governed by their economic ability to satisfy their wants?

He proudly pats his back and says: "Not one dollar of public money is going to any insurance company." In a manner of speaking this is true: not one dollar of public money. This means money collected by the government is going to an insurance company. He drives into the insurance companies hundreds of thousands of dollars of private money by the mere fact that this bill is probably going to move a step further in this House this evening. So he is quibbling, he splits hairs, he pulls these phrases out of the air which are full of sound and fury and signify absolutely nothing. He does not mean what he is saying; he is trying to create the impression that the province is giving something that really it is not giving at all.

In effect, the hon. Minister of Health has not changed his views one iota from those views that he put forward to the Tory leadership convention in 1961, that he repeated to the Hall commission in 1962, that now he has surrounded in a bill that his hon. colleagues, I would suspect, have forced upon him, that he really does not believe in, and that is going to be changed before too long. But he is hoping that with these hollow-sounding phrases he is going to be able to keep pulling the wool over the eyes of the people of Ontario.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the people of Ontario are going to inquire very closely into this, and that the voices of these various authorities to whom I have referred are important voices in our community. These are voices that should and must be heeded. I say, Mr. Speaker, that the government had better look to its laurels, because as it gets old and tired in office, if it is not prepared to move with the times, if it is not prepared to allow its bright young men to take part in this debate and to let their feelings be felt, if it is going to depend on the paternal views of my hon. friend from Eglinton (Mr. Reilly) —“Good old Len will provide it for you if nobody else does”—this government of Ontario is out of step with the times.

Mr. R. A. Eagleson (Lakeshore): Did the hon. member happen to hear old man Wells?

Mr. Speaker: Order, order!

Mr. Singer: Mr. Speaker, the other obvious whipping boys that my hon. friends bring forward on every possible occasion—I am surprised they could not get a quotation or two from Hepburn—are those terrible fellows up in Ottawa. Let me make this abundantly clear as well, Mr. Speaker. The plan that has been enunciated by my hon. leader and my hon. colleagues is the plan that we in the Liberal Party in Ontario believe in.

Mr. W. D. McKeough (Kent West): Today, but not tomorrow and not yesterday.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Speaker, the views of the government in Ottawa are the views of the government in Ottawa. On many occasions we do not agree with them, and we do not share their views in the fact that they have not put forward a comprehensive universal health plan for the whole Dominion of Canada. We make that abundantly clear. Mr. Speaker, we are no more responsible for what they do, than our hon. friends over here are responsible for the actions of the former Prime Minister of Canada. The day that any one of them is prepared to get up and say that what the former Prime Minister of Canada did we accept and adopt—and he was always right—on that day, then the same sort of responsibility can be attached to us.

Mr. Speaker, I say as clearly and succinctly as I can, that what the Liberals in Ottawa do is the business of the Liberals in Ottawa. Our views are expressed here. They are expressed by our leader, by my colleagues and by myself, and these are the views that we shall continue to express. We are bringing before the people of the province of Ontario the sort of health scheme that we think the people of the province of Ontario need and want.

We are bringing before the people of the province of Ontario a health scheme as expressed in our amendment to this resolution, that will be good for the people of the province of Ontario right now. Not next week; not next year; not 10 years from now. Right now. And this is the scheme and plan, Mr. Speaker, that—with all the authority and all the conviction that we have in our command—we want now for the people of the province of Ontario.

I do not think there is any point in prolonging this debate. The sides are chosen; the views are made abundantly clear. Let me just say this in conclusion, Mr. Speaker. I would appeal to the hon. Prime Minister, because I think the hon. Prime Minister has considerably more common sense than my noisy friend from Lakeshore, before he rises to vote against this amendment, to seriously consider the possible course for the future that he is charting for the people of the province of Ontario.

It is unlikely to expect, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. Prime Minister and his colleagues are going to support our amendment. But I would think this. I would think after the benefit of these three days of debate, after the benefit of the very carefully researched speeches from the hon. members of the NDP, my colleagues here and from a few government members, I would think that the hon. Prime Minister should have pause to think. Before he takes this very serious step, he should take this bill back, Mr. Speaker, and re-examine his whole position. If he really believes that Ontario is the leading province in Canada—certainly, Mr. Speaker, Ontario can afford a proper Medicare plan; certainly Ontario needs a Medicare plan—there is nothing that would redound greater to his political credit than a re-examination of Bill No. 136 that is now before the House.

Hon. Mr. Roberts: Mr. Speaker, in winding up this debate, I would first like to say, despite some of the remarks of the last speaker, that I, personally, have been very impressed with the standard of the debates as we have thrashed this subject through.

I would like to offer my congratulations and to compliment the hon. members of the House who have taken part in the debate. It seems to me that we have had a very full and a very frank discussion of the principles involved in this bill, and indeed, a great deal of the particulars of the bill. Seldom do we reach the position in this House where we have an opportunity to have a rather clear distinction in the basic political thinking of the groups that make up this Legislature, of which we are all so fond. I am only disappointed, frankly, that I still do not know where the Liberal Party stands.

I was rather surprised at the hon. member for Riverdale when he invited them in. That is the first time I have heard, from his group, such an open invitation to the Liberals to join them. I have been very aware heretofore that the great effort was to push them away, but tonight he asked them to join his group and this may be the forerunner of great things. I do not know. But in any event, I am well aware of—

Mr. MacDonald: We invite you, too.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Well you will never get us to join you, and of that I am certain. I know where the opposition is, and tonight I would just like to assure the last speaker that, when he asks me to think and consider, I can only assure him that the thinking and the considering was done before this bill was brought into the House.

There has been a great deal of repetition in this debate. I suppose this is to be expected because we have been told continuously, and of course I have read this in the press, and I have a sneaking suspicion it has something to do with the defeat of the last leader of the Liberal Party. But this continual harping on the fact that this bill, and what this government does, protects the insurance companies and the doctors is simply not so, and the lack of truth eventually finds you out.

We have been told that this bill represents a very high-cost, low-value insurance. We have heard a great deal of talk about the pension rates and various statistical facets of the insurance industry, all of which, in my view, has served primarily to befog the issue and to make it really difficult for anyone to understand what is being debated here. I will return to some of these points as I continue in my remarks, but I must make a point that we have had a good many red herrings, as my hon. friend from Woodbine is wont to remark about almost anything said on this side of the House.

Another feature of the debate that I have noticed, is the reliance of the Opposition on the Hall commission report. Indeed, the Hall commission report has been referred to by certain speakers on this side of the House and it reminds me of the theological argument, when one uses the Bible, because really, if one sets one's mind to it, it can be used to prove almost any point one wishes to make. You decide what your point is first and then find the points of view therein to buttress the same, rather than looking at what it says and drawing your conclusions from that.

The hon. member for Forest Hill (Mr. Dunlop) in his very thoughtful and able address made the point well when he spoke of the obsession of the hon. members opposite with their views of a compulsory medical services insurance plan and their complete failure, really, to understand or to comprehend the fact that this volume and the one that follows it really deal with a total health care plan. It does not deal with a compulsory medical services plan; it deals with a total health care plan, and this is what is outlined in the Hall report and what this government proposes to implement.

There has been some recognition in the debate of the need for staging, but very little in any real deep or honest sense of the term. I think everyone recognizes that this cannot all be done at once. It would only be recognized that way if you had to do it. When we are having to do it you say we have not gone far enough, we should do it all at once. The whole secret of this report is the question of staging and planning, and working it out step by step. And while there is some recognition, to be honest, in the debate that this principle does exist in the report, I would suggest to you that it has been well played down and the major objection to the plan we advance here tonight in this bill is that we should go much farther and much faster, and in a more complete way.

When the hon. Minister made his introductory remarks, I think—in fact, I know full well—one of the key statements in his remarks, and I will quote it, is simply this:

So it is, Mr. Speaker, that the programme proposed in this bill cannot be taken as an isolated one. Rather, I submit, it must be read as an important and logical step forward in the context of all that has been done is now being done and is envisioned for the future for the well-being of our people.

And that is the key point, in my view, of his remarks and that is the key point in what we are doing with this bill.

I am going to suggest, quite frankly, that this has been completely ignored, this very basic point, in the remarks that have come from the other side of the House, and I intend to speak to the principle of this bill. I do not intend to speak in detail on it, but I think that really the fundamental basic principle of this bill has been completely overlooked in the remarks of the Opposition.

The major point upon which those opposing the bill have placed their arguments, is on the point of compulsion. I would suggest that their objection to this proposition and what is involved in this bill is based on this foundation and this foundation only. I think that they have failed to appreciate really what this bill means in terms of plans already conceived and carried out, plans in the process of being developed and plans that lie in the future. I think they have misrepresented Bill 136—whether intentionally or not, I do not comment.

If I can refer to this report, I would say first that in reading it, nobody can point out to me one instance where this report specifically and categorically recommends a compulsory programme of medical insurance for the people of Canada. Such a recommendation is simply not in this report. And, therefore, I say that it is impossible for hon. members to use this report—

Mr. Singer: Page 740.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: If the hon. member sends me a note I will read 740 in due course. I have read the report several times.

I want to turn to the report's definition of the word "universal." I think of this in terms of the bill that we are presenting tonight. "Universal" means that adequate health services shall be available to all Canadians wherever they reside and whatever their financial resources may be, within the limitations imposed by geographic factors.

I will concede that the members of the Hall commission had very grave doubts in their own minds as to whether a voluntary plan, even if supplemented with assistance from the government, would be effective.

Mr. Bryden: They said it would not, specifically.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: I say they had grave doubts. But I would make this point very clearly, that when the Hall commission members wrote this report and when they carried out their examinations and they looked at what was going on in Canada, there was no such plan in effect, so they were not in fact dealing with any plan that existed. I would suggest this, too, and this has been said by many hon. speakers, of course, supporting the bill, that this is not by any wild stretch of the imagination, the be-all and end-all, as I have said before, and not the final answer to this problem. But nonetheless there are certain very basic principles in this bill; I think they are simple, and I think they are very sound. That is a good admission—

Mr. Sopha: It is an admission the bill is inadequate. The hon. Prime Minister has said it four times now.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Of course, if simple repetition would satisfy the hon. member, I have heard many things from him 150 times. All I say is that there are two principles in this bill: The first is that adequate medical services insurance be made available to people of limited financial means through the whole or partial subsidization of their premiums by government, and the second is that insurance carriers make available a standard contract to all the people of Ontario without regard to their state of health, age or any other consideration.

In other words, Mr. Speaker, this bill proposes to make available adequate health services to all the people of Ontario, and I quote from the Hall report, "Wherever they reside and whatever their financial resources may be." And that is the basic principle of the bill.

I am convinced that taken in conjunction with other progressive steps that we have taken in the government—in the provision of hospital beds, training of medical practitioners, nurses and other paramedical personnel—this bill and these steps taken as a whole, not separated out and looked at one at a time, together really conform very closely with the objectives as set out in the report of the Royal commission on health services.

I would make one other comment on this report, and in this I would agree with the hon. member for Sudbury—I do occasionally. I think it is one of the most important reports that any Royal commission has produced in this country for a long time and I can assure him that I join with him in his hope—I believe he phrased it by saying he hoped it would not be put to gather dust in the archives—I can assure him, and I will go on to illustrate my point, that it is not the intention of this government that this report will be put in the archives to gather dust, and indeed, I would like to point out to hon. members that here we have done more than any jurisdiction in Canada to implement the recommendations that are contained in this report.

Mr. MacDonald: Saskatchewan had this implemented years before the Hall report.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: I am so tired of hearing about Saskatchewan from the other side of this House.

Mr. MacDonald: Well, we are very tired of hearing that kind of statement from the government side.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: I would just like to say that I consider that my responsibility lies to the people of Ontario.

Mr. Sopha: They do not even see through that.

Mr. Letherby: We would not put people in jail here.

Mr. Bryden: We do not?

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Mr. Speaker, section 2 of the recommendations deals with health personnel, facilities and research. I should like to read some of the recommendations contained in that section of the report, and then I am going to comment as far as this government is concerned upon the recommendations.

Recommendation 124 on page 67 says:

That there be established in each province a nursing education planning committee, advisory to the Minister of Health, to plan and direct the gradual and orderly development of nursing education.

In a statement that I made on October 29, 1964, which was about six or seven months after this report was published, I announced that a planning council on nurse education would be established in this province and it has been done.

To meet some other specific recommendations of the report in connection with nursing education, two other programmes have been introduced since then. The first is special programmes to prepare suitable personnel for the responsibility of teaching nurses, because if we are going to have nursing schools we must have those who can teach in them. Second, we have increased our grants for the construction of nurses' residences from $2,000 per bed to $3,200 per bed and this is to encourage the construction of nursing schools around hospitals.

In addition, we have put forward a programme to build in the province, three regional nursing schools, and we are encouraging the hospitals to push forward their programmes of training registered nursing assistants.

This might not be nearly as dramatic or interesting as to dream up hypothetical cases of what might happen to Charlie and Matthew, but these are things that are done, that are on their way.

Recommendation 140 on page 71 says:

That funds be allocated from the health facilities development fund—which, I might say, is not yet established:

—to provide for one-half the cost of the required expansion and for renovation of medical schools now operating.

I am quoting recommendations from the Hall commission report, recommendation 141, page 71:

That funds be allocated from the health facilities development fund to provide for one-half the cost of construction of new medical schools.

Recommendation 142, page 71:

That the provisions of the hospital construction grant be amended to provide one-half the cost of hospital facilities for new university hospitals or for expansion or renovation of existing university affiliated hospitals, or teaching units in non-university hospitals.

Those are three recommendations contained in the report. Last October I made a statement concerning this as well, and I am going to repeat it, so that hon. members will understand that we are not a government that has disregarded the Hall report; and I said then:

For the past two years the government, through The Department of Health and the advisory committee on university affairs, has examined the question of the medical and dental teaching facilities that would be necessary if Ontario was to meet both its own needs and make its contribution to the Canadian nation in the future. A very thorough study of the problem has now been completed, certain recommendations have been made to the government and those recommendations have been accepted. The result will be that four major projects, recommended by the advisory committee on university affairs, will be undertaken on the campuses of our provincially assisted universities.

1. A new medical school, with basic teaching facilities will be established at McMaster University.

2. A new school of dentistry will be built at the University of Western Ontario to operate in conjunction with the present school of medicine as a health sciences centre.

3. The medical school at the University of Toronto will be expanded and renovated so as to provide for the admission of an additional 75 first year medical students. At the same time a general upgrading of facilities and equipment will be undertaken.

4. A new health sciences building will be provided at Queen's University at Kingston and an extensive renovation of the present medical school facilities will be carried out. As a result the first year medical class will be increased in number to 75 at that institution.

The total cost of this programme will be approximately $50 million and the programme will be administered by The Department of University Affairs. We feel that it will prove to be a sound investment in the future of our people and our province.

The expansion of accommodation and facilities in the medical and dental schools requires a complementary expansion of space and facilities in those hospitals associated with them. As part of the overall study of these resources in the province conducted by The Department of Health, every teaching hospital was visited and its facilities and needs inspected and discussed with the boards of these hospitals.

The great advances in medical and dental science have made necessary some marked changes in the physical setup of these hospitals—there is far more to the preparation of a modern doctor or dentist than was required even twenty-five years ago. A few of the hospitals whose facilities are available to the universities are reasonably well-equipped to meet the needs of the schools, but many of them have been unable to keep pace with the needs arising out of the advances in medical and dental sciences.

Accordingly, the government is setting up a programme of special grants to assist hospitals associated with our medical and dental schools. This programme, estimated at $64 million, is planned to go forward in stages and the first of these will call for special grants of $3,602,250 in the next fiscal year. From then on, the construction and renovation projects will move at a greatly accelerated rate to completion, probably in 1968-69.

The hospitals connected with the following medical schools will receive special grants under this programme: University of Ottawa, Queen's University, University of Western Ontario, University of Toronto.

In addition, two new teaching hospitals will be constructed on university campuses as part of this programme. These hospitals will be associated with McMaster University in Hamilton and the University of Western Ontario in London. This step was also recommended by the advisory committee on university affairs.

Now I repeat this only to point out that what we are doing with Bill 136 is simply placing another brick in the foundation of what we plan to be a total health care programme.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Mr. Robarts: There is a great deal more to be done, of course. New programmes are needed and new programmes are now in the planning stage. I have no doubt, that as time goes on improvements will be required and will be possible in the bill that we have introduced here and to which I am speaking this evening. As the hon. Minister of Health pointed out, we have said several times that this is not, and I will say it again, not the end of the road; and it is not the end of the road of this government either.

I presume that when we do bring this programme to a further stage of completion, five or six years from now, we will be standing in the same place explaining it to the same people.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Maybe that little line over there will have disappeared, I do not know, it may be gone by then. I do not know whether they are going to move over or how it is going to happen, but they are going to rob other hon. members blind if they are not careful.

Interjections by hon. members.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Mr. Speaker, may we return to the subject of health services? There is a reference in the Hall commission report to financial participation of the federal government, and our legislation is in line with the position taken by the commissioners. Hon. members can find it on page 14, and it says:

The responsibility for leadership must be accepted by the federal government and plans made so as to ensure that every phase of the development of the programme is consistent with its overall objective. The unity of the programme and its application to all Canadians must be safeguarded.

This is the real key; this is what this report means. It does not mean compulsory medical services and insurance to be imposed in the province of Ontario today or tomorrow, it means the totality of a health care programme. I can only suggest that as yet we have not seen the leadership from Ottawa.

This is the essential feature of the Hall commission report, which I think is illustrated by the quote I made. It envisages the development of a comprehensive medical services programme which could be worked jointly—and I believe this can be illustrated and I will not bother to do it—by the opinions of the commissioners. They looked towards a programme to be worked out jointly by the federal government and the provinces with planned staging of various programmes which would in 1967 culminate in a programme that could then, if properly implemented, according to their opinion, in the ideas expressed by these men, culminate in a total health care programme for our country.

A year has gone by and there is little evidence to date of any commitment by the federal government. I can only say, as I have said before, that we felt we could not wait. We have taken the steps which I announced last October and outlined to the House again tonight. In this bill we have taken a further step along this road.

In the debate here tonight, Ontario has been called perhaps the fulcrum, or perhaps the key point, in the development of a national health programme. It has been suggested that we will set the pattern for all of Canada, and of course this has been used to buttress the argument that we are going the wrong way. I would agree that Ontario plays a very important part in the national scene as far as an overall national health programme is concerned. I would suggest to hon. members that we have already taken the lead by developing within this province an overall health programme with staging as set out, at least to some degree, in the Hall commission report.

We have increased our grants to all types of hospitals and we have increased our grants to research. We have, as I have said, taken these steps to develop not only medical doctors, but paramedical personnel.

I believe the hon. leader of the Opposition has commented in reference to Bill 136. I believe one of his remarks referred to it as a dead-end bill. He said that it would effectively block any future attempt to introduce a broader type of medical insurance, if it may be deemed necessary in the circumstances that may arise in the future. Well, with all the charity that I can muster, I can only suggest that either he has not read the bill or if he has read it, he really does not understand it, because as far as we are concerned in the government, we think that this bill provides a great degree of flexibility. This seems to be the point that is bothering my hon. friend, the member for Sudbury. He really wants me to say, I suppose, that with this we have brought all our endeavours in this field to an end, because every time I say that this might be a beginning and we might go on from here, he says that is the fifth or sixth time he has heard it, but I repeat it because it is true and it refutes completely the argument advanced that this is a dead-end bill and that it will in any way prove to be a block to whatever may be developed in the future. We agree that there are two groups in the province at the moment who cannot avail themselves of medical insurance. There are those who cannot afford to purchase it because of financial limitations and those, although they have the financial means, are denied insurance because of the state of health, or age, or other factors. This bill rectifies the situation as far as both these groups are concerned.

But it does not, in any way, restrict or limit any further action on the part of this government to introduce any further changes we might want in this system. It does not block us in any way from conferring with the federal government and co-operating with them, if we think that the plan is proper and right. There is nothing in this bill that will in any way limit the freedom of action of this government in proceeding along the road where we have already taken several major steps.

There has been an attempt, I think, by the Opposition to paint a glowing picture that there is a rising tide of enthusiasm in our country and our province for a compulsory, government-operated medical insurance plan. Let us take a look at the facts. I am going to mention here this word "Saskatchewan," and I assure you I only use it for purposes of illustration and will not mention it again. Such a plan was tried there and it resulted in two things, and I do not think anybody can deny this: The first was a revolution among the doctors; and the second was the defeat of the government. Believe me, that is the greatest expression of public opinion in existence. When the people rise up and turn out the government, they obviously do not like what it has done.

Mr. MacDonald: All parties are in support of it, including the Tory party in Saskatchewan.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: I did not know there was one.

Mr. MacDonald: To the extent that there is a Tory party in Saskatchewan.

An hon. member: There is no ND Party.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Mr. Speaker, just to complete the illustration of my point, there have been two other provinces which have introduced forms of coverage such as this—British Columbia and Alberta. And I would just point out to you that neither of these provinces have followed the example of Saskatchewan. I just put this forward because the hon. member for Sudbury, who is a very astute trial lawyer, will know that it is the evidence from which conclusions are drawn.

And I would say this to you, that in this country at the present time we are experimenting in the whole field of social services. I think the great pension debate is a good example. I deplore always, and will forever, that it was thrown gratuitously into a provincial election campaign. I think in the final analysis this did the plan no good, however, we fought our way through that. But I think that this, too, was an experiment. The federal government produced three separate plans, all of which differed. I have no real objection to this; I am just happy that they did not pass the first one, because we had some refinements in the second plan and further refinements in the third plan. Even it, in my view, was not a very good one, but it was certainly a lot better than the first plan.

But I think in this area, too, there are experiments being carried out in our country and I think it behooves us to move relatively slowly in order to build a social foundation. We are of the opinion that the people of Canada are trying to work out what will be an acceptable approach to the people of the country from coast to coast in dealing with this great social problem we have.

We on this side of the House advance a proposition and an idea. I am pleased that it has been received as it has, and as I said in the beginning of my remarks, I think the debate here cannot be anything other than fruitful in the final development of what will come.

But I do say that if we are to play this part, as the province of Ontario, I would consider it a very great mistake to introduce into the Legislature at this stage—in the history of this particular situation and in the history of our country at the present moment—a bill and a plan which would commit us irrevocably to one direction.

Once again, my hon. friend from Sudbury can add another chalk because I am going to repeat that we have here a flexible plan that will permit alteration. It is doing two fundamental things. Starting in 1966 it will look after people in this province who need to be looked after. I will suggest to you that so far very little has been accomplished other than by this province. If all of the Hall commission recommendations were done, you still could not have a plan before 1971; whereas we will be looking after our people in this province, who need looking after, by 1966.

And I would say this, too, Mr. Speaker, we will gain in knowledge and we will gain in experience. There is not a doubt in my mind that we will consult with the federal government and we will consult with the other provinces of Canada in dealing with this particular problem that is on the agenda—although not in any very specific way—for the next federal-provincial conference. I think that with the experience we will gain, with what we propose here, we will be in a better position to judge and weigh propositions that may be made to us. We will be in a better position, and I say this unabashedly, to negotiate with the federal government, and we will be in a better position to look after the interests of the people of this province, and we will be in a better position to look after the interests of the people of Canada, as far as we have that responsibility as a provincial government.

Finally, as I have said, in the meantime while these discussions are continuing, and while these matters are being examined on a national basis, we will have provided care for our people, five years earlier than it could have come any other way.

Mr. Speaker, there are a couple of comments I want to make concerning some of the somewhat confused thinking that in my view has come from the other side of the House. I listened with interest to the remarks of my friend, the hon. member for Parkdale, whom I consider to be a magnificent Gladstonian Liberal. He went on at great length, charging that this government was going to squander public money for the benefit of the insurance companies. If I have ever heard and listened to a broken record, Mr. Speaker, this was it. I have listened to this now for about two and a half years. Just because there is an insurance company having a head office in the city I come from, the attempt has been made to paint me as the great supporter. I remember the erstwhile leader of the Opposition when he made comments about this during the last election and all I can say is that it did not get him very far. Even though this remark has been laughed at, I will say it here, and I will say it again, and I will say it as many times as they choose to say that I am a tool of the insurance companies: There is not one single penny of public money that will go to any insurance company under this plan.

Mr. E. Sargent (Grey North): Not directly.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: I just cannot understand whether this is a political ploy, or whether they really believe what they say, because if they read the bill this is so obvious. It just simply cannot. It is impossible.

The other thing that has interested me in this whole discussion about insurance companies is the complete disregard, really, of who is going to provide. Who are the carriers? Who are involved in the carriers of this province?

In 1962, in this province, there were 2.6 million people—that is the last year for which I can get complete figures—there were 2.6 million people covered by medical services insurance policies, administered by non-profit plans, operated by either the doctors or the co-operatives operating these plans in this province—2.6 million people, and those hon. members sit there and say that we are handing all this to the insurance companies. Have they never heard of the co-operatives? Have they never heard of PSI? Have they never heard of AMS? They so conveniently forget this in their argument that they drive me reluctantly into only one conclusion, and that is that they want to use this for political purposes.

These 2.6 million people in this province will continue, I assume, if they are satisfied, to be covered by the non-profit carriers, and Physicians' Services Incorporated, Associated Medical Services and Windsor Medical Services Incorporated—I knew my hon. friend would get a mention of Windsor in there some place. Then there is a non-profit doctor-sponsored plan which operates in Quebec and comes into Ontario in certain areas; then there is CUMBA, Co-operative Health Services in Metropolitan Toronto, and there are 34 medical co-operatives operating in this province that are organized on a county basis. There is one in my own county; there is one in Lambton county. I will just repeat for the third time: They cover 2.6 million, but I did not hear one word about these. All I heard was, "You are handing it all to the insurance companies." What absolute nonsense.

I will make one other point. The insurance companies must compete with these non-profit carriers.

Mr. Trotter: That is what costs money.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: That is that old Gladstonian Liberal. I just say to him that if the private carriers, if the insurance companies, wish to come in and compete with the non-profit carriers, I think it will be a good thing for everybody.

Mr. Trotter: Twenty-eight cents on the dollar.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Of course that figure is absolutely wrong. I am not going to go through the figures. We have heard them a number of times in this debate, but none so deaf as those who will not listen.

Sir, I could continue for another hour but after the very gracious way in which my hon. friend gave up his last hour of debate, I will do the same. I would just say this, in final and absolute conclusion—

Mr. Sopha: What about the Hagey report?

Hon. Mr. Robarts: I would just say that in my view the Opposition has failed completely and absolutely to grasp the intent of this bill, of its position in the programme of this government. As I sat here, and I have listened to every single speaker who has spoken in this debate, in my view the hon. members just simply have not got the import of what we are doing or where it fits.

Mr. MacDonald: There is no import.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: A perfect illustration, Mr. Speaker, of my point. I would say this, that I am going to ask all of them—and I am quite sure after my remarks that they now understand exactly what I am speaking about, —to forget this amendment for the following reasons:

First, the amendment fails completely to take into account the necessity for the proper staging of a total health services plan, as set out in this volume. Second, the amendment fails to appreciate the principles and purpose of Bill 136. Third, it is essential that Ontario adopt a flexible position in the field of health services to facilitate the development of a national plan and not, at this time, commit itself to any scheme which would hinder the co-operative development of a national health services plan in the future.

Mr. Sopha: Not a word about the Hagey report. Not a single syllable.

Mr. Speaker: Order!

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Speaker: When the members feel they are finished with their interjections, I shall put the amendment which is before the House.

The amendment before the House at the present time was moved by Mr. Thompson and seconded by Mr. Oliver. I do not think I should have to read it again. It was read at the time it was presented. Following the vote on the amendment, we shall take a vote on the main motion.

All those in favour of the amendment, as moved by Mr. Thompson will please say "aye."

All those opposed will please say "nay."

In my opinion, the "nays" have it.

Before we take the vote I would ask members to give their co-operation to the Clerk and the assistant Clerk of the House. It is most difficult for the assistant Clerk to call the names if there are many interjections, and it is most difficult for the Clerk to record these. I would ask members to give both the Clerk and the assistant Clerk their co-operation.

Call in the members.

Clerk of the House: Mr. Speaker, the "ayes" are 24, the "nays" 66.

Mr. Speaker: I declare the amendment lost.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Speaker, the amendment has been defeated and we turn now to the main motion. I wish to make certain comments with regard to that main motion.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Perhaps I could permit the member to make his remarks on a point of order, as he has been good enough to give me notice of what he intended to do, but I would point out to him at the present time that as far as I understand, our procedure upon the defeat of the amendment that was before the House, that made the part of the question decided, that the words, and I quote: "the bill be now read a second time," stand part of the question. In my opinion, these words cannot be amended or changed at this time or deleted.

Now, I know that Rule 56 says this:

If on an amendment to the question that the bill be now read a second time or a third time, it is decided that the word "now" or any words proposed to be left out stand part of the question, the Speaker shall forthwith declare the bill to be read a second or third time as the case may be. Except in the case of hoist motions—

this rule has been varied by precedent, of which the hon. member is aware. It has happened several times in the House, not only in this session but also the last session, and it is now the practice of this House to permit a vote on the motion for second reading after defeat of the amendment. But that is as far as the variation extends, to my knowledge.

Therefore, as soon as the amendment has been defeated, I have always been of the opinion that the main motion should then be put forthwith, without any further amendment or motions from any member.

Now, after having said that, I am willing to let the member, on a point of order, explain his position on the matter.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate your courtesy in this matter. The last point in your you said was said, I think, just a moment ago for the first time ever in this House.

It will be recalled that on a number of occasions in this House I have argued that the defeat of an amendment on second reading automatically carries the main motion. You, in your wisdom, sir, have ruled that I was incorrect; that even though that may be the rule set forth in the rule book, the practice in the House is that, except on hoist motions, there is a separate vote on the amendment and on the main motion.

This group here did not agree with your ruling, but we accepted it. We believe in accepting the Speaker's rulings, even if they are to our disadvantage. There was one case not very long ago where it was clearly to our disadvantage to accept that ruling, but we accepted it. But I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, that if your ruling was correct there, then it is a logical corollary that follows as night from day, that the main motion is subject to debate. If a motion is subject to a separate vote, it is subject to a separate debate.

Mr. Speaker: May I interrupt the member just for a moment, to point out that the leader of the Opposition was the first member to speak on the main motion and that was after the ancillary motion was made by the Minister, "that the bill be now read a second time." Then the leader of the Opposition spoke. At the conclusion of his speech he made an amendment to the motion which was placed before the House. At that time it was agreed that members speaking thereafter would be speaking both to the bill and to the amendment—

Mr. Bryden: There was no such agreement!

Mr. Speaker: I remember being asked this question by a member and I believe I pointed out to the member at the time and I agreed he could speak to both the amendment and the bill at the same time and that would be the procedure that we would follow—something the same as was followed in the Budget debates.

The member spoke on the bill and never on the amendment really when he was speaking, because he brought forth many different viewpoints on the various principles within the bill; so I consider that he has spoken on the main motion.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Speaker, I submit to you that there was no such agreement. This is the first I have heard of it and I think it is the first time any member of our group has heard of it. This is an entirely novel ruling that appears to be in the process of being made. We previously had a ruling from which it logically followed that the amendment and the main motion are separable. All of us, except the hon. leader of the Opposition, spoke to the amendment. If we were not speaking to the amendment, we should have been ruled out of order. That is what the debate was on; it was on the amendment.

Now, the main motion is still before the House and I submit, sir, that on the basis of your previous ruling, it is open to debate.

It would be quite unfair and unreasonable to rule otherwise at a time when your ruling will now be to our advantage if it is consistent with the ruling made earlier that was to our disadvantage. I submit to you, sir, that you should permit debate to continue.

Mr. Speaker: I appreciate the member's viewpoint, but I differ from him on this. I have been of the opinion throughout this debate that members were speaking both on the bill and on the amendment that are before the House. In view of this I do not think I should allow the debate to continue further. I have allowed the member to raise the point regarding his wish to speak to the main motion.

Mr. Sopha: Mr. Speaker, may I speak to this point of order?

Mr. Speaker: Would the member wait until I am finished?

In view of our former procedure I had not intended that we continue with any further debate on the main motion but that it should be put forthwith, and to the best of my knowledge that has been the precedent that we have established over the last couple of years, except on the occasion of hoist motions.

Mr. Sopha: Mr. Speaker, the only thing I wish to draw to your attention, sir, in deference to what you have said, is that under the practice of the House, the government prepares the order paper and the government, in virtue of its majority, has the right to call the order of business. In that context, I draw your attention to the seventh order that we are debating today, and the government has decreed that the seventh order is as follows:

7. Resuming the adjourned debate on the amendment to the motion for second reading, Bill 136—

Accordingly, the House is bound by the terms of the order paper, which the government, according to the rules of Parliament, decreed shall be the regulation of business. Accordingly, sir, we in this House cannot change the order of business as on the order paper, and I submit to you that my hon. friend from Woodbine is perfectly correct that all of the debate up to this point has been on the amendment, in accordance with the order of business set out by the government.

Mr. Speaker: The member is not correct, in my view; and I would remind him that it is the Clerk, not the government, who prepares the order paper.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Speaker: Order, order!

Mr. MacDonald: I wondered for a moment where I was, Mr. Speaker. I am sorry to have to rise and say that we are going to have to challenge the ruling that you have announced, and I do this regretfully. I want to underline why we are doing it, Mr. Speaker. We are now—

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Speaker: Order, order!

Mr. MacDonald: We are now, Mr. Speaker, tying the rules of this House in a knot. You chose, earlier in this session, to describe what you call a "variation" in the practice of this House by saying that when an amendment on second reading was defeated it did not automatically carry the motion—

Mr. Speaker: Except on a hoist.

Mr. MacDonald: Except on a hoist. This has been the traditional rule in Parliament—May and everywhere else—all down through history, and you, Mr. Speaker, chose to change it.

We have accepted your ruling; you cannot now reverse it when it happens to be to our advantage. Otherwise, the rules are used and developed to suit the circumstances.

Mr. Speaker, if I may draw to your attention, as proof of the fact that the rules are being made as we proceed—tonight for the first time we learned that as a corollary to the proposition that an amendment on the second motion did not automatically carry the bill, the two motions are put together. This was not announced in earlier debates; this is a new development. It is a new development, I submit, on a pattern which is completely at variance with history, and therefore, Mr. Speaker, we have no alternative but to protect the rights of the Opposition in this House. I challenge your ruling and I do it regretfully.

Mr. A. F. Lawrence (St. George): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, may I draw your attention to page 133 of the precedents of Mr. Lewis, in which he refers to this very question? It was the same question on third reading, mind you, but it was exactly the same question in which, at that time, the Speaker of the day made exactly the same ruling that you are now making at this time.

Mr. Bryden: That was on a hoist motion.

Mr. A. F. Lawrence: No, sir, it was not on a hoist motion, it was to refer it to the committee for further consideration and it was not a hoist motion whatsoever. That is exactly the intent of the motion here.

Mr. Speaker: Thank you very much. I must say that in deference to the member for York South—now, we have not been doing this down through the years—the rule as it stands in May is, and I will read it:

Limitation on questions to be proposed on second or third reading: Under the provisions, if on an amendment to the question for the second or third reading of a bill, the House determines that the word "now" or any other words proposed to be left out of the question shall stand part of the question, the Speaker is directed forthwith to declare that the bill has been read a second or a third time, as the case may be.

As I said before, that is the strict ruling of the British House, but during the last number of years—and I think it was the member for Woodbine who debated a subamendment a few years ago, before my term of office, and brought about the precedent and we have been varying from this rule since—when a motion that is not a hoist motion is made by precedent we have then asked the main motion to be brought forward, and given members an opportunity to vote on the main motion as well as the amendment. But there was no debate on the occasion, and the Speaker called the main motion forthwith as we did on the indemnity bill or the bills to amend The Legislative Assembly Act, which was before the House prior to the Easter holiday.

Mr. Bryden: But nobody asked to debate it, sir. Since you referred to my previous conduct, may I say that on any occasion when I protested in the past about variation from the rule, which is the rule laid down in May and in our own rule book—

Hon. H. L. Rowntree (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. It is my understanding that the Speaker's ruling is not debatable and I—

Mr. MacDonald: Has he made a ruling?

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Speaker, reference was made to what I had done in the past. To the best of my knowledge and recollection, on any occasion when there was a departure from the rule that the two were one motion dealt with in one vote, I always protested, but I was overruled so many times that I finally gave up. Now I am suggesting that we should accept the logical corollary that the main motion and amendment being two separate motions, may be debated separately.

Mr. Speaker: I am of the opinion that the debate was on the main motion and the amendment throughout and I am going to rule that I do now call the main motion to be voted upon, and if the members wish to appeal my ruling, they may do so.

Mr. MacDonald: I have no alternative, under the circumstances, but to appeal your ruling.

Mr. Speaker: All those in favour of the Speaker's ruling will please say "aye."

All those opposed will please say "nay."

In my opinion the "ayes" have it.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Speaker: Order!

All those in favour of the Speaker's ruling will please rise.

All those opposed to the Speaker's ruling will please rise.

 Yaremko—66.

Clerk of the House: Mr. Speaker, the "ayes" are 66, the "nays" 25.

Mr. Speaker: I declare the appeal lost.

All those in favour of the main motion that the bill be read a second time, please say "aye". All those opposed, please say "nay."

In my opinion the "ayes" have it.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, I rise now under the rules. Notice of motion has been given to the Clerk by my colleague, the hon. member for Scarborough West, that upon the calling of the order for the committee of the whole House he will move that the following instruction be given to the committee, namely, that it has the power to consider and make recommendations to amend Bill 136 to provide: 1. That a fund be established to which shall be paid all money necessary to provide—

Mr. Speaker: Order! I cannot conceive of what the member is trying to do at this time because we have not had a vote on the main motion as yet.

Mr. MacDonald: We just finished voting on the main motion.

Mr. Speaker: We voted on the member's appeal of the Speaker's ruling.

Mr. MacDonald: And then we voted on the main motion, by agreement to reversing the vote.

Mr. Speaker: No one said anything.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, the hon. Prime Minister said "reverse vote"; we clearly understood him to say that.

Mr. Speaker: I did not hear the Prime Minister.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Well, Mr. Speaker, yes; I did say that. I was not aware that anyone agreed with me. The hon. member was on his feet talking, but if he agrees we could take the same vote as being in support of the main motion.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed that the same vote be taken as on the amendment? Only in the reverse order.

Motion agreed to; second reading of the bill.

An hon. member: Now what is the hon. member going to do?

Mr. MacDonald: I have indicated what I am going to do. In accordance with the rules laid down by May, I have given a notice of motion that upon calling of the order for the committee of the whole House, it will be moved that the following instruction be given to the committee, namely:

That it has the power to consider and make recommendations to amend Bill 136 to provide:

1. That a fund be established into which shall be paid all money necessary to provide fully comprehensive medical insurance contracts to persons designated in Sections 6 and 7 of the bill and in this motion, and that the said contracts be issued and said fund administered by the hospital services commission of Ontario.

2. That government support according to an appropriate sliding scale be made available to provide comprehensive contracts to those whose taxable income does not exceed $3,000 per year.

3. That all residents—

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Is this a money bill?

Mr. MacDonald: No, it is not.

3. That all residents of the province, whether or not referred to in paragraph 2, be entitled to receive comprehensive contracts from the commission upon voluntary payment by them into the fund of appropriate contributions as determined by the commission; and that issuance of such contracts and payments of such contributions be required in respect of those for whom coverage is mandatory under The Hospital Services Commission Act and regulations.

4. That provision be made to cover prescribed drugs, at least for pensioners, persons for whom continuing drug therapy is required after discharge from hospital and persons for whom long-term drug therapy is necessary.

Mr. Speaker: I am not going to take the time to read here tonight, but set out in the document that I have given to you are the references to the rules which clearly indicate that this is in order. I would just suggest to the House—

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a question of the hon. member? Might we have the courtesy of a copy of his document?

Mr. MacDonald: I would be very glad to give him a copy.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: The hon. member has asked us for copies in the past during the entire session of this House; might we have the courtesy of a copy?

Mr. MacDonald: We will be very glad to give the hon. Minister the courtesy. Does the hon. Minister want the courtesy or does he want to argue?

Mr. Speaker: Order!

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: The hon. member has not given it yet.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Speaker: Order! The member is giving a notice of motion, which he has filed with the Clerk and which he may do. It is not a motion which has to come before the House at this time. The member is filing a notice of motion with the Clerk. I would ask members to wait until he is finished.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: I rise on a point of privilege: Earlier in this session some great point was made about the courtesy to be extended to the hon. members of the Opposition by the government with respect to important matters, motions or bills brought before the House. Now we on the government side have endeavoured to collaborate and to co-operate with that request. We have given copies of notices, copies of bills. Here tonight, on one of the most important debates that the House has had during the current session, at this hour, we have what cannot be described as something that arose at this very moment, but something which has been typed long beforehand; and we have not even had the courtesy of having a copy sent to us.

I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that this is not a one-way street with respect to the handling of the business of this House. The hon. members of the official Opposition endeavour to co-operate with government and give us copies of their bills or statements which they have to make. We have not had one copy of that notice, which is typed, but the press here tonight has had it and it has been distributed. I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that the conduct that is being demonstrated by the hon. leader of the New Democratic Party is a flagrant abuse of the privileges of the House; indeed is an insult to the members of the government.

Mr. Bryden: The hon. Minister is so wrong!

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: This is so right!

I put this to the hon. member: The information that we have is readily available to all hon. members of the House long before the press sitting in the gallery have had it brought to their attention.

The press gallery has been a favourite weapon for the members of the NDP. The secretarial staff wander through the press gallery and give out material long before this House has ever been notified. We are talking about the ordinary courtesies that go along with the conduct of business.

Mr. Speaker: I may say that perhaps the Minister speaking to the point of order, has brought out a very good point, in that when there is an intention to file a notice of motion with the Clerk, that before the member rises and reads the notice of motion, which I doubt is in order, but which he has filed with the Clerk, perhaps it should not be given to anyone else before it is given to the Clerk and perhaps to the leader of the House.

Mr. MacDonald: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. After listening to that unctuous outburst from the other side, let us get the facts straight.

Notice of this motion was given to the Clerk quite some time ago.

Clerk of the House: At 11 o'clock!

Mr. MacDonald: At 11 o'clock. Okay, that is an hour and ten minutes ago.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The member has the floor, and he does not have to yield it until he completes his point of order.

Mr. MacDonald: I have the floor on a point of order.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Speaker: The member is already on a point of order.

Mr. MacDonald: And my point of order is simply this, Mr. Speaker, that it was given to the press only after I rose in this House, and it was given to the House leader as soon as he requested it. If we get that kind of service in the future we will be very pleased.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: But not before—

Mr. MacDonald: What does the hon. Minister mean, not before? We will give it to you just as quickly as you ask for it.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Why the hon. member would not even give the government the courtesy of the notice of a typed document and that is why we are not going to ever see them be the government of this province.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Hon. J. Yaremko (Provincial Secretary): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. Mr. Speaker, I have been sitting here since 1951—

An hon. member: That is too long.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Order. I might ask the Minister to speak to the point of order, as briefly as possible.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: My point is this. I direct your attention, Mr. Speaker, to rule 39 of the rules of this House, of which the Opposition is supposed to be the expert, and it deliberately flaunted rule 39 tonight. The rule says:

Such notice to be laid on the table before 5 o'clock, p.m.

The hon. member did not do this.

Mr. Speaker: I rule all other points of order out of order and ask for the next order of business.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Mr. Speaker, before moving the adjournment of the House, and I have a feeling it is time we all went home, tomorrow we will proceed with the estimates of The Department of Education. Between five and six o'clock in the afternoon we will debate the other public bills and orders; and I would like to do this again on Thursday afternoon, between the hours of five and six o'clock in the afternoon.

At two o'clock tomorrow afternoon, we will commence the estimates of The Department of Education.

Hon. Mr. Robarts moves the adjournment of the House.

Mr. F. R. Oliver (Grey South): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. Prime Minister if he will indicate what motions will be discussed in that hour?

Hon. Mr. Robarts: I think we better start with number one and work our way through.

Mr. Oliver: Well, that seems a very reasonable way.

Motion agreed to.

The House adjourned at 12.15 o'clock, a.m.

Motions.

Introduction of bills.

THE ONTARIO MENTAL HEALTH FOUNDATION ACT, 1960-1961

Hon. M. B. Dymond (Minister of Health) moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to amend The Ontario Mental Health Foundation Act, 1960-1961.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Hon. M. B. Dymond (Minister of Health): Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this Act is very brief. It is to shorten the name Dr. C. K. Clark institute of psychiatry to the Clark institute of psychiatry, and to revise its organization to give the institute powers as to admission, treatment, discharge of patients and related matters.

THE LIQUOR CONTROL ACT

Hon. J. Yaremko (Provincial Secretary) moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to amend The Liquor Control Act.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Hon. J. Yaremko (Provincial Secretary): Mr. Speaker, with your indulgence and the indulgence of the hon. members of the House, I propose to introduce another bill and then deal with the two at the same time.

THE LIQUOR LICENCE ACT

Hon. Mr. Yaremko moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to amend The Liquor Licence Act.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: Mr. Speaker, the Acts which I have introduced are two that the hon. members of this House and the general public, I think, will have a great deal of interest in. I should like to give the purport of the various portions of the bill in a fair amount of detail, trying to keep it as brief as possible to accomplish the purpose of the explanation.

The Acts which it is proposed to amend by the bills introduced have served the people of this province well, but as always this government is anxious that legislation keep pace with the times. It is in this spirit, therefore, that we propose these amendments so that our administration will be in keeping with the needs of the people in this second half of the 20th century.

All matters relating to liquor have been given a most thorough going over, both by the specific responsible authorities and by the government generally. Consideration has been given to many briefs, formal and informal presentations, and criticisms and suggestions noted in the press and as expressed by members of the public and the hon. members of this Legislature. There has not been such a general overhaul of the Acts since they were first passed, though a considerable number of changes occurred in 1962 and during the period since.

The first bill introduced is in respect of The Liquor Control Act. It is this Act that has to do with the control of sale and consumption of liquor in other than licensed premises—matters related to the latter coming within the scope of The Liquor Licence Act which is the second bill. The liquor control bill, with 80 amending sections of varying degrees of significance, provides for a simplified Act. The Act in its revised form is an instrument which will provide for the legitimate distribution and sale of alcoholic beverages and at the same time maintain in the hands of the government, the effective control of such distribution and sale.

The new proposals respecting The Liquor Control Act fall within the following categories:

A. Changes made necessary by the earlier discontinuance of individual permits, resulting in deletion of whole sections and parts thereof, wherein references are made to such permits.

B. Changes made necessary by the renaming of "Vendors" as "Managers."

C. Changes to define, to clarify and to remove redundancy and verbiage.

D. Changes updating several provisions, eliminating others which are no longer required, nor valid, nor currently applicable and to make departmental practice developed as a result of experience, legislative requirement—for example, the audit section.

E. Changes in principle are summarized in the following items, and I think these are the portions which will be of interest presently to hon. members of the House:

Item (1) Ontario wine to include that produced from apples and other fruits in addition to the cherries and grapes now utilized, so that all our fruits may be utilized.

Item (2) Definition of liquor is confined to drinkable liquids, and a new subsection is incorporated into the Act respecting the control of possession, selling and keeping for sale of preparations, combinations or mixtures capable of human consumption that contain alcohol.

Item (3) The requirement that, in all cases, persons must have baggage or personal effects in hotel suites is removed. In a great number of cases persons engage suites at hotels for business meetings and social functions, and we are now meeting this need.

Item (4) An item is in the bill as a proposal to repeal the board's power of expropriation. The board has never exercised this power, is not likely to do so and machinery is available under The Expropriation Procedures Act to acquire property in this way, if necessary.

Item (5) A right is being inserted into the Act to allow for a stated case on a point of law and thus afford such an appeal from a board decision.

Item (6) The board's practice of giving a hearing prior to cancellation, suspension or refusal with reference to licences and permits; and that there be no cancellation of the licence of a brewer, distiller or producer of Ontario wine without a hearing, will now be a statutory requirement. There is provision made under a new section giving a right of appeal to distillers, and so on, when a licence is cancelled.

Item (7) There is a section respecting interdiction and this will provide for appeal from the following orders of the board: prohibiting any person from purchasing, having, giving or consuming liquor; prohibiting vendors, brewers, distillers, producers of Ontario wine and licencees from supplying liquor to any such person; limiting the kind and quantities of liquor which may be purchased by a person either for home consumption or in licensed premises.

Item (8) In respect of orders of interdiction, the powers of making and revoking such orders are extended to a judge of the juvenile and family court and magistrates. That is now limited to a judge of the county or district courts.

A judge of the juvenile and family court who quite often has before him situations which may have been caused by over-indulgence of liquor and a justice who hears a charge against an individual are both in a good position to determine as to whether or not an order of interdiction should be made against the persons appearing before them.

Item (9) In respect of the fines, penalties which may have been adequate when the Act first became effective have been increased, and this covers more than a half dozen sections.

Item (10) The sections respecting the penalty sections of the Act are brought in line with the provisions of section 11 of The Summary Convictions Act which, in turn, provides: that the justice may impose up to a specified maximum fine in lieu of imprisonment, notwithstanding the fact that under the relevant Act, such as The Liquor Control Act, there is a mandatory jail sentence. Now, under the amendment, the justice will be empowered to impose a fine and/or jail sentence, and the maximum is increased with no minimum for all offences so that the judge will have full discretion.

Item (11) The present disqualification of premises for a conviction sometimes have unfair unrelated effects and the procedures are clarified.

Item (12) The sections relating to "search and seizure" are gathered together with a basic change of principle that such actions are to be based on "reasonable grounds for belief" rather than the present "suspicion or belief."

Item (13) There is a proposal to repeal sections which allowed the Crown to indicate in any information that an accused person had been previously convicted; such a procedure being contrary to the principles of accepted Canadian justice specific to section 696 (2) of the criminal code. The customary procedure can be followed that, after conviction, information concerning previous convictions could be given to the presiding judge by the Crown prior to sentence. In conjunction with this, the whole machinery respecting second offences is repealed.

The next few items are of import, not only in this Act, but in the light of the administration of justice generally.

It has become apparent that some sections designed initially to meet a particular situation have been interpreted as to suggest the possibility of an infringement upon the ordinary rights of a citizen that are his under the general principle of our laws that a man is innocent until he is proved guilty.

Now our citizens will be able to go into court with the assurance that they will not be confronted with any extraordinary procedures. To put it simply, they will be dealt with under procedures which have been accepted as those which have proven to be right and fair when a citizen runs afoul of any law.

Item (14) (i) This item deals with the fact that the very unfair provisions in the Act, relating to defences, putting the onus on the accused, are being repealed.

As soon as it appears to a justice trying a case that circumstances in evidence sufficiently establish the offence complained of, he shall put the defendant on his defence and in default of a rebuttal of such evidence to the satisfaction of the justice, convict him accordingly. Though this section does not place upon the accused the onus of proving his defence beyond a reasonable doubt, but only to establish a prima facie defence, and if he does so, the onus shifts back to the Crown to prove the offence beyond a reasonable doubt, it does infer that if the accused does not call a defence he must be convicted, that is, the question of reasonable doubt is not to be considered when the accused elects not to call a defence. This is not normal Canadian justice, at the very least, and the proposal is to repeal the section.

The general principles of criminal law are sufficient. Once the Crown has established that there is some evidence, the accused has the option of giving or not giving evidence or adducing a defence. If he elects not to call a defence, the court must then consider if the evidence produced by the Crown has established guilt beyond a reasonable doubt.

Item (14) (ii) is respecting onus on proof of possession. The complementary sections are these: the present situation is if a person is charged with selling, or keeping for sale, or giving, or keeping, or having, and the like—or receiving, and prima facie proof is given that such person had in his possession or charge or control any liquor in respect of or concerning which he is being prosecuted then the following extraordinary words apply: "Unless the accused person proves he did not commit the offence, he may be convicted."

This section is directly in conflict with the basic principle that the onus to prove should rest on the Crown. The proposal is that this subsection be repealed.

Item (14) (iii) is respecting burden of proof. At the present time the burden of proving the right to have or keep or sell or give or purchase or consume liquor is on the person accused of improperly or unlawfully having or keeping or selling or giving or purchasing or consuming liquor.

The section does not create a conclusive presumption of guilt once prima facie proof of possession and the like has been established but infers that in the absence of a defence, the accused may be convicted. This onus is contrary to normal Canadian justice.

The remarks made in relation to section 133 (1) equally apply to this subsection. If the Crown is alleging that the accused is unlawfully dealing with or consuming liquor then it is desirable that the Crown should have to prove the unlawful use it alleges. There is a similar subsection respecting an onus on physicians in respect of medicinal purposes and these two subsections are repealed in total.

Item (15) There is presently also an unusual section, which provides that an order or warrant based upon a conviction, and no search warrant, shall upon any application by way of certiorari or motion to quash or habeas corpus be held insufficient or invalid for any irregularity, informality or insufficiency therein or by reason of any defective form or substance. That section is repealed.

Section 76 has no effect since a superior court will not pay any attention to it and if a conviction or search warrant is defective in substance, the conviction or warrant will be quashed. The superior court cannot be deprived of its prerogative to interfere with proceedings which are taken in lower courts without jurisdiction and the law seems clear that a court proceeding upon an information which is defective in substance does so without jurisdiction. This type of subsection should not be contained in any statute of this nature. This type of section has on many occasions been criticized by the courts and serves no purpose.

Item (16) There is a present situation in respect to appeals. The section providing for appeals requires that with the notice of appeal the convicted person must deliver an affidavit. That affidavit must be to the effect that the convicted person did not by himself or by his agent, servant or employee or any other person with his knowledge or consent commit the offence charged in the information and must negative the charge in the terms used in the conviction.

All reference to the requirement of such an affidavit is repealed.

This was an extraordinary requirement. The provisions concerning the affidavit are contrary to normal criminal justice. They require a convicted person with his notice of appeal to swear and file an affidavit to the effect that he is innocent of the charge upon which he has been convicted in the course of appeal. It must surely lie with the judge before which the appeal is heard to determine his guilt or innocence.

There is a concluding item and that is the general intent section. The section defining the general intent of the Act provides that the purpose of the Act is to prohibit transactions in liquor that take place wholly within Ontario.

This limitation is removed. With the phrase in question deleted, the board may be in a position to control the circulation of price lists and the taking of orders of the so-called duty-free shops and other shops.

This concludes my remarks with respect to The Liquor Control Act, Mr. Speaker.

Changes in liquor licensing matters fall within three types: 1. changes in legislation; 2. changes in regulations, and 3. changes in policy.

Item (1) The first legislative changes are with respect to definition. The definition of a hotel in respect of the rooms required therefor, are now being changed and clarified. Presently the definition in one item deals with municipalities whereas another reference is to "cities" and "towns." The board is presently including, for example, townships of 15,000 which are not technically included within the latter and requiring them to have not less than 20 bedrooms as a matter of policy because these municipalities warrant this requirement of accommodation. On the other hand, the board is compelled by the statute to include "towns" of a population of 1,000 or 2,000 more or less in this same category, and that is unreasonable.

Now there will be three categories for classification as a "hotel" all related to "municipalities" within three ranges of population: (a) over 100,000, 50 rooms; (b) over 10,000, 20 rooms; and (c) under 10,000, 10 rooms. This will make practice and the statute the same.

A further amendment is being recommended to give some flexibility to this definition by vesting a discretion in the board. This will enable the liquor licence board to exercise a discretion to classify an establishment with only, say, nine rooms as a hotel, even though the requirement is for ten rooms in the municipality concerned, if the needs of the municipality so warrant.

Item (2) The definition of a tavern is revised. An establishment presently needs two licences to be classified as a tavern, for example: "Dining lounge and dining room," or "dining lounge and lounge," or "public house and dining room."

The proposal is that an establishment holding any one licence, except public house alone will be enabled to be called a "tavern" so that what is presently a "restaurant" will be able to call itself a tavern.

Item (3) We are clarifying the interpretation of the meaning of a club being organized. The present situation is that a club has to be in operation for a year or three years, as the case might be, for it to be enabled to be licensed.

Amendments are made to clarify that the meaning given to a "club being organized" does not have to include incorporation, as long as the club has been in operation for the required period and as long as incorporation does in fact take place prior to the issue of the licence.

Item (4) Presently the sale of liquor on planes is not permitted. Licences will be issued to aircraft in the same way as trains. This is to meet a request by our air lines.

Item (5) Presently no premises have been licensed in conjunction with theatres, as there has been no provision in the Act. The proposal is that, a theatre defined as: "an establishment having the special accommodation, facilities and equipment prescribed by the regulations where, in consideration of payment, musical, dramatic or cultural performances are usually staged, but does not include a motion picture theatre" will be enabled to apply for dining lounge and lounge licences. The latter facilities will not operate as full-time cocktail bar but will only be open in the hours during which the theatre is open in respect of performances.

I point out that amongst others, this has been requested by the Canadian centre for the performing arts, the federal government's major centennial project in the capital area.

Item (6) There is a provision that further licences may be issued to premises already licensed, after a vote, without publishing notice of application.

Presently any application has to have notice given thereof and must be dealt with at a special hearing, even including an establishment already licensed in some respect.

Our thinking is that if community approval has already been given by a local vote, it would appear redundant to publish notices of application for the further licences permitted by the vote since it could be presumed that the local people would know, at the time of voting, that premises already licensed would apply for extension.

Item (7) In the Act presently, section 28 of The Liquor Licence Act refers to a person being unable to get a licence unless he is a "British subject." The proposal is to make the requirement "Canadian citizenship."

Just as The Liquor Control Act contained extraordinary legal procedures, to which I refer, so did The Liquor Licence Act. Accordingly, they will be repealed as being improper procedures. I refer to the bill, section 20, which relates to the repeal of section 62, which used to read:

In the prosecution of any offence under this Act in which possession of liquor is an element of the offence, upon prima facie proof of such possession, unless the person charged with the offence proves that he did not commit the offence, he may be convicted thereof.

We think that all cases of supplying liquor on licensed premises in contravention of the Act could be proved without the assistance of this section. Also, there is a section 63, presently:

Proof of the removal of any liquor from any licensed premises in any package is prima facie evidence against the person holding the licence for such premises of the sale of liquor contrary to this Act or The Liquor Control Act.

This section places the person holding the licence in a difficult position and prima facie makes him responsible for the acts of his employees who have illegally supplied liquor to someone who has taken that liquor from the premises. The section contravenes the basic principle that a person should not be responsible for those acts of which he has no knowledge.

Accordingly, these two sections are repealed.

In respect to the taking of evidence before the board, this is set out in section 16 and is related to investigations or hearings: The ordinary rules that are vested in the supreme court apply, except that there are four very large exceptions in which the rules of court do not apply (a) in respect of subpoenas—and I am summarizing these:

(b) No person is entitled to claim any privilege in respect of any document, and so on, on the ground that he might be incriminated or exposed to a penalty or to civil litigation thereby.

(c) No person shall refuse to answer any question upon any ground of privilege, but a solicitor shall not be required to disclose any communications between himself and his client; and

(d) No provision of The Evidence Act exempts any bank or any officer or employee thereof from the operations of this section.

These sections are being repealed, so that the power of the board is no greater than the power of our courts.

In respect to the setting aside of liquor votes, it would appear that under the present liquor provisions, a liquor vote could be set aside because of irregularities and a new vote ordered even though the vote would not have been affected if the irregularities had not occurred. Accordingly, section 6 of The Elections Act, that is the provincial Act under which all hon. members of this House presently seated are elected, will be brought into play, which provides with respect to the effect of irregularities that:

No election shall be declared invalid,

(a) by reason of any irregularity on the part of the returning officer or in any of the proceedings preliminary to the poll;

(b) by reason of a failure to hold a poll and the like;

(c) by reason of the non-compliance with the provisions of the Act as to the taking; the counting or as to limitations of time;

(d) by reason of any mistake in the use of the forms, if it appears to the tribunal having cognizance of the matter that the election was conducted in accordance with the principles of this Act and that the irregularity, failure, non-compliance or mistake did not affect the result of the election.

Now upon the going into effect of the bills as statutes, proposed changes in regulations will take place.

First, in respect to the hours of service in public houses. The present situation is that public houses must presently close between 6.30 and 8 p.m., and the proposal is that they will be permitted to remain open during that period, on an optional basis.

In some establishments, for example, hotels, there are both a public house and a lounge and patrons merely move to the lounge between the hours of 6.30 and 8 p.m., when the public house room is closed. Where an establishment does not have both, patrons go from the public house across the street to a lounge. This restriction dates back to wartime shortages when there were no lounges.

It is to be noted that additional staff may have to be taken on by the public houses if they are permitted to remain open for this additional hour and a half, so it is to be optional; and some may wish to choose to clean up and use it as a meal hour for employees.

In respect of the type of music, singing and the like, permitted in licensed premises, the present situation is that although the liquor licence board policy has been to allow types of music on application from a public house, there has been some misunderstanding as to the range of instruments, and so on, for which permission could be granted.

The proposal is to extend entertainment generally. The board, on application to the board, will allow different types of musical instruments and the like, including piano, accordion, guitar—I picked this list up from a reporter of the press—oboe, xylophone, lute, zither, French horn, violins, and what have you.

An hon. member: How about the bagpipes?

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: The bagpipes will be permitted, I assure the hon. member, and so will vocal or musical groups, audience participation, and singing and dancing, including discotheque—where facilities are available—games such as darts, cards and billiards in all licensed premises, including public houses, with the onus being placed on the proprietor to provide proper facilities and maintain order, at the discretion of the board as to granting and renewing the grant of permission and as to the hours in the light of individual situations.

If the proprietor has control over the type and treatment of music, that is if the music can only be heard in the area of one table and not throughout the whole room, then a broadcast-type system of canned music can be used, but not if the proprietor does not have control. For example, such a thing as a nickelodeon which can be operated by any guest and which can be heard everywhere in the room, and where the servicing company chooses the records, will not be permitted.

Generally, permission will be given for all types of instruments and all types of entertainment in all establishments, but if the proprietor allows things to get out of hand, the liquor licence board will step in.

The board did not, until recently, permit women to serve liquor except in dining lounges or dining rooms. There will be no limitation on women serving in licensed premises and at banquets where women can be present.

The present situation is that no tide lines or figures are required on the measuring of the so-called shot glasses for liquor. In the future all establishments will be required to use measuring glasses having tide lines and figures in the serving of spirits.

The Liquor Licence Act and regulations require that a club, except for veterans and labour, before being licensed must be incorporated, and fraternal organizations will be placed on the same basis as veterans and labour.

At the present time the liquor licence board policy is not to permit the serving of liquor in the open-air parts of dining places or even patios in private clubs, except on a very rare occasion or at special golf tournaments when special permission is granted. The proposal is that reasonable open-air drinking will be permitted—for example, in the open-air portion of roof-top dining lounges and lounges where there is some element of privacy as in the principal dining room.

The present situation is that the board has not been licensing premises which form part of a recreational establishment. The proposal is that dining rooms attached to commercial curling establishments and bowling alleys will be able to apply for dining lounge licences, provided that the liquor licence board's regular standards, which are imposed in respect of private clubs and commercial dining facilities, are met.

I make it clear that it is not the bowling alleys per se which could be licensed, but that dining facilities within a complex that included a bowling alley would no longer be automatically excluded from the possibility of being licensed just because they were so associated, if they were of a standard that could be considered if they were completely separate.

I am sure it will be of interest to the hon. members and to the public to know of certain matters of which no change is announced in the bills introduced.

First, there is no lowering of the legal age of 21 in respect of liquor. I take this opportunity of trying to clear up what would appear to have been some misunderstanding in the relationship to this matter in the minds of the public. At the time of the appearance of the chairman of the liquor control board before the standing committee on government commissions, the hon. member for York South (Mr. MacDonald), the leader of the NDP, directed a question to him respecting the possibility of legalizing the consumption of alcoholic beverages in the home by minors. This was widely misinterpreted as relating to the consumption of alcoholic beverages in licensed establishments, that is in public, by minors.

This latter was at no time contemplated by the government, for we have noted that in jurisdictions where the legal age for what I call public consumption is less than 21, some attempts are being made to raise it to this figure.

In respect of the consumption by minors in the home, this matter has been very thoroughly considered. Assuming that there was some merit in the training of the child in the use and effect of alcohol by a parent, there are posed some difficulties in working out the details respecting the same. Should there be any age specified even in the home? Should the consumption be in the presence of the parent? What responsibility should there be on the parent to ensure that consumption within the home would not lead to difficulties upon the child leaving the home immediately after and, for example, driving a car? How could the policing authorities satisfactorily establish consumption by a minor outside of the home if circumstantial evidence such as liquor on the breath could be discounted if the same could have been acquired in such an alternate legal way?

It has not yet been clearly enough established to us that any advantages accruing from such permission being granted in the home, outweighed some of the potential risks, and therefore hon. members will note that no change is being made.

Second, I mention that at the present time there is no change which would permit of the sale of liquor on Sundays.

Third, the government is confirming its position that it will continue to maintain the local option principle throughout the province. I note that the hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Thompson) is on record as reiterating that if his party were to come to power it would do away with local option. I suggest that in this specific matter the government and the Liberal Opposition are completely opposed; we support its maintenance, they would wipe it out.

The position of the government in respect of local option could no more better be put than it was by Mr. Frank Tumpane in a recent column in which he stated as follows:

Local option gives the residents of any area the right to choose whether they want liquor outlets in their community, and I believe it is a right that the majority should continue to exercise.

If an overwhelming majority of the citizens of one area want to bar liquor outlets, that should be their democratic right, just as long as there is provision for amending the law when majority opinion changes.

Mr. Speaker, we do not intend to force the sale of liquor by retail onto any municipality; the people will continue to decide in the accepted, long-established, traditional manner.

I conclude my remarks, Mr. Speaker, by saying that while this government has moved to meet the needs and wants of our citizens, we are still mindful of the problems which arise from the misuse and abuse of alcoholic beverages, and in particular those associated with what is summed up as alcoholism.

During the course of his estimates in the next few days the hon. Minister of Health will unfold to the House one of the most far-reaching programmes in relation to alcoholism that any jurisdiction on the continent will have.

Thus, as we take steps to execute the will of the people in this field, we are also discharging our duty to take those steps necessary to safeguard the individual and public good.

THE ASSESSMENT ACT

Hon. J. W. Spooner (Minister of Municipal Affairs) moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to amend The Assessment Act.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Hon. J. W. Spooner (Minister of Municipal Affairs): Mr. Speaker, there are a number of amendments proposed to The Assessment Act this year which deal with the matter of assessment and taxation of properties owned by school boards, harbour commissions and similar organizations. Also, there are some sections dealing with the use and adoption of the assessment manual and adjustment of pipeline assessments, as well as sections dealing with the appointment of county assessment commissioners before this system goes into operation.

Further, permission is now granted for cities and separated towns to come into the county assessment system if they so desire.

Another section deals with the matter of providing benefits, fringe benefits of various kinds, to the staffs of district assessors. We are also increasing the amount from $200 to $400 for collection of taxes in division courts.

Probably the most important amendment proposed is with reference to the matter of refund of taxes on account of vacancy. I am recommending that the appropriate section of The Assessment Act be withdrawn and deleted from the Act.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day I have the very great privilege to introduce to you, and through you to the hon. members of this House, the Honourable Mr. Ronald Mack, Minister of Health for the state of Victoria, the Commonwealth of Australia.

The Honourable Mr. Mack is visiting our province and our nation for the first time in his life. He has come at a very excellent time.

He tells me that the state which he serves—and he is a member of the Upper House in that state—occupies a third of the land mass of the Commonwealth of Australia, but is responsible for 30 per cent of the production of the nation, so it is not very much different than our own province of Ontario.

I know, sir, you would have me wish for Mr. Mack a very pleasant stay in our midst and express to him the hope that he will like us so well he will want to come back.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Clerk of the House: The twelfth order, House in committee of supply; Mr. W. G. Noden in the chair.

ESTIMATES, DEPARTMENT OF EDUCATION

Hon. W. G. Davis (Minister of Education): Mr. Chairman, in rising to present the estimates of The Department of Education for the current year—and this is the third occasion on which I have had that privilege—I need hardly assure the hon. members of this assembly that I am more conscious than ever of the magnitude of my task as Minister of Education, and of the vast scope and complexity of the activities and problems which engage the daily attention of my department.

The total figure of these estimates, amounting to almost $454 million, represents 38 per cent of all government expenditures.

When we add to that the expenditures of our municipalities and our university grants, we come to a total figure in excess of one billion dollars annually, and this is some measure of the importance our people attach to the things of the mind.

Since the first modest school house was opened in this province in 1785 to the 7,000 schools now operating in 1965, the people of this province have built up a massive investment in education. Over 60,000 men and women are now giving dedicated service to our teaching profession. Additional thousands are serving on our boards of education and in the ancillary services. I may say at this point that while it is difficult to strike an accurate figure as to the dollar value of all our school buildings, I am able to tell the House that those built during the period from 1945 to 1964 cost almost $700 million. It is also worth noting that when all of these figures are added together, it will be seen at once that their effects reach far beyond the classroom and that our expenditures on education are a most important factor in maintaining the health and vigour of our economy.

My colleague, the hon. Provincial Treasurer (Mr. Allan), has already reminded us that enrolment in our primary and secondary schools has more than doubled in the past 20 years and that we can expect at least a comparable increase in the course of the next two decades.

I am certain that there will be no disagreement in this assembly, when I say that these 1,700,000 young Canadians constitute our biggest single asset and our brightest hope for the future. From the classrooms in which they sit will come the men and women who will one day govern our towns, our cities and our province, who will share in the government of Canada, who will direct and manage our ever-growing and complex economy, who will apply their knowledge and skills in all areas of our economic, industrial and community life and who will lead Canada into a great new century of progress. Many, no doubt, will attain high distinction in their chosen professions, and some will follow in the footsteps of Osler, Banting, Best and other sons and daughters of Ontario, whose creative labours have been such a blessing to all mankind.

When viewed in that light, the estimates you are being asked to approve take on new meaning. In a very real sense they constitute not mere expenditure, but rather a gilt-edged investment from which the economic, social, cultural and spiritual returns to our society are simply beyond calculation.

Mr. Chairman, it is now generally recognized that education is our first line of defence. Indeed, it may be said that our progress as a nation can proceed no faster than our progress in education. Unhappily, we live in a world in which military weapons are still necessary to our security and require massive expenditures, but these have now reached a stage of such frightening and destructive power that civilized people the world over can only hope that the exercise and triumph of reason, restraint and common sense will make it unnecessary to employ them.

Such, however, is not the case with weapons of the mind. There is now available to us a vast new knowledge which, if fully applied to the needs of our own society and of all mankind, can bring us close to the realization of that abundant life of which the ancient prophets dreamed.

Surely we could not set before ourselves a loftier goal than to make our own educational system a powerful factor in hastening the day when the governments and peoples of this world will be able to prove through their creative endeavours that, as an instrument of human progress, the well-equipped head is indeed mightier than the sword.

And so, with these great objectives in mind, it is my earnest hope that the hon. members of this House will subject these estimates to the most thoughtful and exhaustive examination.

And now, Mr. Chairman, with a desire to keep the hon. members fully informed of what is going on in the department and of some trends in our planning, I should like to make some general comments on four aspects of our provincial programme. First, I shall refer to our schools and certain changes in the pattern of our school system's organization, then to facilities other than the university for post-secondary school education, to activities in the field of adult education, and finally to some educational trends related to technological change.

The school system of Ontario is, as you know, a decentralized one. That is, one in which local school boards carry significant responsibilities and are given commensurate authority by our school legislation. A century and a half ago, when our system was taking form in a pioneer setting, roads were poor, modes of transportation were primitive and communities were small and closely knit. As a result, our early units of school administration were small in area and our boards of school trustees were large in number. As a result of legislation passed in this House a year ago, a long step forward has been taken to improve this situation. The organized township has now become the general unit for the administration of rural public schools, and consultative committees are being established in each county to make recommendations for uniting township units in still larger blocks at the discretion of the county council.

You will recall that over half of the organized townships of the province had constituted themselves as township school areas voluntarily before Bill 54 of a year ago made such action mandatory. I am pleased to report that the transition of the remainder to the larger unit was effected with the minimum of difficulty in January of this year. Only two townships with population larger than 10,000 took advantage of the special option in the bill whereby they might have two school areas formed within their boundaries, and fewer than a half dozen situations experienced serious problems in the process of amalgamation. Clearly, public opinion shared the conviction of hon. members of this House that the broad planning required in education today makes the establishment of larger units not only desirable but necessary. To sum up the change of last January, I may point out that the number of rural public school boards in the counties was reduced from 1,850 to 423, and in the districts of the north from 233 to 166.

The separate schools were not involved in the township area legislation, but in many localities they, too, are amalgamating and forming combined separate school zones, with the purpose of establishing rural central schools to provide an increasing number of their pupils with a graded school education.

At the secondary school level, all parts of the counties are now included in high school districts. Through voluntary co-operation, the technical facilities of certain secondary schools are being used by students from smaller neighbouring schools. It was so clearly desirable to encourage this practice, that I announced last February that The Department of Education would assume 100 per cent of the cost of building the technical and occupational shops and associated classrooms necessary to accommodate, in neighbouring composite schools, the increased enrolment of pupils in technical and occupational courses. This policy will enable secondary school boards, whose schools are too small for limited technical education or who do not operate secondary schools, to make agreements with other boards operating composite schools and arrange bus transportation for their pupils to these composite schools. Since the federal government refunds to the province 50 per cent of such approved expenditures, you will understand that this offer was made only for the tenure of the present agreement between the federal and provincial governments relative to technical and vocational training programmes.

I might add that, where joint action of high school districts—each too small to support technical education—occurs, The Department of Education will assume 100 per cent of the cost of building all vocational units, provided that the combined projected enrolment in one school is 1,000 or more. Through the type of encouragement I have described, I am confident that the programme of diversified courses will be extended still more widely across the province.

Mr. Chairman, I come to some recent changes in organization. These have not been limited to local authorities. The department itself has undergone a major reorganization at the beginning of this year to enable it to deal more efficiently with the important problems requiring its attention. I have already discussed these changes in some detail with the education, health and welfare committee of this Legislature, and I shall not deal with them at any great length at this time beyond reminding you of its main purposes: First, to bring the elementary and secondary school panels closer together; second, to reduce the number of special subject branches and to integrate them in the main instructional stream; third, to decentralize departmental administration by establishing over a period of time a number of administrative areas across the province; and fourth, to relieve professional educators of responsibility for school business wherever possible, and to place such business in the hands of senior clerical staff, professional accountants and school business officials.

At the same time, the general pattern of the department has been brought into line with that of the other departments of government. The former plan of having a chief director of education assisted by two deputy Ministers—one for the elementary schools and one for the secondary schools—has been changed, and we now have one deputy Minister, as the senior official, supported by three assistant deputies—one for instruction in both elementary and secondary schools, one for provincial schools and further education and one for business administration.

Mr. Chairman, I am sure that all the hon. members of this House share our deep regret at the sudden passing of our former chief director, Dr. F. S. Rivers. From the time he began his teaching career in Owen Sound some 35 years ago, Dr. Rivers occupied a succession of important posts in our department and, during that period, made an outstanding contribution to the development and progress of Ontario's educational system.

Throughout his long career he served our province with singular devotion. We had all hoped that Dr. Rivers would be able to enjoy many more years, freed from onerous responsibility and devoted to the creative leisure which he had so richly earned and to which he had looked forward. He will always be remembered among those whose lives were made richer by his presence.

Mr. Chairman, I am certain that I speak for all hon. members of the Legislature when I say how gratified we are that D. Z. S. Phimister has agreed to accept the appointment as deputy Minister. Dr. Phimister's distinguished and productive career in the field of education is well known at home and abroad, and is admired by all of us.

We are particularly fortunate that he comes to us after having completed seven years as director of education in the city of Toronto, during its greatest period of expansion and development. I know that I shall find in Dr. Phimister a valuable colleague and a wise counsellor, and that our department will derive great benefit from his rich and varied experience. Dr. Phimister expressed a desire to remain anonymously in the wings today, but since he is within range of our vision, I am going to ask him to stand and accept our greeting.

Two new service units have been established within the department during the past year; an information branch and a division of school planning and building research. With the department responsible for a budget approaching half a billion dollars annually, and with education having become a major concern in all jurisdictions, I am convinced that there is continuing need for a two-way interchange of information on educational activities, policies, and plans between the department on the one side and the public on the other. Accordingly, last summer an information branch, headed by Charles Williams, a former secondary school teacher with an interest in publicizing activities in educational matters, was established for this purpose.

At the same time a division was set up for the study of school building materials; the planning of schools adapted to new teaching patterns, such as those related to team teaching, tutorial groups, language laboratories, and audio-visual aids; the practices designed to get the greatest possible value from the school building dollar. The establishment of this new division under Mr. Frank Nichol, an able young architect, was a direct result of a recommendation from the conference on school design held in September, 1963, which was largely attended by school trustees, architects and construction experts.

Our school construction programme has continued at a relatively heavy rate in 1964. Some $71 million was spent to provide approximately 77,000 pupil places in 457 new buildings and additions for the elementary schools, while $40 million was spent to provide some 17,500 places for our secondary school students. Two trends were responsible for the building programme being larger than was expected: The movement to provide rural central schools at the elementary level, and the continued demand for vocational school facilities in secondary schools.

Teacher supply is almost adequate to meet the demand, but problems still exist in this field. The number of teachers available for the public schools is generally satisfactory but there is some scarcity of staff for the separate schools where the annual percentage rate of increase in enrolment outpaces that of the public school system. The supply of teachers for the secondary schools continues to be maintained with the aid of special summer courses. Nearly 2,000 student-teachers enrolled at centres at Kingston, London and Toronto for these initial eight-week summer courses in 1964, and 331 elementary school teachers qualified for secondary school work through another summer course programme. The enrolment of teachers in training at the winter course at the Ontario college of education, Toronto, in September, 1964, totalled 816. Next September, the new Ontario college of education affiliated with the University of Western Ontario in London will open its doors, and I am hopeful that the total winter enrolment will increase as a result. An agreement for the establishment of a third college of education in affiliation with Queen's University, Kingston, is presently being drawn up.

At the present time a broadly representative committee is at work studying the preparation of elementary school teachers. It has been asked to recommend what immediate changes it thinks desirable in the courses as now conducted in our 12 teachers' colleges, and also to indicate what it would regard as an ideal programme for the training of elementary school teachers and the steps by which such a programme might be developed in the years ahead. Meanwhile, it is planned to establish a thirteenth teachers' college this September on the campus of Brock University, St. Catharines. It will operate in rented quarters until such times as a permanent building can be constructed for the purpose.

One of the strengths of our secondary school staffing situation has been the contribution made by teachers with Type A certificates. Most of these staff members have spent four years on an honours course at university, and are subject specialists. This is the kind of university graduate who now finds scholarships available to help him proceed to the master's and doctoral degrees, and who is continuing with his studies to qualify himself for teaching in the universities. He is needed there and we are glad to have him preparing himself for that work. But we need honours graduates in high school teaching as well, and it seemed only prudent to offer some help or inducement to such candidates who are considering attendance at an Ontario college of education upon graduation. Accordingly, I announced in February that every student who qualifies for enrolment in a Type A course at the Ontario colleges of education this fall, will be eligible for a $500 fellowship. This new plan recognizes the importance of encouraging young people with special scholarly backgrounds to enter secondary school teaching as a career.

The in-service training programme for teachers has been expanding principally through departmental summer courses, where some 10,000 teachers pursue studies related to their classroom duties, and through university summer courses, where elementary school teachers take classes leading to BA degrees. The teachers themselves have been active in many centres through their federation and other groups in providing lecture courses during the winter months for their own professional improvement, but these courses have varied widely in length and content and have not led to departmental certificates. Recently several of the larger school boards have indicated interest in providing winter courses equivalent in hours, content, and quality to summer courses provided by the department and have asked that the teachers taking these winter courses successfully should be issued departmental certificates. Their request has been granted, and a plan has been set up to look after this development. During the present school year Etobicoke, North York, and Toronto are conducting such courses in guidance, mathematics, and school librarianship, respectively.

The revision of courses of study for kindergarten and grades 1 to 6 is at present the major activity of the curriculum division. The committees that will carry on this work include teachers and educational officials, of course, but provision is also being made for consultation with parents, university staff members, and community leaders. In this connection a committee of 21 members has been established under the distinguished chairmanship of Mr. Justice Hall not to do detailed work on the revision of subject material, but to consider the general aims and objectives of the revision. Fifteen of the members of this committee are persons who are not classroom teachers but who have general or special interests in the educational field and who have taken a vigorous part in community life. Five representatives from the Ontario teachers' federation and the superintendent of curriculum complete the membership of this committee, from which it is hoped that useful guide-lines will come for the curriculum changes now under consideration.

As this curriculum revision proceeds, bulletins will be printed and distributed to teachers describing the progress being made. The time has passed when courses of study can be written by two or three experts and then handed to principals and teachers to carry out in the classroom. A new course of study should not come as a surprise, nor should it come to teachers who are unprepared to implement it. Effort is being made to involve the teachers themselves in the formulation of the new programme and to acquaint them with its pattern as it takes shape.

The reorganized programme in the secondary schools has now reached grade 11. It provides, as hon. members know, four- and five-year programmes in each of three branches: Arts and science; business and commerce; and technology and trades.

The four-year courses are designed for students wishing a good general education not leading to the university, but the fact that a student can enter any one of these branches and proceed to grade 13 in a five-year course and then go on to university, has done a great deal to equalize the prestige of the three branches. One very gratifying result of the operation of the reorganized programme has been a reduction in the number of drop-outs from 12.6 per cent in 1962-63 to 10 per cent in 1963-64.

The grade 13 examination has, as you are well aware, been under criticism for some years. It was said to be a cram year; it was said to be trying to do too much in too many subjects; it was said to be sending young people into higher education ill-equipped to pursue learning under their own initiative.

Now, actually, the grade 13 examination has had its merits and its values, but frankly there has been enough truth in the criticisms I have mentioned to warrant some changes. A committee of outstanding men and women undertook a study of this examination roughly a year ago, and as a consequence of their report, which I trust all of you have read, the number of examination papers has been reduced, the courses of study have been shortened, a policy of giving some credit to the candidate's term mark has been introduced, and the study of certain portions of each course in depth is now required. These changes have been made with a view to encouraging more independent effort and a more scholarly approach on the part of the student.

One important recommendation in the report asked for the establishment of a committee to look into the possibility of advanced and general levels of instruction in grade 13. This committee was established and prepared a report which was submitted to me on March 18. Copies of this report were widely distributed so that most interested persons in Ontario received a copy. Although the committee had hoped to go ahead with some experimental work in advanced and general levels this fall, we have decided to spend a year in the preparation of curricula so that the programme can be established on a firmer footing in the fall of 1966.

I come now to the question of French instruction.

Interest in having a second language taught to children of elementary school age is not confined to our own province. In England and in the United States experimental work is being done in this field, and the climate for introducing a second language—usually French—to the elementary school curriculum in other educational jurisdictions seems very favourable at this time. Among the reasons for such general interest may be mentioned: (i) A conviction that the interdependence of all countries makes education in one language inadequate, (ii) the fact that an earlier start in learning a new language will give more time for skill in its use to develop, and (iii) the knowledge that children when they are young respond particularly well to oral language teaching.

In addition to these reasons, a special reason exists for added interest in the teaching of French in the elementary as well as in the secondary school grades in Ontario.

French is one of the two native languages within Canada. This is a fact of our history. The French language is not only the tongue of one of our founding peoples but its use is legally authorized in a number of situations related to government. Ability to use both the English and French languages is recognized as highly desirable in Canada, not only for business and cultural advantages, but as an influence for unity under Confederation.

Then, too, we have in Ontario three areas generally speaking—the Ottawa Valley, the Windsor area, and northern Ontario—where French is the mother tongue of substantial groups of our Ontario people. Their children study both English and French in our schools and it is encouraging to note the action being taken in our English-speaking elementary schools to begin the study of French.

During the present school year 184 school boards are offering French to 140,000 English-speaking pupils in the elementary schools of Ontario. This represents eleven per cent of the total enrolment of students in kindergarten and grades 1 to 8.

It has been departmental policy to approve the introduction of a programme of French instruction in a local school system only when it was established that the classes would be staffed by teachers who could meet a high standard of oral fluency in the language. For this reason the programmes offered throughout the province to date have been based upon direct classroom teaching rather than upon the predominant or exclusive use of such instructional devices as tapes and records.

Summer courses have been offered for the training of teachers in instructional methods. The courses have been open only to teachers who could meet the required standard of oral proficiency. In the summer of 1965 they will be held in Ottawa and in Toronto.

In the course of its study of the teaching of French as a second language, the Ontario curriculum institute last summer conducted an experiment designed to train English-speaking teachers whose background in the French language was acquired during their years as pupils in the Ontario secondary schools.

Last year I invited a committee of teachers, inspectors, and university professors to study and report on possible procedures for developing an articulated programme of French-language instruction through the elementary and secondary grades of our system.

As a consequence of our study of the findings of these investigations and of the experience acquired in local areas, it has now been decided that French should become a recognized option in the elementary school programme for English-speaking students in grades 7 and 8, beginning in September, 1966. It should be noted that the school boards will decide if and when the option will be offered in the schools under their jurisdiction.

The supply of teachers will be augmented by every means consistent with the maintenance of high standards. A number of qualified teachers will take the summer course in methods of instruction. Qualified teachers from other provinces and countries who demonstrate the necessary oral competence will be eligible for an elementary school teacher's certificate for French only. Individuals who have standing in French equivalent to the Ontario grade 13, who are fluent in oral French, and who are not otherwise qualified as teachers may be admitted to a special summer course leading to a temporary certificate as a teacher of French to English-speaking pupils in elementary schools. Teachers holding permanent certificates valid in the bilingual elementary schools are also eligible for letters of permission to teach in this programme. Thus, it will be seen that all possible sources of teacher supply are being identified, to the end that our students may receive instruction of the highest quality.

It is planned that tentative outlines of departmental courses of study will be issued during the next school year and that courses at the secondary school level will be adjusted over the ensuing years to take advantage of the pupils' elementary school experience in French.

It is also expected that such radio and television facilities as may be available will be used to support the programme.

A director of French for English-speaking classes was appointed in August of 1964. Since that date he has been visiting schools in a consultant and advisory capacity and will continue to be available to boards on the same basis. The director will supervise the implementation of the departmental programme, will give local assistance in such matters as schedules for itinerant teachers of French, instructional techniques, and materials.

I am confident that the emphasis on the quality of teaching has been responsible for the laying of a sound foundation for the programme, and that the plans as I have outlined them here will result in its continuing growth. We can therefore anticipate that the programme of French instruction will take its place in the curriculum as a source of educational and cultural enrichment in the lives of the students.

I should like at this point, Mr. Chairman, to make just a few comments about Ontario's main centennial project, the centre of science and technology, and of the part it is to play in the educational life of our province.

The department has been actively involved in the planning of the centre and we have been carefully studying the educational aspects of this exciting institution.

To that end a special committee was set up to act as an advisory body and in addition to carrying out some educational research on the subject, the committee members have visited a number of the larger and more progressive science museums in Canada and in the United States in order to obtain first-hand information relating to the educational needs, problems, and management of such centres. Some of the committee's recommendations have already been submitted to the director of the project.

The department sees the science centre as an essential and integral part of the education of the child, the adult, the pupil, the teacher, the specialist, the layman and, of course, the resident and the tourist. In a word the centre, although separated from the classroom, is envisaged, not as an extension of the school, but as a part of it. It should be as important as the science laboratory and the school library.

Class visits to the centre should not be interpreted as enrichment fringes to the science courses but rather as essential and interwoven threads within the pattern of the courses. There has been some tendency to regard the centre as a Toronto project, intended to serve only the people of our capital city and the visiting tourist. Naturally, because of its location, it is more accessible to the people of Toronto and the surrounding communities. I should like to make it very clear, however, that the centre is not to be regarded as a local institution or for local residents only. It is a provincial centre and must therefore be accessible to all who wish to make use of its services. It is obvious, of course, that no school in the province is in a position to provide the facilities of such a centre. Our task then is to devise ways and means of utilizing modern transportation to make its services available to all. The whole purpose of this great institution would be defeated, and the vast expenditure hardly would be justified if it did not serve the whole Ontario community. A great deal of thought has already been given as to the best means of making it serve the wider purpose. Among other things we want the centre to be a place for science conferences, reference facilities, laboratories for science classes and clubs, science lectures and classes, as well as for displays and the usual services of a science centre. In short we want it to be an active, vital, teaching centre rather than a silent mausoleum of inanimate displays.

When viewed in that light the centennial science centre becomes an important contribution to the educational progress of this province. We strongly urge all school boards and community organizations and our citizens generally to keep that aim in view and to assist us in making it a reality.

I trust that this information, Mr. Chairman, will satisfy hon. members that our centennial project will be an exciting scientific centre, where this and future generations will be able to view the rich and manifold achievements of our people and receive inspiration for still greater achievements in the years ahead. We deem it a great privilege to play an active part in its development and we look forward to it becoming one of the great educational institutions of Ontario and of Canada.

Since the committee on education, health and welfare has already devoted one of its sessions to the provision now made in the province for the training of retarded children, I shall touch upon this topic only briefly. I should like to remind hon. members, however, that 1965 is a significant year in the development of the programme in the interest of these girls and boys. Begun some 10 years ago, the movement for schools for the retarded has advanced with almost unbelievable rapidity, on a financial basis of substantial provincial grants supplemented by voluntary giving from parents and the public at large. I cannot speak too highly of the dedicated effort and leadership of the local associations for retarded children and of all that they have and are accomplishing. They have brought new hope and practical help into the lives of many children and, of course, their families.

Hon. members will recall that at the last session of the Legislature it was felt that the financial burden of operating these schools should no longer be carried in part by charitable givings. Accordingly, legislation was passed placing this responsibility chiefly on the province, but for the rest, it is on the municipalities in which the parents of the pupils reside. The province now carries 80 per cent of the operating costs including transportation. The local associations still provide the buildings occupied by the schools, but school construction is assisted by a 50 per cent grant from The Department of Education. The budget and the operation of each school is administered by a local retarded children's education authority, consisting of six members—four appointed by the council of the municipality in which the school is located, and two appointed by the local association for retarded children. These authorities have now been appointed and have assumed their new responsibilities with an interest that augurs well for the future of the schools.

Since I have already made statements to this House regarding the grant regulations for 1965, including that relating to textbooks in grades 11 and 12, I shall not deal with these matters at this time, and shall pass on to some comments on facilities, other than the university, for post-secondary school education.

Large numbers of our young people who do not proceed to the universities have a strong desire for further technical and technological training. For these, the institutes of technology and the vocational centres are proving most helpful. Institutes of technology are now in operation in Haileybury, Hamilton, Kirkland Lake, Ottawa, Toronto, the Lakehead and Windsor. During the current school year, the seven institutes enrolled 5,521 students in full-time day courses and 8,165 in extension courses. Two of these institutes—Ryerson polytechnical institute in Toronto and the Lakehead college of arts and science—operate under their own boards of governors; the other five, as hon. members know, are administered by the technological and trades training branch of The Department of Education. In addition, three institutes of trades operate in Metropolitan Toronto and two new vocational centres have been established during the past years—one in London, the other in Ottawa. The total enrolment in the institutes of trade and vocational centres as of last September was 4,725 in the day-school and 2,290 in the night-school programme. Thus, more than 20,000 young people are involved in the programme of these technical and technological institutions.

The name "Ontario vocational centre" was adopted for the new institutions instead of "provincial institute of trades," because the rapid advance in automation and in the technologies has made it desirable to add a wide variety of courses in the new centres at a level higher than that of apprenticeship but below that of the technologist. A third vocational centre will open this September, located in Sault Ste. Marie, and two others are in the planning stage to be located in Hamilton and in the Niagara peninsula. The Hamilton vocational centre is to be located on the same campus as the new buildings for the Hamilton institute of technology, and the resulting complex is to be designated as an Ontario technical education centre.

I should point out, Mr. Chairman, that we should really take this proposal in light of the introduction of the bill for colleges of applied arts and technology and the fact that the position of our institutes of technology will be referred to the board of regents, so that perhaps this new name may not come into being.

This combination gives promise of such excellent results that its development and operation will be watched with close interest. It is felt that having the institute and vocational centre operating on a co-ordinated basis will have many advantages over having them operating independently of each other.

An advanced technical evening programme is now available in a number of secondary schools and in the institutes of technology on a three-level basis corresponding to the three years of the day programme of the institutes. Each level is accepted academically by the association of professional engineers for certification purposes as engineering technicians and technologists. This certification programme makes it possible for secondary school graduates who enter employment, to qualify as technicians and technologists through evening classes.

The advanced technical evening programme I have mentioned serves to bring me to my third topic, namely, activities in the field of adult education. These are varied in type, but prominent among them is the service provided by the correspondence courses division of The Department of Education in upgrading the academic achievement of persons no longer attending school. It is estimated that, of the 25,000 students who will enrol for correspondence courses this year, more than 90 per cent will be over 20 years of age and employed. The courses enable such students to improve their academic standing even when they are unable to attend night school because of night or shift work. More than 4,000 students are at present working at the grade 13 level. In addition to academic courses, Ontario also provides through correspondence, 11 trade courses under a plan worked out in co-operation with the federal government; other trade courses are provided by other provinces to avoid duplication of effort. Through this service, such groups as carpenters, mechanics and radio technicians may improve their theoretical knowledge by correspondence.

The technological and trades training branch of the department is responsible for the administration of programmes 4 and 5 under the federal-provincial technical and vocational training agreement. Programme 4 is concerned with upgrading the educational level of employed persons, and work of this kind has been done in co-operation with three industries in Peterborough and Sault Ste. Marie. Programme 5 for the training of the unemployed is still expanding throughout the province under the supervision of local committees. Last year, this retraining was conducted in 38 centres, and the graduates of the programme obtained employment in more than 90 per cent of cases.

In this connection, a few weeks ago it was my privilege to open a counselling and training centre in Toronto. This is a new concept in aid to the unemployed. The centre accommodates classes for unemployed persons who have been referred there by the national employment service. Those admitted are interviewed, counselled and tested, and then directed to skill-training courses or basic educational schools in the city.

Although the centre is staffed by teachers and guidance personnel from the Toronto board of education, The Department of Education and the federal Department of Labour provide the necessary financing. Depending on eligibility, those persons admitted to the centre under programme 5 of the federal-provincial technical and vocational training agreement, receive allowances of $5 to $10 per day while undergoing training.

Night classes in the secondary schools have long played an effective role in the provincial adult education programme. During 1963-64, such classes were offered in 238 centres to more than 117,000 students. The four most popular courses were academic, commercial, industrial and trades, and home economics, with art, drama, crafts and physical fitness each commanding a substantial enrolment.

A number of municipal recreation committees sponsor evening classes in such fields as art, crafts, drama, music and puppetry, and the community programmes division of The Department of Education has special advisers on these activities who work out of the central office in Toronto. The branch has nine other district offices located across the province, and its representatives in these offices provide assistance, advice and resources for local programmes in adult education and recreation. The community programmes branch has also been working closely with the Ontario council for the arts in promoting interest and activities in arts and crafts at the local level.

Actually, the whole programme of the Ontario council for the arts is related to adult education. Since November, 1963, when the members of the council were appointed, this body has been actively concerned with artistic organizations in all parts of Ontario. From Atikokan to Windsor to Ottawa, the council has not only made grants of money but has also given advice and guidance to those organizations which have sought help. Much of the council's budget must go to subsidizing the major performing arts organizations, but much of the council's attention is directed to smaller projects in communities where it is important to foster active participation in various fields in the arts. Details of the programme will be found in the first annual report of the council, which has been sent to each hon. member of the Legislature.

I should like to take this opportunity to express my appreciation to the members of the Ontario council for the arts for the time and service they have given unstintingly—and incidentally without remuneration—in the performance of their duties. They are blazing a new trail, and in doing so they are giving us a fine example of dedicated citizenship; of participation in government by the people. Recognition of the importance of artistic expression in the life of the province is shown in the estimates you have before you, in which $500,000 is allotted to the arts council for its operations in the new fiscal year.

In these comments upon adult education, mention should be made of the youth branch which was established in The Department of Education a little over a year ago to investigate the problems of young people—in the age-group 16 to 25—who are no longer in the school system. Substantial progress has been made in its studies thus far and it is expected that the programme will be further developed as a result of its inquiries coupled with the findings of the Legislature's select committee on youth, which is making a major investigation in the same area. Provision has been made in the estimates before you for an increase in the staff of the youth branch to include three research officers with special competence in sociology, economics and education.

Finally, with respect to adult education, I would emphasize the contribution of the public libraries of the province. When we read that some forty million books go out on loan in a single year from the libraries; and when we think how, as individuals, we turn to the library in our community not only for leisure reading but also, when new problems in unfamiliar areas of knowledge present themselves, we realize the extent of the influence of these institutions on the recreational and cultural life of Canada. In the estimates you will note that provision of $3.25 million in legislative grants is being made for the libraries in the 1965-66 fiscal year, representing an increase of $450,000 over the total provided for this purpose just a year ago.

My fourth topic, Mr. Chairman, concerns some educational trends related to technological change. We in The Department of Education have not been unmindful of such change and, indeed, have already anticipated the emphasis which will be placed on education and training in the future. We realize, as I said earlier, that the well-being and growth—in fact, very survival—of our nation depends on our educational efforts and on the development of our human resources. I wish to spend a few minutes now in looking ahead to the plans made to search for and implement changes to meet our new needs.

First, I would emphasize the key role that has been played by the department of educational research in the Ontario college of education. This is not only a part of the University of Toronto, but it is also the research arm of The Department of Education, and its director and staff are well qualified to guide the studies that are so necessary if we are to plan wisely for the future. In addition, in our own offices we have recently established a planning and development council—a name which I think should be remembered by the hon. member for York South (Mr. MacDonald)—to take advantage of the results of formal research and of the experience of other educational jurisdictions in seeking solutions to new problems. Then, as a participant in the Ontario curriculum institute, our department is associated with the teachers' federation, the trustees' council, the universities and educational officials in a broad programme of educational investigation.

Finally, we are following the practice, as you have noted earlier in my remarks, of calling together representative committees to advise us regarding specific problems, thereby not only availing ourselves of informed advice, but developing a climate of acceptance for the solutions thus jointly evolved. Through these resources we are seeking to identify needs and to devise solutions in meeting them.

I have already mentioned the research being done in the youth branch and in the division of school planning and architectural research. A significant study is underway in Sault Ste. Marie which has been sponsored by two major companies in that city, and which is of interest to our department. The Soo study, which is now in its second year, is concerned primarily with the careers and problems of school youth in that city, both of high-school drop-outs and of graduates. I am hopeful that similar studies will be launched in other communities. The full story for the province as a whole on this topic is, of course, available in the results of the Atkinson study, a follow-up of the complete grade 13 group of students begun nearly ten years ago, and the Carnegie study, a similar survey of the complete grade 9 group of students started six years ago, both conducted by the department of educational research.

The same department has almost completed another study concerning the education and employment of women—encompassing not only a review of what has been done in the past and what is being done now, but also a preliminary consideration of the demands and needs of the future for the education and training of this important section of our labour force. Many questions are being raised about what the future holds for this half of our population; there is every indication that we will, in the future, require women for service in industry, commerce and the professions as well as in the home. What education should young women then receive to enable them to return to the world of work after they have married and after their family obligations have, for the most part, been met? This is but one of the many problems which demand our concern and for which answers need to be found. As you know, the present trend is for many women to return to employment for 20 years or more following the complete formation of their families.

The Ontario curriculum institute has had a broad programme of investigation in progress covering practically all subjects and levels of the school programme from kindergarten to graduate school. Its published reports on science and a second language, and the drafts of reports on study projects now in preparation, have far-reaching implications for our schools.

The new mathematics is a field that is receiving attention in all educational jurisdictions. We have already introduced courses characterized by this new approach in all secondary schools and some elementary school grades. The fundamental operations in mathematics are still there, of course, but the change in treatment is great. Many parents—and I was going to say, including the Minister—do not recognize the terms and concepts now used by their children. The emphasis is on the why as well as the how, and this approach pays dividends in developing an intelligent appreciation of what numbers can do. This is invaluable as the student attacks the more complex mathematical operations at an advanced level.

Turning to another educational concern, I would point out the need for a complete re-evaluation of the adequacy and effectiveness of our programmes of student aid. For the new world that lies ahead we have to consider carefully the full implications for parents and young people of an ever-increasing demand for ever-higher levels of education and training. It is obvious that not all the burden can in fairness be left to the family and the individual, and that much of the burden of the cost of the higher levels of education must be borne by society generally. Such an approach to student aid obviously requires a change in the thinking of most of us. I would remind you, however, that this government has, in some of its student aid programmes—for example, through the provision of graduate fellowships—accepted in part, at least, the principle that in order to meet critical needs it will provide sufficient funds to enable young people to secure the training and education needed without undue burdens on themselves or on their families. The student loan programmes, federal and provincial, must be subject to careful review and evaluation. Actually, I may say that the whole field of student aid is being critically reviewed now, for instance, by a commission set up by the universities, as well as through studies being made by our own officials.

In looking into the future, a number of problems of immediate importance present themselves. We may have to consider the whole matter of school attendance; more particularly the compulsory—this has been mentioned in the last few days—segment of it. At present we regard the ages of six to sixteen as the general span of compulsory attendance, but in other jurisdictions we find that compulsory attendance may start earlier and extend to older years, in some cases, as in California, to age 18. Perhaps we should be giving much more attention to the implications of what we used to think of as “pre-school” education, that is, education in nursery schools and in kindergartens. Training at this early level is of particular importance in the case of our young children who, through unfortunate circumstances, have suffered cultural deprivation and live in disadvantaged areas. Examples may readily be found in some Eskimo and Indian communities, and even in some of the downtown parts of our large urban centres. Earlier experience with school life might do much to prepare such children to profit more effectively from regular grade work, and to compensate for unfortunate environmental conditions over which neither they, nor we, have too much control.

The roles that may be played in our schools by the now traditional radio, films, and filmstrips, as well as—more recently—by closed-circuit and live television, programmed teaching machines, language laboratories and the new marvel of computer-assisted instruction, are all worthy of increased attention. All of these examples of modern communication have a contribution to make in our classrooms; a number of them have some disadvantages, offsetting in part some of their advantages. It is important that experimental work be done with the newer devices, and that their practicability and value be assessed.

A new division has been established in the department to lay plans for the development of educational television in our school system, and a staff is being assembled to deal with this activity under the general supervision of our curriculum division.

We are deeply indebted to the present broadcasters for their past work in the field of educational television. Despite the many commitments that they have to meet in their entire broadcasting schedule, they have shown a praiseworthy concern for, and interest in, the early development of programmes of this kind. In Toronto, specifically CBLT and CFTO-TV, both on their own initiative, and in co-operation with the Metropolitan Educational Television Association, have produced many educational programmes of merit.

Since the establishment of the Metropolitan Educational Television Association, which was accomplished with some help from the broadcasters and much work and co-operation from leading educators and educational institutions, as well as The Department of Education, it has become apparent that television as a means of communication and instruction has a very important place in the future of education. We have now reached the stage where the specific curriculum needs of all levels of education in the province must be met. It is impossible for the independent programming bodies to meet all these requirements because of the nature of their organizations.

This independent nature has, in the past, occasionally precluded the essential interrelationships that must exist between the programme producers and the responsible educational authorities. Consequently, some of the programmes have not always met with full approval. Those responsible for textbooks and other aids intimate with curriculum requirements should also be responsible for this most important visual medium.

The Ontario Department of Education intends therefore to apply to the board of broadcast governors for a licence to establish a television broadcasting station for the purpose of producing and transmitting programmes of an educational nature.

Provided that feasibility studies and other projects now under way continue as envisioned, the formal application will be made at a meeting of the board some time within the next twelve months.

If our application is approved and construction permits are granted within two months from the date of the hearing, we expect to begin transmission in Metropolitan Toronto and the surrounding area on the ultra high frequency channel 19 within one year of the date of approval. Service to educational institutions will begin soon after.

At the time the application for the channel 19 licence is made, the board of broadcast governors will be advised of the department's intention to seek further licences for broadcasting facilities at other locations throughout Ontario. Plans will be outlined regarding the setting up of a network of stations to serve exclusively educational needs and to provide resources for those needs at all levels and branches of education within our provincial system.

Until we are able to use our own production and transmission facilities, we are proposing to launch limited programming for schools in January, 1966. We hope to achieve this in co-operation with both CBLT and CFTO-TV, who have already shown their concern for the public interest by their past activities in this field. We propose to ask these and other television stations throughout the province for their co-operation in putting educational programmes on the air at suitable times arranged with them and the local boards of education.

The provincial educational television staff members concerned with programming policies, will be selected largely from the educational profession and branches of media, and those already involved in curriculum development in The Department of Education. Ultimate control of educational programme content will be in the hands of the assistant superintendent (television) of curriculum. This responsibility will always be held by a person who is attached to the curriculum division of the department, as will be the position of administrator of educational television.

This forward step in educational television is taken because our heritage of the past, our knowledge of the present and our needs for the future must be imparted by all means of communication that are available to our present-day society. To some of us, many of our present technological aids for living and learning are not easily accepted; but to the younger generation they are, to a large extent, part of normal, everyday living. To the younger age group television is an obvious, acceptable and respected means of communication for ideas, information and instruction.

A large, possibly the largest, advantage of educational television is that it can transfer an educational experience that cannot be, or is not now, within the capacity of the normal classroom situation.

In the development of mass media as a service to education, new trends in curriculum must be carefully considered. In fact the medium should convey these trends. It should communicate not only the new knowledge but also the new methods and the new techniques.

Programmes for teachers will help speed professional understanding; programmes for class or lecture room use will help speed academic learning; and programmes to inform parents of educational aims and subject disciplines will help speed the process of social understanding.

It will be possible for television to introduce the teaching of a course of study where, in the past, the department has possibly refrained from implementing such a course until an adequate supply of teachers could be trained. Certainly television can hasten some educational processes and help to establish right priorities.

Adult education and vocational training are areas of immediate concern because of the advances in technology of which television is, itself, a part. In co-operation with the provincial universities and the Canadian association for adult education, The Department of Education can increase its leadership in this field by providing the facilities for making courses and programmes available to a larger number of people. Many areas of adult education are, by necessity, today receiving only a limited service. Television can provide an economical way to offer a more immediate, extensive and effective series of programmes to the majority of the population.

Extremely important is the use to which television is put in the class or the lecture room. Teachers must be assisted in the use of educational television as an aid to teaching. All must be aware of how information is represented on the medium, and must understand the differences between the presentations of that information in a textbook, film, on radio and on television. Educators must also be aware of the power that mass media possesses in shaping the social attitudes of young people. The effective use of mass media in education depends to a great deal on teacher training and the effective use of ETV as a part of the normal teaching process.

To use this system of communication obviously needs an adequate and proficient means of reception for those who require it. Consequently proposals are being considered to allow grants to make it possible for school boards to purchase television receiving apparatus. This equipment will have to conform with the specifications issued by the department with regard to standards and safety features. In addition to this, members of the department will be contacting the boards and institutions of higher learning with a view to helping them design and build any other equipment, closed-circuit systems or such devices they may need to ensure uniform, high quality, television reception. The highest quality, in the long run, is the best investment.

Educational television will be only as good as the knowledge, skills, imagination and professional talent that constitutes its foundation. Many people at all levels of education in our privately owned stations and in the print media and in film have much to contribute to ETV. It will be a medium with its own philosophical approach, and will draw resources from many other media, but it will emerge with its own discipline and individuality.

Realizing that in the not distant future the computer is going to become an important factor in the educational process, a number of studies and experiments in the field of electronic data processing are under way. These are basically of two types. The first applies modern technology to the relief of teachers, vice-principals, and principals from such clerical duties as the keeping and posting of records and the drawing up of timetables. As I announced here earlier in the session, we have in progress at the present time a very interesting study of timetabling by computer which gives promise of being a great help to Ontario teachers and to those in other jurisdictions. Apart from relieving persons with more important duties from these routine or mechanical tasks, the assembly of accurate information speedily and in convenient form by electronic means is perhaps the chief accomplishment of data processing. Wise decisions must be based on adequate and up-to-date information. I have toured data-processing centres in Florida, California and Chicago, and have been interested in the installations used by educators in those jurisdictions, but there are interesting developments in Canada as well.

The Toronto board of education has a computer and North York has already done pioneer work in various aspects of educational data processing. The province of Quebec, at the departmental level, as well as in Montreal, has moved into this field. When the Ministers of Education across Canada met in Winnipeg last September, they set up a committee to consider the possibility of instituting a complete information system, using the most modern techniques. Officials of the education division of the Dominion bureau of statistics are represented on this committee which has already held two meetings, one of them last week in Quebec City.

The second type of educational activity related to data processing is concerned with the teaching of the skills and techniques of this new art to our young people. We have a number of programmes operating in the high schools now, on an experimental basis, and we have a provincial committee studying the appropriate curriculum and courses of study of this new field for a new age. It is expected that a range of courses will eventually be developed extending from simple introductory electronic data processing in the lower grades of high school to sophisticated post-graduate courses in our universities, designed for the most up-to-date computers.

It is imperative, Mr. Chairman, that we in Ontario keep abreast of the exciting developments of our age, and take steps to adapt our curriculum and our methods to the changes that are occurring. In touching upon this topic a year ago, I spoke of the use our department is already making of data processing in compiling our statistics, in marking objective tests, in dealing with the results of the grade 13 examination, in pretesting tentative grant plans and in the calculation of legislative grants under the Ontario foundation tax plan. I have no doubt that such uses will increase in number.

Despite my keen interest in these new developments, I would emphasize that all is not new in education. The experience of centuries in guiding the development of children and youth in body, mind, and character is not being discarded because a number of fascinatingly intricate machines have been invented. No machine has yet been devised to take the place of a well-informed, understanding, and skillful teacher. And the qualities of diligence, honesty and dependability will still be in demand as long as human beings work together. These are among the qualities that are best fostered in the life of the home, the church and the school. In our inquiry into the ways of tomorrow we must be on our guard against neglecting or discarding the valuable truths that mankind has learned through its long history and experience.

Several days ago I introduced legislation providing for the establishment of the Ontario institute for studies in education, and since at that time I gave the House a fairly comprehensive explanation of its function, I do not consider it necessary to expand upon it at this time. I do hope, however, that my friends opposite and, indeed, all hon. members will avail themselves of this opportunity to express their views on this new and important development.

I am quite certain that all of them will greet with satisfaction the appointment of Dr. R. W. B. Jackson as the first director of the institute. Dr. Jackson's contribution to education in our province can not be too highly praised and I am sure that his long and rich experience will be invaluable in the development and direction of this new dimension within our educational system.

Mr. Chairman, hon. members will recall that just about a year ago I began an extensive correspondence with our school principals on the question of the teaching of history in our Ontario schools. It arose out of widespread criticism in the press following some sampling of student knowledge of Canada's history.

I have since placed on the desks of all hon. members, a summary of that exchange prepared for me by an extremely able honour student at the University of Toronto. I may say that the author, H. V. Nelles, was recommended to me by the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Nixon) and I am sure that we all found his report, and in particular his own commentary, at once stimulating and instructive.

As you will have seen by the letter attached to the report, I have every intention of pursuing this matter, and in the next few months we expect to begin work on implementing some of the specific recommendations in the summary.

I may say that I was particularly impressed with the proposal that we develop the "history workshop" project on a province-wide scale as a means of assisting our teachers to better perform their task. I expect very shortly to begin discussions with Professor Careless and Professor Ricker and I am hopeful that as a result we can get this project moving before the end of the year.

There have already been some very interesting developments growing out of the correspondence with the principals. The 150th anniversary of Sir John A. Macdonald on January 11 was quite widely observed in our schools. There was no attempt by the department to have these observances conform to a single pattern, instead, it was left to each school to prepare its own programme, some were on a larger scale than others. All were at once imaginative and creative. As I intimated last year, it is our intention to encourage the observances of the anniversaries of other great Canadians such as Brown, Mowat and others which will occur during the next few years.

At the time of the 150th anniversary of Sir John A. Macdonald's birth, I announced, Mr. Chairman, that we would be sending out to the high schools across this province the two volumes of Sir John A's life to be presented to the students most deserving in the completing of their final year. These 500 volumes will be sent out to our school principals in the very near future.

I was particularly interested in a debate arranged by the principal and staff at Merriton high school—and I am sure that my hon. friends opposite will be even more interested.

The topics for the debate were as follows: 1. All Canadians should have voted for Sir Wilfrid Laurier during the 1911 elections; 2. Sir Wilfrid Laurier far overshadowed Sir John A. Macdonald as the foremost Prime Minister of Canada.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there was a time in Ontario when a Minister of Education, in a Conservative administration, might have felt that such topics were a bit "too political" for a school debate. Frankly, I do not share that point of view. I see no reason whatever why, in our upper grades at least, the classroom should not be a place for argument or discussion as well as for instruction. I must, however, express some reservations on the phrasing of the resolution, which strikes me as being rather subjective in its approach to history.

I may say that while I have not yet heard who won the debate in question, I do congratulate those who arranged it and I hope that both the affirmative and the negative gave good account of themselves. I hope too that the participants gained a better appreciation of the roles of Macdonald and Laurier. For after all, these two great statesmen can no longer be regarded as the sole possession of their respective parties. They belong to Canada as a whole—the Canada they helped to develop during many years of distinguished and unselfish public service.

I am sure that all hon. members will agree with me that the problem of teaching history in a living way is a many-sided one. It involves our textbooks, curriculum and teacher training. Indeed, I think it is pretty well summed up in the concluding paragraph of the Nelles report:

When it comes to the presentation of our heritage, the mass media can help, the textbooks can help, the curriculum can be improved to meet current inadequacies. But the crucial factor is still the human being—the teacher.

Hon. members will be interested to learn that Mr. Nelles' report has been read by the Ministers of Education of all other provinces and that several have proposed that this matter be dealt with at our interprovincial conference.

Mr. Chairman, it has often been said that our neighbours to the south are much more knowledgeable and appreciative of their history than are Canadians.

I was, therefore, rather surprised to find not long ago that this is "not necessarily so." I have reference to an article which appeared in the Christian Science Monitor of February 18, 1965 which deals with a report on "The Teaching of American History in High Schools" by three professors at Indiana University. The report evaluated material gathered over several years of questioning, interviewing and observing 1,300 of the Indiana public high school teachers.

Year after year, the authors explain, freshmen were arriving at the university knowing all too little of American history. It sounds very much like home. They wanted to know why, and after three years of research they concluded that part of the problem is ill-prepared teachers, part is ill-prepared students and other parts include course content, teaching methods and library facilities.

The three professors point out that most of the problems of high school history teaching are not peculiar to the state of Indiana but are nationwide.

From questionnaire returns it was learned that 45 per cent of Indiana's history teachers held BA degrees in education rather than in history; that 55 per cent majored primarily in social studies which means that those teachers had only 21 hours of American history.

The authors of the report were also appalled to discover that 80 per cent of American history teachers had read no books in their field within the past school year and equally appalling was the fact that 10 per cent of those who had read a history book, only read one or two on the Civil War, ignoring other periods in American history.

To excuse this lack of reading the teachers in most cases claimed, "no time." To combat this problem, the authors of this report suggest a minimum reading period of 15 minutes a day each night and more the other 185 days of the year on which they are actually teaching.

To inject vitality and intellectual integrity into teachers and classrooms, the authors of the report suggested an 11 months school contract which stipulates that a teacher spend two months in residence each year on a university campus—studying history, not education.

The authors also found that too many teachers study for their MA degrees in a field other than history. Either they have not taken the prerequisite undergraduate courses, or their undergraduate grades were not high enough to get them into a history programme.

Available reading material also required to be improved, the authors contend, and they suggested supplementing the text by purchasing good paperbacks for students and obtaining multiple copies of outside reading texts.

These findings have some relevance for our own situation and will be taken into account as we develop corrective measures to meet the problem.

There is one project which developed out of last year's correspondence with our principals, about which I should like to say just a few words. I refer to the Canada Day programme inaugurated this year by the schools of the city of St. Catharines. It is a most imaginative project and strikes me as being an excellent way to present the Canadian heritage in our schools. I have recommended to our principals that it be closely studied for adoption on a province-wide scale. I have already sent a copy of the brochure describing the project to the hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Thompson) and to the hon. member for York South and I hope that they may want to say something about it in the course of their remarks.

The hopeful thing about all of these developments is that they are encouraging manifestations of a growing interest in Canada's history—or perhaps I should say, a re-examination of our history—which must be viewed as part of the creative drive of Canadians to build a community of our own.

I believe it was Socrates, Mr. Chairman, who said "the unexamined life is not worth living," and so in this context we might add "the unexamined history is not worth having." In my view, it has become more important than ever for our schools to stimulate an interest in Canadian history—in the great decisions of a century ago that placed our country on the road to nationhood, charted the course of our national development and laid down as the basis of our unity, a true understanding and mutual respect between the founding peoples.

In recent years that relationship has become the subject of a great debate in our country. Very frequently voices are raised expressing grave doubt as to whether such a basis of unity can long be maintained. Mr. Chairman, at such times as this we would do well to remind ourselves that these doubts have arisen many times during the first century of our nationhood.

Some months ago one of our principals sent me a copy of a volume of essays by Professor Frank Underhill and underlined a passage which I am sure will be of interest to every hon. member of this House. It is from a letter written by Sir Wilfrid Laurier to Edward Blake, a former Prime Minister of this province, in December, 1891. Sir Wilfrid wrote:

We have come to a period in the history of this country when premature dissolution seems to be at hand. What will be the outcome? How long can the fabric last? Can it last at all? All these are questions which surge in my mind and to which dismal answers suggest themselves.

Mr. Chairman, those words perhaps have a familiar sound. They were written 74 years ago, and it is worth noting that only a few years later this country of ours, instead of falling apart as Sir Wilfrid had feared, entered upon a great new stage of national development. While I do not for a moment minimize the differences of opinion in our country, I certainly do not think we have come to the end of the road. Instead I think we are moving toward a new beginning.

For myself, I do not view the present dialogue between English and French Canada as cause for despair but rather for hope. Great changes are taking place in our country and perhaps they have not yet run their course. But out of them I am confident will emerge a stronger Confederation. I am greatly strengthened in that conviction by these closing paragraphs from the recent interim report of the Royal commission on bilingualism and biculturalism which I am sure will find acceptance by all parties in this House. The commissioners say:

Each age is fascinated by the difficulties it must face; hence most generations go through periods of doubt—present-day Canada is no exception—but is it more difficult to maintain the entity of Canada today, to make necessary changes, than it was to create it yesterday?

Canada will continue to exist, to grow and progress, will surmount the present crisis, if Canadians have the will—a will like that of the men that built the country.

The will we speak of cannot be stiff and arbitrary, it must take account of new conditions. Like everything that is living it must constantly adapt to changing conditions, above all it must be based on awareness and understanding.

Mr. Chairman, I am convinced that our educational system, our schools and in particular our teachers, have a great responsibility and a great opportunity to play an ever more creative role in the development among young Canadians of those attitudes of mutual understanding and appreciation of each other which will give new strength and purpose to our country. Our concern here is not with teaching history with a view to developing a narrow, exclusive nationalism in our schools. Indeed, I think it can be said that an adequate examination of Canada's history will make our students more fully aware of Canada's debt, not only to the founding partners but also to the people of many lands who have helped Canada's development with their toil and enriched her life and culture with their traditions and their creative skills and talents.

When Premier Lesage addressed his Legislature a year or so ago, he spoke of what he called a new relationship between the provinces—a horizontal relationship in which we recognize the need to come together to discuss our common problem and mutual interests.

In line with that thought, I am sure the hon. members of this House will be pleased to learn that I have extended an invitation to the Quebec Minister of Education, Paul Gerin-Lajoie, and his senior officials to spend several days with us at an early date so that we can have a full exchange of views on the important new developments in education in our two provinces. Frankly, I would like to see this kind of relationship extended into other areas. Here I am thinking of such things as a teacher and student exchange which I feel should be developed on a much more extensive scale.

I would hope, too, that we could work out an arrangement whereby several thousand young people from Ontario and Quebec would cross over the borders of our respective provinces, spending a week or two in each others' homes and communities and thus come to know each other better, strengthen our fraternity, and help to meet that desire of all Canadians to feel at home in any part of Canada. It seems to me that the more we can come together to discuss our common problems and the more we do to enrich our fraternity, the more progress we shall make in strengthening our national purpose.

Mr. Chairman, during the past year several hon. members of the Legislature, among them the hon. member for Scarborough West (Mr. S. Lewis), have drawn my attention to certain passages in school textbooks which were clearly out of line with the spirit of the Ontario human rights code. I will not take the time now to go into the matter in any detail. I do want, however, to inform the hon. member for Scarborough West and others who have raised this question with me, that in co-operation with the Ontario human rights commission and its director, Dr. Daniel Hill, we are about to make a thorough examination of all our school textbooks, not just for the purpose of removing material which may be offensive to any of the groups which make up our multi-national family, but more important, to make sure that our textbooks do contain the type of material which does full justice to the contribution of many peoples to the development of our province and nation. I know from recent correspondence with our textbook publishers institute that they too are willing and, indeed, anxious to co-operate with us in this matter.

As hon. members are no doubt aware, I have, during the past year or so, received representations from a number of organizations, among them the Ontario federation of home and school associations, on the subject of religious instruction in our public schools. In addition, I have received a rather large volume of letters from individuals on the same subject.

It is quite clear to me, Mr. Chairman, that there is a sharp difference of opinion as to the wisdom of continuing the existing system. This, of course, is not a recent development. A rereading of Hansard of 1945 will show that these differences existed at the time the present system was adopted. The vote in this House at that time showed the then CCF Party to be seriously divided, while the Liberal Party was, I believe, unanimous in its opposition to the measure. I am sure that since the question has been reopened, the hon. member for Brant has read with more than ordinary interest the thoughtful speech delivered by his distinguished father on that occasion.

As my hon. friend said here the other day, religion is a very personal thing—to use his words “a deeply personal experience.” In the formative years of our community there were very strong views that it should not form any part of our public school system. George Brown and others, all of them deeply religious men, shared the view of Thomas Jefferson that it was not in the interest of religion for public schools “to direct its exercises, its discipline or its doctrines.” I am sure that we here are all agreed that nothing could be more divisive, nor more destructive of our community life, than the eruption of religious controversy in the public schools of our province.

There is, of course, little to be gained by applying hindsight to the decisions taken here on this matter by our predecessors 20 years ago. They were taken in good faith at a time when the values we hold dear still hung in the balance, and I, for one, certainly do not question the motives of those who took them. No one will deny that the action won wide public acceptance. To my recollection, at least, the present system has not been seriously challenged during my membership in the assembly, nor during the period that I have been Minister of Education.

We, however, must deal with the problem as it stands before us today, and as I said earlier, the matter has been raised with me by a number of important organizations and by many individual citizens. Furthermore, a certain amount of public debate is taking place on the question outside the House in which church and community leaders, the press and other mass media are participating. Serious doubts are being raised in the minds of our people as to whether the present system of religious instruction should be continued.

Without attempting now to assess the present ratio of opinion, pro and con, I will say that there is a very strong sentiment in favour of making a careful study of this question on the basis of the past 20 years' experience, in order to determine what changes may be desirable. It is my own impression, however, that the majority of our people would consider it a retrograde step to eliminate entirely from the classroom all subject matter which has to do with character building, ethics, social attitudes, and moral values—

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): Nobody suggested that!

Hon. Mr. Davis: —and I would think that that would be the consensus of this House, Mr. Chairman. I am, therefore, going to appoint a special committee of distinguished citizens to go very carefully into the matter in an effort to reconcile existing differences and to provide us, if possible, with a more satisfactory method of conserving in our classrooms those well-tested moral principles which, although not always practised, have, nevertheless, remained—and will, I believe, continue to be—the heart and centre of our society.

I am pleased now to be able to announce that our highly esteemed former Lieutenant-Governor, the Hon. J. Keiller Mackay, has agreed to act as chairman of the committee. I expect to be able to announce the names of the other members very shortly. I sincerely hope that hon. members will agree that such an objective study, in which differing views may be put forward, is a more desirable method of dealing with a very delicate question than hasty administrative action which might be more divisive than helpful.

Mr. Singer: Good for you, and good for the hon. member for Brant.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, it has been said that the history of education is really the history of the advance of civilization itself, from the very earliest struggle for survival to the many-sided cultural and social advances of the human mind and spirit. I am confident there will be no disagreement in this House with my earlier statement that our progress as a nation is wholly dependent upon the rate of our progress in education. The question then arises: How are we to proceed faster, and must we not be on guard against the danger that what is deemed to be progress may turn out to be retrogression in disguise? To repeat the phrase of Professor Careless, “everything is happening at once.”

In this connection I was interested to find the same concern expressed in a book that was brought to my attention a short time ago, entitled The Story of Education, from which I quote a few sentences which I consider to be pertinent to this discussion:

A primary principle in education, or any other field, is that goals should determine actions. But this is not as simple as it sounds because of the many conflicting forces crying for attention and priority.

For example, a decision must be reached as to whether the schools should relegate social objectives into the background and concentrate on academic achievements. In other words, is the acquisition of facts and skills more important than the development of attitudes and values? If both goals are important, how can the school accomplish one without cutting down on the time and effort devoted to the other? Similarly, how can the sciences be stressed without neglecting the arts?

However, even when goals are agreed upon, there seldom is unanimity as to the methods to achieve them. Two schools may agree that children must be taught how to read as early and as efficiently as possible. But one school may stress phonetics and begin the training in kindergarten, while the other uses a contextual approach and delays the instructions until the child has reached the mental age of six or above. Although it often happens that several avenues to the same objective are equally good, still the problem points out the need for research and further experimentation.

From kindergarten up through graduate school a concerted effort is required to build in our children a social and civic awareness that transcends nationalistic boundaries. Leaders of the future will have to be well-informed and well-balanced individuals who are trained to see the world as a place where destinies are interlocked.

How can this be done? Immediately, one thinks of geography, history and civics as the key subjects along with a foundation in reading. But the need extends into every area of the curriculum including the guidance programme. It involves a deep plunge into the human relations, ethics and morality—all of which have been neglected to some extent in a "things-centred" and "science-minded" society. Concepts of service, sacrifice and sensitivity to others must be given utmost importance. The adult of the next generation must be inculcated with the idea that he is indeed his brother's keeper and that rugged individualism, whether on a personal or national basis, cannot lead to anything but the destruction of democracy—just as it did in ancient Athens.

Nor can the schools afford to waste time in this effort; lost moments today may be paid for bitterly tomorrow. Although it may seem melodramatic to state the case so urgently, the facts cannot be controverted. An anxious world looks for leadership and the discovery of peaceful solutions to problems that are literally and figuratively explosive. The future of this leadership lies largely in the classroom and the success or failure of the schools will forever affect the destiny of mankind.

That is the end of the quotation, Mr. Chairman.

These are but a few of the questions and the problems which crowd in upon those who are charged with the responsibility of our educational system. Some of them will be considered by Mr. Justice Hall's committee and I am sure they will not be overlooked by those who will follow me in this debate. We are all very deeply involved in these matters, as legislators, as parents and as citizens who are concerned about the future of our own country and the world of which we are a part.

Mr. Chairman, I should like once more to pay tribute to all those individuals and organizations that have exerted themselves in the interests of our educational system during the past year. In particular, I would mention the boards of school trustees; the Ontario school trustees' council; the classroom teachers and their Ontario teachers' federation; the Ontario educational association; L'association canadienne-française d'éducation d'Ontario; the Ontario federation of home and school associations; the parent-teachers' association; the Ontario association for retarded children; the municipal councils that have assisted in the collection of taxes required by local school authorities; the press, radio and television and the many individuals and groups that have submitted briefs, resolutions, and suggestions in the interests of education in this province, and in this group I certainly include the many hon. members of this House who have so thoughtfully drawn my attention to situations requiring departmental action and who have interpreted rulings and have cleared up misunderstandings concerning educational problems with their constituents.

May I also take this opportunity to express again my appreciation for the loyal support

I have received from my colleagues who share with me the heavy responsibilities of this department. No Minister could ask for more in the way of co-operation, of dedicated effort and wise counsel. To all of them I can only say, I am profoundly grateful.

In conclusion may I repeat again what I said in this House a year ago when I expressed the hope that our discussion would not be limited to a dialogue between the Minister of Education and the chief critics in the Opposition parties. There are many other hon. members on the government and Opposition sides who are knowledgeable and experienced in these matters and who should, and will, I am sure, make their full contribution to this debate.

Since I have been Minister of Education I have, of course, come to look forward to the contributions of the hon. member for Brant and the hon. member for York South. I fully recognize that it is their responsibility and their duty to criticize. I recognize, too, that the critic—even the destructive critic—is often the agent of progress. I want to assure my hon. friends now, as I have done on other occasions, that I respect their opinions, even when I may disagree with them, and that I do not for a moment doubt that we share a common desire to make Ontario's educational system one of which we can all be justly proud. In that sense, at least, Mr. Chairman, we are not adversaries but collaborators.

It is my hope, Mr. Chairman, that my hon. friends opposite who have listened so patiently to what I have had to say this afternoon have also found me, and will always find me, to be a good listener. As I said to the student body at the Sir John A. Macdonald institute some weeks ago, whenever you find a Minister of Education who has stopped learning, you may be certain that he has also stopped living and should be put out to pasture—and I need hardly add that for the present moment, at least, that kind of life has no allure for me.

And so for the next few days, or for whatever period this debate may require, I am ready to receive your thoughtful instruction and wise counsel. And here may I commend to you the words of the late Mr. James Thurber, who once observed that: "The wise man is not necessarily the one who knows all the right answers, but rather the one who asks the right questions."

Mr. Chairman, I have no doubt that my hon. friends opposite have come well armed with questions and criticisms. I fully anticipate that they will be sometimes blunt, sometimes sharp, and will always aim to be constructive. I trust that out of our exchange of views will come a better understanding of the work of my department and fuller answers to our common problems.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. R. F. Nixon (Brant): May I begin by extending my hearty congratulations to the hon. Minister on the excellent survey of the work of his department that he has presented to the House this afternoon. I hope it is not unfair for me to point out to him, however, that the beginning of his remarks were a signal for the exodus of many of his hon. colleagues on the Treasury benches and a large majority of his supporters in this House. Now I would say to you, sir, that there were more in the Opposition here than in the government benches—

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. J. H. White: That is not so.

Mr. Nixon: That is not the main point, the point is this, that the hon. Minister's excellent report introduced his estimates which asked us in this House to vote him $500 million for the continuance of the work of his department, the department that I would put to you, sir, is by far, the most important department of government. There is no doubt that the information that he has given to us, debatable as some of it may be, should be a part of the knowledge of every hon. member of the House, and I would hope that he would join with me in asking all hon. members to take this information as well as some of the comments that will come from other hon. members of the House back to the constituencies where the people are so interested in this responsibility of government.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to begin my remarks this afternoon by saying something about free universal education. This is something that we are fortunate to have in this province to an extent that we will provide 13 grades of study to the people who live in Ontario. This is not reserved in any way to a free country. We know that many totalitarian states now, and in the past, have been able to evolve systems which were at least as efficient as ours in getting across facts and information to young people. The difference, however, I would submit, is that their aim was to produce obedient and efficient servants of the state and ours is considerably beyond this.

In recent reading about Egerton Ryerson, whose name is mentioned frequently in this House, I was interested to learn that he copied the basic education system for this province from a Prussian model. In Prussia, for the last 140 years, free—and I suppose, universal—education has been the system. We, in the years since Ryerson's day have developed a democratic ideal of education that we are still seeking to achieve. We look forward to unlimited access to the best for our young people. All students must be provided with equal opportunity to know and appreciate the best that has gone before and to establish a respect for knowledge.

Beyond this, we hope to establish an inquiring mind in every one of the young people who benefits from the system that we provide. Our system must educate for adaptability, rather than for specific skill.

As time goes on, the problem becomes more difficult. Many years ago—and I suppose in the time of many of us as members of this House—there were responsibilities around the home and around the school that required real effort to meet an authentic challenge. It gave a sense of genuine achievement and self-respect for young people of school age to have a part to play, let us say, in the work of a farm or the work of a business.

Now I would submit to you, Mr. Chairman, that this has changed in the last few years quite dramatically. Even in the good old rural environment there are now many homes where the young people do not have the opportunity to accept these responsibilities that have often been classed as so valuable in the building of character. It is up to the schools, more and more, to adequately challenge our young people; to provide them with the ideals that are going to enable them to take a part in modern society.

It has been said that "ignorance of what is good is as large a drawback to success as incapacity to achieve it," and so idealism is still something that must be at the top of our requirements as we design our educational system and adapt its curriculum to changing times.

Our present system has the earmarks that all of us are very proud of. We are spending more and more money on it. The "plant" itself—if I may use that word—is becoming more and more modern; in fact, beautiful. The buildings in which our children receive their education are architectural additions to the community and we are proud of the fact that our young people stay longer and longer in school. There is a nagging doubt, however, in the minds of many people that we are suffering from what has been called "educational inflation." We are spending more and more money on education; we are having our young people spend more and more time exposed to the system—nevertheless, there is the realization that our graduates, even from our top matriculation level, are really not ready for the experience of universities. It has been said by many at the university level that the first year is spent in adapting these young people for a different type of educational experience. Much of the course material is a repeat of what is offered at the grade 13 level. There is a sociological adaptation here—a very expensive one, both in terms of the money spent and of the number of our young people who do not accomplish this adaptation.

While I am talking about accomplishment at this level—I was going to say at the public and secondary level—I would say that not only are many of these young people not prepared for university education but, if they have taken one of the other streams in our system, they may not be adequately prepared for any employment. I have some statistics that I will give to the House in a few moments that would indicate that the largest group of the unemployed are among the young, and those who have had the most recent experience with the system of public education that we in this House have as our responsibility to provide. If we are failing anywhere, it might also be said that we are not providing the young people who leave our school system with an adequate basis of idealism and enthusiasm that will permit them to take their rightful place in the community, at least the place that we expect them to take. We have read recently of the unfortunate event at Centre Island, wherein a group of young people—for no apparent reason—set upon and attacked another group of young people who had gone there on an outing. This cannot be explained, really, if the advantages of an education were of any value to them at all. We read with something akin to horror the events that took place in a Toronto park just a few days ago, when a group of citizens—seized with a feeling that might be justified against another group that were going to be found in that park—surged back and forth in this public property, looking for someone to beat and stone and vilify.

There is certainly much to be said on the line of criticism of the inculcation of idealism among our young people and our citizenry at large. For years, people in Legislatures and people on every street corner have been saying our young people are not as good as they used to be, and so on. I know the hon. Minister would not agree with this and neither would I. We have all had an opportunity to talk to these people and we know what they think about and the way they react to situations.

Nevertheless, it may be said that we have failed the young people if they leave school without once meeting a gifted and inspiring teacher, without learning the value of books and without once glimpsing the possibilities of man's development and their own possibilities through self-education.

It is in this connection that I would like to spend a few moments in discussing with the House and with you, Mr. Chairman, my own views as to what might be done to upgrade this general level of education.

It is apparent from the statistics that are available from the hon. Minister's report, and further from the Dominion bureau of statistics, that there are still large numbers of our young people who leave school before they are adequately prepared for the future. Sixty thousand young people left our system in 1964, 10 per cent of them without any job to go to at all, and they are listed in the statistics as unemployed. Another 10 per cent accepted jobs that must surely have only a short duration. They are generally listed as clerical, and among those that would be most readily replaced in the progress of automation.

Of these 60,000, 11,000 were 16 years of age or under, and I was interested to read in the report of the select committee on youth that 9,000 were 15 or under. In other words, 9,000 people left school at the age of 15 or under, even though our laws require that they stay on in the educational system. Here then is the obvious group that we are failing. They are sometimes called unreached youth, or unreachable youth. I do not feel that any individuals in our society should be classified as unreachable, and it is these people, and those who have reacted to situations in the community in a way that would indicate their lack of preparation for community life, about whom we must be concerned.

The hon. Minister was kind enough in his remarks to mention a young man who did some work for his department, Mr. Nelles, who has just completed a programme of graduate studies at the University of Toronto. In the section of Mr. Nelles' report that the hon. Minister quoted, he drew the attention of those reading the report, to the importance of the teacher in the classroom as the answer to most of these difficulties, and it is along these lines that I would like to proceed.

We can have the finest schools; the very best facilities but the good teacher is our most valuable educational asset. A few weeks ago, our educational committee journeyed to London, and on a very heavy schedule we had the opportunity to visit the vocational centre there. I should say in passing that I was quite interested in the plaque in the main hall there, bearing the names of the hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Robarts), the hon. Minister, several local members, I believe, and down at the bottom in small type, the name of the Minister of Labour for Canada. I suppose it should be brought to the attention of all of us, once again, the large part that has been played by the federal jurisdiction in the support of these new facilities that have been built in the province of Ontario.

Mr. Singer: Who paid for the plaque?

Mr. Nixon: It may be that The Department of Education provided the plaque.

Hon. Mr. Davis: I think it was Public Works, actually.

Mr. Nixon: I see. I was interested in touring the institution there. In connection with my remarks about the importance of the teacher, we went into one large, well-equipped electronics laboratory where a group of students—I suppose there were 18 or 20, all having achieved grade 12 standing in the regular course of their education—were being instructed by a young man with an engineering degree. Seeing him in action, and seeing the way the young people responded to his teaching, was an example of excellence that is difficult to achieve through instructional methods, or by any method that I know of, except through the dedication of the individual as a teacher.

This man was obviously well prepared for his responsibilities, but more than that, he was accepting the responsibility in the best possible way, had an excellent rapport with his students, and was leading them at a rapid pace in the responsibilities of gaining knowledge, in this case, in the electronics area. So I want to say something about teachers in general and what the hon. Minister of Education, with his staff and his budget, might do to improve their competence.

To begin with, to point out the ideal in this area, every student of the province should be taught by a devoted and knowledgeable teacher, giving careful personal attention to a manageable group. Let us look at the background of the teachers who are at present working in the province of Ontario. In searching the tables of the hon.

Minister's report, and there are 96 of them, I felt that the academic qualifications of the teaching staff of the province was not adequately put before us. There is some material there, particularly on the development of university degrees among the teachers at the elementary level. But there is nothing to indicate what the distribution of adequately prepared teachers would be, whether they are all found in the cities or in the country, and whether an adequate proportion is found in separate schools and in public schools.

I was also interested in reading the statistics having to do with secondary school teachers and it appears that the number of specialists available in the secondary system is dwindling for reasons that I suppose are quite obvious—that there are so many opportunities for these people with honour degrees to go into other fields of endeavour, and that the teaching profession is losing out in this competition. The statistics would show that of all the teachers in training a year ago, and I understand there were about 4,000 of them, only 191 of them were going for a type A certificate, that is, entering the profession at the type A level, leading to a specialist's certificate. This is a tragedy of great proportions.

The hon. Minister has announced a programme that would attempt to attract more people of high academic qualifications into the teaching profession, but I would say to him, Mr. Chairman, that unless he is successful in this, we are heading for mediocrity in our school system at the secondary level and much more must be done to ensure that people of this high academic background are going to enter the profession.

Certainly, as our curriculum becomes more advanced, more involved, and I would submit, more difficult for a teacher to handle, we are going to need more and more of them with this higher academic qualification. I am afraid that the present trend is for young people interested in teaching to take the minimum pass BA course, with the easiest possible combination of subjects, and to be hired by a board of education to teach in the fall following their graduation. They enter the classroom, then, with minimum academic qualifications—a summer short-course which will put them in the classroom, I will submit, unqualified to take part in modern teaching as we would hope it would take place.

About teacher training specifically: We have had an opportunity at least to glimpse the new facilities being built in London at the college of education under construction there. I might just say in passing that it is a beautiful building and an outstanding addition to the University of Western Ontario campus. In looking at the campus in general, I was struck with the traditional architecture that had been followed in all the buildings there. No doubt this has been definite policy but it seemed to be 1928 university architecture—very expensive and beautiful, but rather confining when one sees what modern architects can achieve when they are given some more professional liberty. Nevertheless, the new college of education there is an outstanding building.

But the standard course, the winter course that is used to train our teachers, is falling more and more into disuse. If I am reading the statistics correctly, 566 people availed themselves of the opportunity to ready themselves for the teaching profession through the regular standard course. We must realize that this cannot be called an outdated course any longer, because the results of a large and I suppose reasonably adequate committee report have been available to the hon. Minister now for two years and we must assume that what goes on at the colleges of education is by his view as modern as it can be.

Nevertheless, more students realize or come to the conclusion that they do not want to avail themselves of this type of teacher training and actually many hundreds go through the short courses—I believe in the first-year short course, 1,952 people; in the second summer course, 1,566. It appears then only one out of six takes the standard full-year preparation for teaching. And of this, as I said, less than 200 are in the specialist category.

Once the teachers have had their training they enter classrooms which, according to the Dominion bureau of statistics education survey, are still very crowded. As a matter of fact, it appears that Ontario has the highest average number of students in the classrooms of any of the provinces of Canada. This report is the most recent available and it was a survey of 1961 and 1962 conditions. It found that, of 38,000 elementary classrooms in Ontario, 11,000 had 35 students or more in them and 2,700 had 40 or more. In the secondary schools, there were 12,800 classrooms and 5,000 classrooms had over 35 students and 3,000 had over 40 students.

When I was talking about the ideal teaching situation, it was made clear that the teacher had to deal with manageable groups of students. I suppose a very competent teacher could manage 40 or more students at one time, but only with the merest makeshift of the real learning experience. Some individual contact is required and I submit that our aim, an attainable aim, should be not more than 20 students in the classrooms that our teachers would work with. This, of course, is something that has to be dealt with with some flexibility. There are many experiments going on across the province. In the secondary system at Brantford, there is one of the most useful programmes—involving team-teaching procedures whereby, in the introduction to a broad topic, perhaps 100 students are brought into one area. One teacher, with two or three assistants, would speak with this large group. Then they leave the circumstance that I have described and go into much smaller groups, less than 20 in the group I would presume, so that some individual attention would be possible.

But I would say that, if the hon. Minister feels that our teachers are adequately prepared for the responsibility, they are too often put into a classroom where the number of students is unmanageable. This is carried to the extent that I suppose the number of teachers who leave the profession because they find they cannot manage the group is very high indeed, and something that must be causing the hon. Minister some concern.

Now I suppose the ideal situation would be one teacher for one student. We get closest to this at the most expensive level, at the university level, where the professors with a great deal of expensive background and expense training do have an opportunity to deal with small groups of students, particularly at the senior levels. We know that some of the new universities are making a particular point of this. York University tried to do it for a while, and is gradually falling away from this ideal. The president of Trent University says that they are not going to fall away from it, and this is what is going to make their university at Peterborough different from the others.

Well, I submit that one of the reasons why students have such great difficulty when they go to university from our high school system is they do not know how to react in these small group teaching situations. I was interested to read a few days ago that one of the reasons why they had to abandon some of the tutorial work at York was that the students did not know how to respond in these small group situations. As a matter of fact, the opportunity seemed to be wasted on them. And I think one of the most useful things the hon. Minister could do would be to provide the finances to cut down the size of the classes at the secondary level. This is something that would make the teaching much more meaningful in the classroom.

We are talking about the provision of good teachers; their academic qualifications; their training, under our present system; and what they must face in the classroom. Surely it would not be proper to leave this situation without referring to teachers' salaries. During my experience in this House I have heard some members—I do not believe they are members of the House now, since 1963—make some very definite pronouncements about their own views as to what teachers' salaries should be. Even in those days, they thought that teachers were grossly overpaid.

I would like to point out to the hon. members that the statistics would indicate that Ontario by no means leads the field in paying adequately trained teachers. In these statistics that are available from 1963 and 1964, we find that the median salary in Ontario for all the teachers was $4,922. In Alberta, it was $5,135; and in British Columbia, $5,640.

When we examine the comparison of teachers' salaries in rural schools, we find that the median salary in Saskatchewan—and I can use this word since the hon. Prime Minister is not in the House; I know how it infuriates him—is $4,133 and in Ontario, $3,882. It may be that, if we are going to attract to the teaching profession those with the academic background that we simply must have, it is going to take more than a $500 bursary at the post-graduate level. It is going to take the realization that the teachers are most important public servants and that they are going to have to be paid commensurate with their qualifications and their responsibility.

The hon. Minister now has a committee dealing with the training of teachers at the primary level. The report of his committee dealing with the training at the secondary level has already been before the House for some time and the hon. Minister has acted upon it.

But I feel, that from these recommendations, we should realize that teacher training must be a challenging post-graduate experience. Whether it is post-university graduation or post-secondary school graduation, it must not be an indoctrination to a world of over-control and narrowness. We must attract to the profession those who are interested in a position where their initiative is valued and where their contribution to the community is valued as well.

I submit that our teacher training courses must be more challenging. I suppose by that I mean they must be harder, more difficult; because hard work is going to attract the people we want and repel the ones that we do not want.

Just in closing my remarks about the training of teachers, I would like to say that in a good many of the teaching situations in this province, particularly at the secondary level, the teacher who has to deal with too many students in the classroom—with rates of pay that do not compare with other jurisdictions and are below other jurisdictions, and in a situation where there is over-control and over-regimentation and a lack of opportunity for the initiative of the individual—normally has to prepare 36 lessons in a week. There are other jurisdictions where it has become apparent that some time available for reading, for adequate preparation, for adequate dealing with the tests, laboratory work and so on has been made available. I would hope that our ideal situation would reduce the teaching load of the teachers in this province to something considerably less than it is.

We must remember that the plans put before The Department of Education now call for an upgrading of the grade 13 year into what has been called the matriculation year, a transition to the university experience. If this is so, the teachers at that level must have the opportunity to teach as university teachers do. I would suggest that one class at that level would be equated with two at a lower level and their teaching load would be based on that view.

So we must realize that freedom with responsibility is going to produce the first-rate teacher that we all look for.

Mr. Chairman, I realize that you wish to go to another order of business.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree moves that the committee rise and report progress and ask for leave to sit again.

Motion agreed to.

The House resumed; Mr. Speaker in the chair.

Mr. Chairman: Mr. Speaker, the committee of supply begs to report progress and asks for leave to sit again.

Report agreed to.

Clerk of the House: The 14th order, second reading, Bill No. 9, An Act to amend The Ontario human rights code, 1961-1962, Mr. Davison.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might seek approval of the House for another hon. member to introduce this bill. The hon. member for Hamilton East (Mr. Davison) is ill today. Also, while I am on my feet, I would point out that the hon. member for Wentworth East (Mr. Gisborn) had another prior commitment for this hour. We have other hon. members who are in a position to introduce them into the House if there is no objection.

Mr. Speaker: Does the member have the unanimous consent of the House?

THE ONTARIO HUMAN RIGHTS CODE, 1961-1962

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine), in the absence of the hon. member for Hamilton East, moves second reading of Bill No. 9, An Act to amend the Ontario human rights code.

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): Mr. Speaker, first of all I would like to express my regret that my hon. colleague from Hamilton East is unable to be here today to move the bill himself. He has been waiting a long time for the opportunity to speak on second reading of this bill and I know that he is very much disappointed that he is not able to do so.

I should also like to express the appreciation of this group to the House as a whole for its courtesy permitting another member move the second reading of this bill and also the other bill referred to.

Mr. Speaker, this bill proposes what in terms of mechanics is quite a simple amendment to the Ontario human rights code. Essentially it proposes that the word "age" should be inserted in appropriate places in that code. In spite of the simplicity of the mechanics of the bill, I think it is one of the most important bills that has come before this House this session, notwithstanding the fact that it is being sponsored by a private member. As hon. members know, the Ontario human rights code at the present time, among other things, makes illegal discrimination in employment or discrimination in relation to trade union membership on account of race, creed, colour, nationality, ancestry and place of origin. The code also provides administrative machinery which, I think, all of us will agree, has proved eminently satisfactory in the field to which it applies, to make those prohibitions as effective as is humanly possible.

Our proposal is simply this, that "age" should be added to the list of conditions in regard to which discrimination will be outlawed in the public policy of this province. If our amendment is adopted, it will be illegal to discriminate in employment on account of age just as it now is on account of race, creed, and so on, and will be illegal for a trade union to discriminate against any person with respect to membership on account of age.

I should also call to the attention of hon. members that there is in the bill a saving clause which would make the provision of the bill inapplicable in certain specified cases where it clearly should not be applied: specifically, in a case where the nature of employment requires a young person with physical stamina and substantial physical strength and where an older person clearly could not do the job. It also would exempt a situation where a person was retired under a recognized retirement scheme upon reaching retirement age. It would not apply in those situations but it would apply otherwise.

The effect would be quite straightforward, Mr. Speaker, if we adopted the amendment. If a person applied for a job and was told that he was too old—as all too many are now because they have reached the age of 45, or even 40, and in some cases, even 35—he could go to the Ontario human rights commission, file a complaint and then the commission would initiate the procedure that it initiates in cases relating to race, creed, colour, and so on, a procedure that has been found to be eminently satisfactory. It is by no means 100 per cent effective, but it has had a significant effect in reducing discrimination for those causes in this province. I think that applying the same sensible procedure in the case of age would have a significant effect in reducing discrimination on account of age.

Basically, the procedure is a dual one: It is an enforcement procedure to a degree, but even more, it is an educational procedure. The human rights commission, when it gets the complaint, does not haul somebody into court right off the bat. It has that as a last resort if necessary. Essentially what it does is to interview the person who is discriminating, point out to him that his conduct is contrary to public policy and explain to him why it is so. In most cases the person concerned co-operates; the problem is solved, and another important piece of education has been done.

In terms of enforcement, age, in our opinion, is in exactly the same category as race, creed or colour. Age is a matter over which a person has no control—he was born on a certain day and he can never, no matter what he does, change that fact any more than he can change his colour or his place of origin. I think all people or most people recognize that it is unfair, unreasonable, unjust—intolerable, I would say—in this day and age that a person should be discriminated against because of a factor over which he has no control.

If he fails to get a good job because he has not got adequate qualifications, that is a different matter, and this bill, of course, would not interfere with that in any way. If he is unqualified for a job, then that is his own responsibility; he could presumably attempt to get the qualifications to get the job he wants. This problem arises frequently with older people—not so terribly old at that; 40 or 45, the age of a great many of us in this House. There are some in this House, I think, who would not face discrimination on account of age if they were trying to find employment in private industry, but there are a great many of us, including myself, who have passed the advanced age of 45 and therefore would find themselves in a position where they could very well be discriminated against.

I have had many constituents come to me and, to take one type of example, among them were men who had lost jobs they may have held for 20 or 25 years, because of a change in the productive process in their plants. They became supernumerary in their plants; they were doing good work and were considered to be excellent workers, but they became surplus. They were cut off and when they went out looking for a job they could not get one. They would go to an employment office at a firm and all they had to say was that they were 45 years of age and that was the end of it. They did not even get a chance to state their qualifications or to indicate their willingness to work. I know of men personally—and I am sure every hon. member of this House knows of people similarly located—who have been reduced to public welfare because nobody will give them a chance to show whether or not they can work.

We all know that this is sheer prejudice based on nothing. In fact, most studies indicate that the older, more mature worker is often better than the younger one. He is more steady and reliable and, shall we say, he has "sown his wild oats" and is ready to settle down. But now a tragically large number of employers will not even give them a chance.

The federal Department of Labour has tried to do something about this through a publicity campaign. I do not know if it is currently running billboards, but I remember billboards on which there was some such slogan as: "Don't judge a man's worth by his date of birth."

This type of propaganda is useful, I think, but it should be backed up by something more solid than mere billboards and newspaper advertisements. It should, in my opinion, be backed up with a clear declaration of public policy such as the bill that is before hon. members proposes.

One only has to look at the advertisements in the newspapers to see the tragic effects of the type of prejudice that we are now up against. I started to go through one of today's papers just to see how many of the "help wanted" advertisements indicated discrimination on account of age, and I got tired marking them, there were so many of them. I will read one, as an example:

Experienced sales clerks. Camera salesmen, shoe salesmen. Age to 40. Experienced in retailing.

They want experienced people, but they do not want them to be past 40. There is nothing in the advertisement that would indicate any reason why a person that was 45 or 50 could not do the job just as well as one of 35 or 40. But no, the man of 45 or 50 will not be given a chance under the policy that particular company has laid down.

We all know that there are a great many cases where discrimination on account of age exists. We find it advertised in the papers, and even though a great many of these advertisements do not mention age, nevertheless, it is often found that age is a factor as soon as a person applies.

Mr. Speaker, this matter has been debated in the past in this House and I would like to say that in my opinion, the best speech that I, for one, have ever heard on the subject was made in this House in 1960. In fact, I was reading it over earlier this afternoon to refresh my memory. It was so good that I was almost tempted just to read it into the record and let it go at that without bothering to make any comments of my own. However, I decided that perhaps I should make statements on my own responsibility.

Now this speech was attributed by Hansard—it appears, incidentally, on pages 2521 to 2524 for 1960—it was attributed to one Mr. A. Grossman who, I think, is well-known to all hon. members of this House. At that time he was the member for St. Andrew; he continues to be the member for St. Andrew and he is now also the Minister of Reform Institutions in the government opposite.

I regret that the hon. Minister of Reform Institutions is not in his seat at this moment. He is usually present in this House and I have no doubt that there is a good reason for his absence. I would like to see him get up and make a speech similar to the one he made in 1960. I am sure that he could persuade the government better than I could. I hope it is not the fact that he has grown weary in well-doing, and now that he has become a Cabinet Minister, has lost interest in the people who have reached the age of 40 or 45 or 50. I would have hoped that he would have continued to urge this matter in the strategic position he occupies as a member of the Cabinet and would have persuaded the government to bring in a bill along the lines of the one for which I have just moved second reading.

I would also like to quote another distinguished member of this House from Hansard of March, 1962, on page 702. These, as indicated in Hansard, were remarks made by the hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Robarts), who is quoted as saying:

I think that everyone in the House is in complete agreement with the idea that discrimination in employment on the grounds of age is a problem which affects our society today and a problem with which we will undoubtedly have to deal. I do not think that there is any doubt about that in anyone's mind. We also can recognize in our society today a certain emphasis upon youth which, in certain aspects at least, might be referred to as a fad, and if carried too far it can become something which is unjust and perhaps unreasonable. The other emphasis, of course, is on the very large problem of age and the denial of employment to any person purely because of age.

There is one other sentence which I perhaps should read:

There is the other very important effect which the practice of denying a man employment because of age has on the individual in terms of personal frustration and mental distress, a feeling of insecurity and hardship, and all these matters are related to the question of age.

I think that this is an excellent statement of the problem. Unfortunately, the hon. Prime Minister in the same speech went on to quibble that the bill which was then being discussed, which was of the same nature as the one now before us, was not going about it in the right way and that it would take a long time to really get this matter all sorted out.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the bill before us and the bill that was before the House in 1962 tackled the problem in exactly the right way by proposing to put it into the hands of the human rights commission which is thoroughly experienced in dealing with this type of matter.

It is not as though we are breaking new ground here. This is a type of policy that has been in effect in other jurisdictions for several years. The notable example, of course, is the state of New York, where the problem is handled in precisely the way we propose in this bill that is now before the House.

I will not ask the House to accept what I have to say about the state of New York, Mr. Speaker. I would rather read two or three sentences on that point from the speech made by the hon. Minister of Reform Institutions, as he now is, in 1960. These quotes are all from page 2523 and he said:

The fact remains that bills of this nature are in effect in 7 of the states of the United States.

Then he quoted from the New York Times, as follows:

The main gain seems to have been this: Many job seekers who formerly never got as far as an interview now get that opportunity.

And then a further quote from the New York Times:

Compliance procedures are the same as in the cases involving discrimination on the basis of race, colour, religion or national origin.

In other words, precisely what we propose here, Mr. Speaker.

Now I realize that this House already has a committee studying the problems of aging. That committee is quite commendably engaged in a detailed, lengthy and comprehensive study of all aspects of the problem of aging and it will obviously take some time to bring in recommendations. I hope the government will not use the existence of that committee as an excuse for failing to proceed on a specific matter on which it is obviously quite possible to proceed immediately, without waiting for the committee.

Indeed, Mr. Speaker, I would suggest to you that the committee on aging really is not basically concerned with the problem referred to in this bill. It is dealing with, shall we say, the more elderly group in the community by and large, the 65, 70, 75 group. What this bill is mainly directed to is the 35, 40, 45 and 50 year old group, the people who do not as yet really think they have got into the condition of aging, as it is commonly understood, people who think they are in their prime, but are frequently denied an opportunity to prove it. So I think the existence of that committee is no reason at all for failing to proceed with the bill that is now before the House.

One final point I would mention, Mr. Speaker, is that this bill does not and is not intended to apply exclusively, to people who are, shall we say, in middle age or beyond that. The problem of discrimination in employment on account of age also applies often in the case of young people. In fact it is getting case of young people. In fact it is getting to be an increasingly serious problem with regard to young people. Not only do we have employers refusing to accept employees or even to give them a chance because they are alleged to be too old, but they are also in many cases refusing to give a fellow a chance because they say he is too young.

As a matter of fact, there seems to be a sort of magic age group that is somewhere between 25 and 35. That is the only time a man is any good, it would seem. I cannot put my finger on them right at the moment, but a couple of ads here state specifically that the applicant must be between 25 and 35 or they will not even look at him. They will not even give him a chance to show if he has the qualifications.

So the bill is not designed merely to deal with the well-recognized problem of the person in middle age who finds it necessary to seek employment, it is designed to discourage, and we hope ultimately to eliminate, discrimination on account of age, for that is the factor, regardless of what the age is.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I do not think I can sum up any better than by quoting three more sentences from the speech of 1960 by the now Minister of Reform Institutions. He said, referring to the bill that he had before the House at that time:

It is not the complete answer. It will not solve this problem completely but it is a good beginning. It is a step in the right direction.

I do not know where we may have heard that phrase before, Mr. Speaker.

And if nothing else, it will have great moral influence on our society. Therefore, I would urge the hon. members and the government to give their most earnest consideration to the support of this bill.

In the absence of the hon. Minister from the House today, I am very happy to echo his words and once again commend them to the government, of which he is now a member, and to the hon. members of this House.

Mr. J. B. Trotter (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, we in the Liberal Party support this bill. We have spoken on a number of occasions on the same principle, on the various times that a similar bill has been before this House, and I, as well as the hon. member for Woodbine, have read the speech the hon. member for St. Andrew made in 1960.

It is a disappointing thing that once a man becomes a big wheel in the Tory party, he forgets those people who voted for him and put him there. It is a shame the hon. Minister is not here today—because he knew the bill was going to be before the House—to let us know why he has weaseled out of what he once believed in. I think it is a typical Tory manoeuvre.

Mr. Speaker, one of the main excuses that used to be given in the past for not supporting such a principle as is before the House, and that is to stop discrimination in employing people because of their age, was the difficulty of pension plans. Those companies that put forth these pension plans have a certain cut-off age after which they would not take on new employees, or have new employees within their plan. With the present pension plan now in the offing and the portability of pensions, this excuse is gone and I can now see no reasonable excuse, no sensible excuse, why we have not adopted similar legislation, as they have in the state of New York and as they have in other states. It makes economic sense to do so, and of course it is the humane thing to do.

First I will take what is probably the reason of secondary importance, and it is the matter of economics. We have people discriminated against often at the height of their powers, let us say from 40 on. The hon. member for Woodbine has said that this discrimination often starts at 35. Let us say 35 or 40. Often these people—in fact almost always, unless it is in some sort of a job that requires a lot of physical effort—in middle age, are at the height of their powers, of their energy, and still have enough drive to bring in new ideas and have lived long enough that they have mature judgment.

Yet these are the people whom some businessmen seem foolish enough to overlook. I know of numerous occasions where people have been refused even a chance to try for a job, once it is known they are in some age group, such as 40 or 45. It is our contention that if, on these applications for employment, the mention of age, like the mention of colour or religion, is done away with, we are going to assist a lot of people in finding employment. If they do not find employment, what happens? They end up on welfare, or if they become so depressed and run down, they end up in the mental hospitals or they become disabled and so the taxpayer, in the end, foots the bill.

Is it not far more reasonable to introduce legislation that keeps people looking after themselves, that gives them the opportunity to help themselves? Such is the legislation that we have before us. I say again, Mr. Speaker, it is economic sense that we do anything we can, such as we would be doing here if we passed Bill No. 9, to make it possible for people to find the necessary employment.

So often those who are in the middle-age group have fairly young families, more than likely teenagers. Some of them are going to schools for higher education. All this costs money, and in the end, we are not only helping the middle-age generation, but we are helping the younger generation. So it makes economic sense.

Second—I leave it second to emphasize the importance of it, and this is that it is the humane thing to do—I am on the committee for looking into the problems of aging, and I have had a tremendous opportunity, as the others members on the committee have had, to see the importance of keeping people busy, to keep them at work. Those people, particularly, who are in the middle-age area, do not want to be kept busy with some therapeutic work or by doing hobby craft. They want something productive, where they are in the swim of the general workaday world.

True, they advise that older people should also have hobbies to keep them doing something of interest, to keep them doing something worthwhile. If we make it possible, or help to make it possible, that the citizens of this province are kept busy doing something worthwhile, they are going to keep their powers of physique, their powers of mind, far longer, if they are kept in the swim of society. Such a bill as Bill No. 9, with its principle of doing away with discrimination of age, will help in this cause, Mr. Speaker.

I do not pretend to say to this House that this is a cure-all. No single bill is a cure-all for anything today in our complex society, but this does go a long way to help and even goes a long way in educating business men and business firms. We know that the federal government offered a bonus to firms about a year or a year and a half ago, if they would employ people over a certain age. This is an effort by the federal government to do something in this vein. We at least should expect some kind of effort from the government of the province of Ontario.

We have had fine speeches from one man who is now a Minister in this government. We have had a fine speech on this subject, at least the first part of it was, from the hon. Prime Minister of this province, back in 1962, and yet he, as is so often the case, found some excuse to wiggle out of taking any definite action. The time has come for us to do something concrete, to let the business community know that we are interested, to let the people of the province as a whole know that we are interested, and more particularly, Mr. Speaker, to let those people who are in that most difficult time from the 40s, the 50s and early 60s, know that we are interested in helping to see that they get worthwhile employment.

I urge the government to support this private bill. It is an unusual thing for a government to do so, but it is not impossible. Bearing in mind the speeches that have been made by Tory members, bearing in mind the economic sense of the bill, and bearing in mind the common sense of the bill, I am asking the government to make this bill law.

Mr. B. Newman (Windsor-Walkerville): Mr. Speaker, in speaking for this bill, I would like to relate most of my comments to the way this bill affects residents in my own community. I brought this up yesterday in the debate on Medicare, the fact that we happen to have a disproportionately large number of elderly people in the community. There is a reason for that. The reason goes back to the days of the boom period, the 1920s, in the community where large numbers of young people settled and found employment in the automobile industry. Those people today are not yet the senior citizens but are in their 45s, 50s and even 60s.

When it comes to applying for employment, we find that many industries hesitate to hire these elderly people, especially when there are large numbers of younger ones available. We found this especially true in the last four and five years when the economic conditions in the city were not the best. Now the conditions happened to have turned around and are more favourable, as a result, some of these elderly people are able to obtain employment. But the recent automobile trade agreement has meant certain dislocations in the community, and it may mean more dislocations. Generally, when it comes to rehiring some of the people, a lot of the elderly find that in some instances—because they were the last taken on—they are the first to be let go and they will not be able to obtain employment. So with them it is a real problem.

At the same time, the individual might be 45 to 50 years of age, but has a physical appearance of an individual much older than that. I know in my own riding a case of a Mr. John DeLuca, who had applied for employment in several of the industries. Through the national employment service he was referred to an industry. He went to the place of employment but, after taking one look at him they almost immediately disqualified him simply because he looked a little older than he actually was. So age there was an important factor when it came to his becoming gainfully employed.

Not only are the aged discriminated against, but also the young. It is only a few years ago that a student—after graduating from school, even though he may have had some type of skill acquired in the school—was told he had no experience; so he was also discriminated against. He was too young. Yet how would he come along and get any experience if he were never hired?

Now there is still one other point that I would like to bring in here, and that is the elderly quite often have to resort to the Canadian vocational training programme 5. They are taken on and retrained. After having been retrained, and after the federal and provincial governments having spent good money to retrain the individual, he applies for employment and is likewise discriminated against because of his age. So unless we eliminate age as a factor of discrimination, we are going to find that the CVTP 5 programme is not serving the purpose that it was originally intended to serve. So, Mr. Speaker, we cannot disregard our older people because we happen to have a disproportionately large number of them. And for this reason, I think age is one of the discriminatory factors that should be eliminated from legislation, and a person should be allowed to obtain employment providing he has the necessary physical and mental qualifications.

Hon. A. Grossman (Minister of Reform Institutions): Mr. Chairman, I—

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): Welcome back.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: I have been told the hon. member for Parkdale suggested that—as he said it—I “weaseled out” on this debate, or something of that nature. It is typical of the type of language used by the hon. member. I do not think it is proper language to use, Mr. Speaker. I do not think anybody in this House can ever accuse me of weaseling out on anything in the 10 years I have been here.

I can be completely honest with the House, Mr. Speaker, completely honest. I still agree with the principle of that bill completely, but the government is not ready to move on a thing like that at this time. As a matter of fact, if you will have read the complete text of Hansard of that time—I do not have it before me—I distinctly remember that at that time the Prime Minister used my bill as a vehicle for the discussion on portable pensions and the leader of the Opposition of that time agreed that it would be a good purpose for which to use this bill. As a matter of fact, it was agreed that they were pretty well tied in with each other; that one of the problems in employing people at certain ages was the fact that many of the pensions were so geared that, to employ someone past the age of 45, gave many employers some concern about the effect on their pension plan. And we on this side would like to see what effect the new pension plan is going to have on this province before we move into this field.

Until that time, sir, I think—it is not long from now as everyone in this House knows—we can afford to wait perhaps that one year to see what effect it may have.

I make no bones about it, Mr. Speaker. I completely believe in the principle of the bill; it is a matter of whether this is a practical time to attempt it or whether it is not.

Mr. Bryden: What is impractical about it?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: I have just explained to the House in talking now about the pension plan and the effect the pension plan would have on this problem, because that may do more toward solving this problem than any bill of this nature.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, the illogic of what the hon. Minister said forces me to enter a debate that I did not intend to get into.

In 1960, the hon. Minister argued that the portable pension was one of the problems in coping with this situation; now the government has moved on portable pensions. This legislation has been completed. Have we not reached the time for you to take that first step? How many more years?

Mr. L. Letherby (Simcoe East): He is not the government.

Mr. MacDonald: Well, he is one member of the government and he is equally responsible. In other words, instead of paying lip service to a principle and seeking excuses, let us take that famous first step that his government apparently finds so difficult to initiate.

Hon. H. L. Rowntree (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I think the subject matter which is involved in this bill is one on which all of the members of this House could find themselves in agreement. It is not only an interesting subject, it is a very important one. I agree with all that has been said by hon. members of the Opposition and, of course, by the speaker from our own government side.

This is an important problem. Indeed I had advanced, and prepared into its second draft, a bill on this subject with respect to this current session; but I cannot accept the suggestion that the committee on aging is not a valid reason for deferring the bill for a year. In my view, with matters of such importance, the bill we bring in should deal with as many of the areas as possibly can be dealt with. It has been indicated in the debate today that there are areas, there are most unusual situations, where discrimination is not necessarily at the 65, 70 or 75 category. It may be in some other categories, and maybe the actual facts of the problem are not as they appear.

In any event, let me make some reference to the federal government. It is rather intriguing for me, I believe, in their programme of encouragement and of education, and its slogans and advertising campaign, but I am at a loss to understand the debate from the Liberal side when no such legislation in support of its education campaign has been advanced by the federal government.

The point is simply this: I am prepared, as Minister of Labour, to advance this matter in the immediate future, but not at the present time. I would like to have the advantage of the research and study which the committee on aging may be able to give to this problem and, in any event, I want to complete my own research. I agree with the principle which has been advanced.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree moves the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to.

THE HOURS OF WORK AND VACATIONS WITH PAY ACT

Mr. E. G. Freeman (Fort William) moves second reading of Bill No. 10, An Act to amend The Hours of Work and Vacations with Pay Act.

Mr. E. G. Freeman (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, the hours of work in the province of Ontario—indeed, all over Canada and all over the North American continent—have been reduced over the years from some frightful hours some few decades ago to the condition at the present time in the province of Ontario where 48 hours is described as the maximum work week. I am sure we are all thoroughly familiar with the fact that in various jurisdictions in this country, and in the United States, the fact is accepted that the maximum work week is a 40-hour week.

While I know this subject has been introduced into this House on previous occasions and has been the subject of much comment, not only among groups of organized labour people, men and women, but among others who are not organized, I think it is time—far past the time, as a matter of fact—that this government should take a really sound look at the matter of a 40-hour week. There are probably several reasons why a 40-hour week is completely justified at this time, and one could go on almost indefinitely and list them. I suggest that the time is coming in the comparatively near future when the question of automation is going to have a very real effect upon the maximum work week.

I suggest also to you, Mr. Speaker, that the question of leisure time which automation is very likely to bring about is going to be important if we attack this problem in its proper perspective at this time—the 40-hour work week. Certainly after listening closely to the hon. Minister of Education (Mr. Davis) in his remarks today, I believe that the government and certainly The Department of Education envisages in future continued use of the educational facilities to take care of larger groups and older groups of people in the communities, for purposes of improving their education and placing them perhaps in a new form of employment. These are all things that we may not pay too much attention to today, but I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that the time is coming very, very soon when we are going to feel that we missed an opportunity if we, in this province of Ontario, do not initiate the 40-hour work week as the maximum work week in the province.

I mentioned that large numbers of people, both men and women, have talked about the maximum 40-hour work week, but I would also like to bring to your attention, Mr. Speaker, and I think you know it full well, that there are people at the present time in this province—and I would doubt if many hon. members in this House realize how many people there are—still working in excess of 48 hours a week—

Mr. Letherby: Well, we are attending the Legislature.

Mr. Freeman: But the hon. member is big and able to take it. There are very many people who are working in excess of a 48-hour week, and I suggest in all seriousness that in very many cases they are getting no compensation for such overtime as they put in at their work. In many cases the amount of overtime is very little, perhaps two, three, or four hours a week, and they seem to be willing to go along with it, although in their own beings they resent the situation and I think it is an unjust situation.

It is one that should be corrected, Mr. Speaker, and I think it is only going to be corrected by legislation.

Lip service has been paid, as I said, to this question of a maximum 40-hour work week for a long period of time and that lip service is just not enough. This province has been described as “the province of opportunity,” and I like to feel that it is and I hope that it will continue to be in a greater degree.

But I would suggest that this is a marvelous opportunity for this government, our government, to add more lustre to the slogan, “the province of opportunity,” and also a greater degree of truth to the slogan, “the province of opportunity.” One way to add lustre and to bring more truth into the slogan is for the government to realistically face this problem of the 40-hour maximum work week. I have been used to the 48-, 50- and 60-hour work week myself for so many years that it is almost difficult for me to realize that it would be possible for people to enjoy a 40-hour maximum work week. However, I hope the reiteration of “40-hour” and “48-hour” will bring the hon. members to realize that it is the 40-hour maximum that is so much to be desired.

I would suggest, Mr. Speaker, that with automation on the increase, the balance between labour and jobs can be seriously affected. The efforts of this government to cope with the problems at the present time would seem to me, and I believe to many others, quite inadequate. Sharing the available work may not be in any way a real contribution to such a large problem but it is certainly of some help and could well be acted on by this government.

In the bill, the provisions covering no reduction in take-home pay and time and a half for overtime are related to this whole question. This is one of the problems that I am sure has probably caused the government some concern in its quest to approach the problem of a maximum 40-hour work week, because of the fact that it may be offending the sensibilities of many people whose sensibilities it has no wish to affect.

But I believe this government should face the inevitable, and should face the inevitable in a most realistic manner. I think that if each hon. member, whether at present in this House or not in this House, but who has had the matter called to his attention, will examine his own conscience or her own conscience as the case may be—the hon. member for Hamilton Centre (Mrs. Pritchard)—he will support this bill to make the maximum hours of work 40 hours a week in the province of Ontario.

Mr. E. W. Sopha (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, this bill commends itself to me and I should like to make a comment or two about it.

Quite apart from the question of the reduction of the work week so as to provide work for a greater number of our people, in a day and age when we are concerned about the problems of automation, it strikes me that the 40-hour week has come to be accepted by our population as the linear measure, in terms of the passage of time, of the amount of one's week that should be devoted to the earning of the daily bread.

I have been a bit impressed in my lifetime by the great change that I have seen in the use of winter by our people for recreational purposes. It is a good thing that we make such use of winter in the 1960s as we do, because we certainly, as in all the decades of the century—this one, the one before that, and the one before that—have enough of it. But I have been struck by the great numbers of our people who now engage in outdoor recreational activity and manly sports.

For example, when I was a boy, I recall that in the realm of curling it was only the most hardened kilt-wearing Scotsman who would hurl a stone in the winter. Now, at least in the north country, and I imagine it is true throughout the province, great numbers of people engage in the recreational pursuit of curling.

So it is with skiing. When I was growing up, it was thought that skiing was an activity that one left when one left the teens, that it was a recreation for only the very young and very hardy and people in the peak form of good health. Now, one goes to the ski slopes, and one incredibly sees people of the age of the hon. Minister of Labour just starting to take up the sport. That is to say, people in their 50s. Apparently anyone under the age of 60, if he is in normal good health, is not risking serious illness if he participates in skiing.

Then, of course, there is the winter carnival—skating. Large numbers of our young people play hockey. There has emerged on the winter scene, such a recreational pursuit as broom ball, which was virtually unknown a decade ago. Now large numbers of people in our communities engage in that sport.

That is one factor that commends itself to reducing the work week to 40 hours, so that our people have enough energy left to get out and take advantage of the recreational pursuits that are available to them throughout the long winter.

The other comment that I should like to make, and I think it is very germane, is that I was impressed by the vocal minority of people who came before the select committee on mining, and urged upon us, I must say without success to the present time, the opening of our provincial parks for prospecting and mining development. Our committee, so far with the aid of my hon. friend from York North (Mr. Mackenzie), who is a very bulwark against any intrusion into our provincial parks, has resisted the importunings of such people.

The point I want to make in respect of the provincial parks is this, that the provincial parks, so far as they provide a recreational pursuit for our people when the work day is done and the work week is done, are a very outgrowth of our industrial community. In other words, the high degree of our industrial development in this province has created the need for recreation. People working fewer hours and making more money transfer their interest from their work quite readily into an interest in recreational pursuits. I am happy to relate that, as all hon. members know, we have quite a number of provincial parks, I think taking up five per cent of the land mass of Ontario. They are a very logical development from the affluence of our industrial civilization.

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker, I commend this bill, and the initiative of my hon. friend from Fort William in bringing it before the House.

I know today—and I do not say it in a fit of depression—that somebody is going to move the adjournment of the debate, but I hope in the not-too-far distant future that this principle will find a hallowed position in statutory enactment. Being struck by the events of recent days, I know in respect of this government that it is committed to the proposition that is laid out in the Chinese proverb, "Every journey of 1,000 miles starts with one step." Perhaps in respect of this, that one step will be followed by a great many and more rapid steps and the principle here in sections 1 and 2—

An hon. member: Not over there.

Mr. Sopha: My hon. friend says "not over there," and perhaps he has got reason to be a bit pessimistic, as all of us have here, in anticipating great changes. May I say that I hope this bill commends itself to all hon. members of the House.

Mr. A. B. R. Lawrence (Russell): Mr. Speaker, I am going to speak very briefly in opposition to second reading of Bill No. 10, and obviously not on the basis of any sweeping principle. It seems to me that judgment of Bill No. 10 is entirely a matter of place and time, and I limit my opposition to this bill to the year 1965. I do not limit myself to what we might have in 1966 or 1967, nor to the gradients as to the number of work weeks or hours of work we might have, nor whether it would be better dropping it to 44 hours as a start and then to 40.

The background of any remarks on this subject seem to me, Mr. Speaker, to relate to the fact that there is a legislative and economic trend toward shorter hours of work. Some of our western provinces have dropped to 44 hours a week, and there is an economic trend fostered by the union movement or by the labour movement itself.

The second part of the background, and an important thing to consider, is the tremendous year of expansion economically that 1965 is for the province of Ontario. The third thing that comes to my thoughts is the fact that we have not yet quite digested the progressive legislation which was contained in our minimum wage amendments of last year and before.

Mr. Speaker, I cannot speak with any of the expertise of some of the hon. members opposite when it comes to the economics of this problem, but as a layman it seems to me that the first step might be to lower the hours of work by something less than a full eight hours, and the second thing is that it would be much more obvious and much more reasonable to see this lowering in a year in which, instead of a tremendous development, we are, in fact, experiencing some form of recession.

Having said that, Mr. Speaker, I can only go so far as to say I can see that the bill could, in 1965, create damage and may not produce any particular good.

Analyzing the people it would help, we can deal first with organized labour, both skilled and unskilled. It does not seem to me that there is any urgency in helping the organized group of the labour force, because the place that it protects itself is at the bargaining table and with both groups, skilled and unskilled, one feels that the union movement itself is discharging the responsibility required.

Insofar as the skilled and unorganized are concerned, I would suggest that in the present economic climate of Ontario they are not being prejudiced in any way by a short further delay in any lowering of number of hours of the week for work.

The group that does concern one is the unorganized and the unskilled. Here, of course, is the basic purpose of the legislation, I would think, and that is to avoid exploitation, if it were found. Now, I can say, sir, certainly coming from my part of the province, I have not had demonstrated to me, and I do not think the tenor of the remarks today have purported to demonstrate, that we are dealing with a great problem of exploitation.

What one does notice, and I think many hon. members on both sides of the House have found this, is the very great burden felt by the small proprietor, who is generally, I would think, the person who employs the greatest number of the unskilled and unorganized workers. I know that particularly in the field of service stations and that type of small proprietorship this a problem in my own area, where I get complaints from people who labour, as well as proprietors, with respect to the present hours of work legislation.

Another thing that perhaps is not particularly pertinent to all hon. members but to some of us, is the fact that, certainly where I live, one must keep one's eye on what is happening in another jurisdiction.

From an economic point of view, the city of Ottawa-Hull straddles a provincial boundary. I can say to the House, from personal experience, that there is a very delicate balance in some of the industries in Ottawa as to a choice between jurisdictions which is poised on the question of cents—small amounts of money in labour costs and hours of work.

Having said that, I close, Mr. Speaker, by saying that we should perhaps take a small opportunity—a short opportunity—of digesting the minimum wage. I think that our rate of expansion makes us very vulnerable to any drastic changes in this kind of legislation. Finally, everyone must accept that the trend is in the direction and we will see—many of us, I hope—the 40-hour week in this province.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Mr. Rowntree moves the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Tomorrow, Mr. Speaker, we will continue with the estimates of The Department of Education and we will have an opportunity on some other day of continuing with these bills and other bills similar to those we have had in the past hour.

Mr. MacDonald: Not tomorrow?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: No, we will go on with estimates tomorrow.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree moves the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to.

Introduction of bills.

Hon. A. Grossman (Minister of Reform Institutions): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day, I wish to announce the retirement of my deputy Minister, Mr. J. A. Graham, due to ill health, and to inform the House of the appointment of Mr. L. R. Hackl, BA, to the position of Deputy Minister effective June 1, 1965.

Mr. Graham's resignation is accepted with much regret, appreciating the many important changes for which he has been responsible during his service with the department. Mr. Graham started his career with the department in 1946, when he was appointed governor of Carleton county jail. In 1947, he became superintendent of the Ontario training centre in Brampton, the first completely open institution in Canada. After firmly establishing the training programme at Brampton, he became superintendent at the Ontario reformatory at Mimico in 1951, where he played an important role in developing the Alex G. Brown memorial clinic for the treatment of alcoholics.

In 1953 he was promoted to executive assistant to the Deputy Minister and in 1959 to the position of Deputy Minister. During that period, Mr. Graham was active in many progressive developments in the corrections field in Ontario. He placed great emphasis on staff training, vocational trade training and many other innovations which put Ontario in the forefront in the field of the rehabilitation of the offender.

Much credit is due to Mr. Graham for the consistently high standard of service he has rendered to the province and the part he has played in bringing The Department of Reform Institutions to its high standing in this field.

Mr. Graham typifies the civil servant in Ontario who gives of his best in carrying out arduous duties with zeal and dedication, a dedication which so often takes a heavy toll of health. Mr. Graham's job was particularly demanding because of the difficulties naturally inherent in the kind of work in which The Department of Reform Institutions is engaged.

In regretfully accepting Mr. Graham's resignation, I wish to express the thanks of the government and the people of Ontario for his long years of faithful service and wish him improved health so that he may enjoy many years of well-deserved retirement.

Mr. Leo R. Hackl, BA, the newly-appointed Deputy Minister, has worked in the department in a number of capacities since 1947. Formerly a school teacher with a BA degree and a specialist certificate in guidance, Mr. Hackl was appointed superintendent of the Ontario training centre, Brampton, in 1954. From 1956 he served as superintendent of the industrial farm and the Ontario training centre at Burch until 1959, when he was promoted to the position of executive assistant to the Deputy Minister. On February 1, 1964, he was appointed assistant Deputy Minister, which position he has carried with distinction.

I am very pleased that a man of Mr. Hackl's ability is available to take over the position of Deputy Minister at this time, when such an intensive and expanded programme of the department, including major staff reorganization, is under way.

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day, I would like to direct a question to the acting Minister of Transport. What steps, if any, does the department plan to take to implement the recommendations of the coroner's jury that inquired into the death of James Heath, regarding safety features in motor vehicles?

Hon. J. A. C. Auld (Minister of Tourism and Information): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the hon. Minister of Transport (Mr.

Haskett), I have the answer for the hon. member.

The Department of Transport has not yet received a copy of the recommendations of the coroner's jury following the death of James Heath. When this report is filed it will be given the same careful study that all jury recommendations receive. Government officials and representatives of the motor vehicle manufacturers are in constant contact through the various associations dealing with motor vehicle operations and safety on our highways.

Mr. Bryden: That says nothing in a long space.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Hon. J. W. Spooner (Minister of Municipal Affairs): Mr. Speaker, may we revert back to the introduction of bills?

Mr. Speaker: Yes.

THE ONTARIO MUNICIPAL EMPLOYEES' RETIREMENT SYSTEM ACT, 1961-1962

Hon. J. W. Spooner (Minister of Municipal Affairs) moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to amend The Ontario Municipal Employees' Retirement System Act, 1961-1962.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Mr. Speaker, there are only two amendments to this Act. One is to place local hydro-electric commissions and other utility commissions on the same basis as other local boards under this Act. The second amendment is to authorize the Ontario municipal employees' retirement board to invest the moneys deposited with the board in the same manner as its own funds, where it is managing pension funds under agreement.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Clerk of the House: The sixteenth order, House in committee of supply; Mr. W. G. Noden in the chair.

Mr. R. F. Nixon (Brant): Mr. Chairman, I would like to continue my remarks having to do with teachers in the province of Ontario. Very briefly, I would like to bring to your attention, sir, the importance of having our best teaching talent working with the children in the early grades. There are no drop-outs in grades 1 and 2, and I feel that by the age of ten years our young people have, perhaps, lost their claim to equality of opportunity in their own right. So many of their learning habits have been determined and, I suppose, their basic ability has more or less been established. It is because their basic ability has more or less been established, and it is because of these reasons, that I feel a special attempt should be made to see that our best qualified teachers are working with those of our students in these early grades.

In looking through the statistics of the hon. Minister's (Mr. Davis') report—I mentioned this yesterday—I was a bit disappointed I was not able to find some information that would have been useful—on specifically, the distribution of teachers of ability in the rural and urban setting, and the separate and public schools. I feel that the hon. Minister might very well go to the records of the inspectors of the teachers, who have all received a rating from their inspectors on a numerical scale. It would be useful for us to know where the teachers with high ratings are found in this province and if, in fact, there is some distribution that is something other than fair, or along lines that might be correctable by the hon. Minister, or by action of this House.

Since I have mentioned the feature of control exercised by the Legislature that is largely in finance, I want to bring to your attention, sir, the fact that although we are all strongly in favour of equality of opportunity, the fact remains that opportunity is by no means equal. I would like to point out to the House one interesting statistic that I was able to find. In 1962 the municipality of Scarborough spent an average of $309 on each of its students. At that time the number was 43,600 and another municipality, not far away—Forest Hill; I suppose I am picking an extreme case—spent $540 on each of its 1,800 students.

I do not know what can be done about this. We congratulate Forest Hill for having the wherewithal to provide the special advantages that go with almost unlimited funds for education. It is true that the provincial government does provide, on an average, 40 per cent of the cost of education. The hon. Minister may want to argue about that. It depends, I suppose, on whether the grants are related to the expenses of the previous year, or the current year; but approximately 60 per cent of the expense is met elsewhere.

Much has been said about the burden the municipalities have to bear. Many resolutions have been passed and received in this House. Many committees have studied the problem, but it would surely be in the competence of the hon. Minister and this government to come down with some concrete proposals that would do more than pay lip service to the problem of financing education or financing the municipal responsibility in general. That is all I want to say about that aspect.

Going now to another topic, Mr. Chairman, we are in support of the government programme that would provide textbooks free of direct charge to the students in Ontario. The hon. Minister's programme to provide extra grants to buy the books needed to inaugurate the programme is a sensible one; but I would like to point out to you, sir, that whenever the costs of a programme that have — up until a new departure—been borne by individuals, are taken over by the government, there is a tendency for them to rise without the public knowing the rate of increase. I have seen some of the new textbooks that are being provided in local schools. They are very fine, hard-covered books with four-coloured pictures; and they are very expensive. Some of them are in excess of $5, and I can see a tendency in the future for the cost of textbooks to rise astronomically without any particular outcry from the public—since the cost is met indirectly.

This is something that we must be very careful of. Information that, I suppose, is available to everybody would indicate that the publishing business is becoming very profitable. American publications indicate that a large degree of these new profits are in the textbook section of the industry. The government is going to provide finances through the local school boards to buy the books and, of course, the government does have a certain degree of control over what books will be bought through its authorization list, which is becoming quite large, granting the freedom of choice to the teachers and the school boards that is a subject of much debate. I feel there should be this freedom of choice, but others think differently.

But my own views on the textbooks is that, if they are going to be good textbooks, they are going to be thin textbooks. They are not going to cover every section of the topics on the curriculum, with additional topics as well. I do not feel it is up to us to provide the luxury texts that we are heading for at the present time. Our responsibility is perhaps even a more extensive one; and that is to provide libraries in our school system, as is now being done on a modest scale, so that a large number of books are available on any given subject. In this way, with proper leadership from the teachers, our young people are going to learn the fact that the textbook does not bear all the information they might require on a certain subject. They are going to learn that a broad view is necessary to get a background on a subject that will permit them to continue their education. The emphasis and the money should be spent on furnishing our libraries, rather than funneling them into purchasing textbooks that would tend to become overelaborate and expensive.

The hon. Minister has already dealt quite fully with the teaching of history. His own children, I suppose, are at much the same point in the education system as my own are; and it is interesting to observe the different slant you get on such a system as a parent as opposed to what I formerly had with just teaching experience. I can well imagine the special trials the teachers at Brampton must go through when they realize that the personal informants of the hon. Minister of Education are watching them in action.

But in surveying the teaching of history in our system, in grades 5 and 6, our young people are exposed to the explorers of Canada; while basic Canadian history is covered in grade 7 and 8. A little more is hung on this basic skeleton of information in grade 10, and more in grade 13, but most Canadian history is covered in the last two years of the primary system. In looking at this course, I find it to be fact-crammed. I find the teachers use the textbooks more than they should, perhaps, and I find that young people of rather tender years are writing their notes from the textbooks.

I do not want to be specifically critical of teachers in any way, but this is surely where the fault begins with the teaching of history; that the foundations of Canadian history are laid by teachers who themselves have not been exposed to even the grade 13 teaching and are, in many ways and by their own admission, incompetent to deal adequately with the subject. The interest of our students is often killed because of this and, for this reason, I think it is dealt with inadequately.

The hon. Minister is conscious of this and, I feel, is very interested in improving it. Suggestions have already been made for improvement in texts, along the line of the centennial projects and I hope this will be dealt with adequately in the near future.

Many hon. members have been interested to read the report on the proposal for general and advanced levels of instruction in grade 13, and I would like to deal with it at this time. It was in January, 1964, that the hon. Minister announced the committee that was going to deal with the problem of grade 13 instruction. Part of his announcement indicated that the report would be available the following June. I think this was a commendable approach because the problem had taken on almost crisis proportions. Following the original report an implementation committee was set up, and part of this committee's work dealt specifically with the proposal for the teaching of subjects at the grade 13 level, general and advanced. This report is now available, and once again I would say that this has been arrived at in rather a hasty and summary fashion. Even in the report itself the committee more or less apologizes for having not had the opportunity to refer exhaustively to this difficult matter. I hope that the implementation of their recommendations will be dealt with, with that in mind.

Among their recommendations, they indicate that there is general acceptance of the suggestion that grade 13 topics be dealt with at two levels—general and advanced—and that it be restricted to four subject areas. I feel sure that the hon. Minister is aware that this is not generally accepted and I would like him to comment later in this debate on what the university people have to say about this university entrance course, because surely they must have the operative decision as to what would be the requirements for entrance into university. Now, all these decisions must be taken in collaboration with the educational authorities, but to say that the suggestion has received general acceptance is, I feel, not correct at this stage.

I do feel that the general recommendations in the report are excellent. They deal with the need for increased student responsibility, not only at the grade 13 level, but at all stages, particularly in secondary schools. Too many of our students are still subjected to spoon-feeding and are not having an opportunity to have the sense of achievement that some personal study and personal progress can bring. But I am convinced, as I hope the hon. Minister is convinced, that our system can be made efficient enough so that our present academic level at the senior matriculation level is possible in 12 years, whether or not this means the abolition of grade 13. There must be a clear academic path, and I have said this before, so that our average student can achieve university entrance standing in 12 years in our public system.

Some months ago I had the enlightening opportunity to visit some of the poorer areas in this city. I mentioned them in the debate on housing and I have mentioned them when we have been discussing housing conditions in other debates. One thing that did impress me in visiting these substandard communities in Toronto and elsewhere, was the fact that the young people are presenting the most pressing problem. I found them healthy, very cheery, very willing to talk to visitors and to talk about their schools. Often there was reference to the fact that there was little to do in the summer but play out in the streets. Some time ago I made the suggestion in this House that the hon. Minister of Education might spearhead a co-ordinated programme among the government departments, which might provide employment for students at our senior secondary level and also in universities. Now this would be, I suppose, primarily to provide employment for these people who have some difficulty in earning money to continue their education.

In my own view, an object that would be just as important would be to give them the experience of community service, almost along the lines of the American Peace Corps, so that our young people would have an opportunity to go out into the community and have the experience of service.

Now, my remarks in this connection began with reference to the underprivileged children in the metropolitan areas of Ontario. We know that there are some camps provided, and some recreational facilities, but I am sure that more could be organized so that our students at the universities and the higher secondary levels would be taken into these underprivileged areas; they would be able to organize classes in remedial reading and remedial subjects of every type; they would be able to undertake recreational programmes and provide an improving influence that would tend to break the cycle of poverty that has become almost accepted by so many of our municipal authorities. Because I have dealt with the subject previously and more extensively, I would hope that the hon. Minister would be able to comment on the suggestion and to see if something might be done along these lines.

For the last three years we have dealt in these estimates with the possibility of introducing educational television into the province of Ontario. The hon. Minister has made the announcement that we are going into this in a very big way and we can look forward to a complete government-owned network that would bring educational television into every area of the province of Ontario. This would begin with an application for an educational television station in Toronto. I hope and I expect that the application would be granted and we would find ourselves in the educational television field in the near future.

In this connection I would like to read an excerpt from a working paper prepared by the Metropolitan Educational Television Association of Toronto. One of the chief recommendations that is underlined in this report, is as follows:

It is of the first importance that there be set up a council or board charged with the responsibility and authority for province-wide development of educational television.

Now, in this House in the last few weeks we have seen the hon. Minister of Education set up similar boards that would have the responsibility of dealing with educational research and the proposed colleges of applied arts and technology. I would recommend strongly to him that a similar board might undertake the responsibility of the development of educational television, because if this is not done, the hon. Minister will be open to the charge—and I would be among the first to make it—that the educational television programme is under his control. I would submit to the House that this is not a good thing, that we would expect the hon. Minister to get advice from a great many professionals in the field, but in general the operation of the network should be by a board that would be constituted on the recommendation of the Minister, but by the Legislature of the province.

Now, it is interesting to see how far we lag behind other jurisdictions in the provision of educational television. I am informed that 50 per cent of the students in the United States already have access to educational facilities by television and we need only look at the publications that are available from many areas across Canada and the United States, to see how far we are behind in this business.

I have on the desk before me, the booklet put out by a co-operative group in the Maritime provinces, dealing with Atlantic school broadcasts, and the booklet put out by the province of Manitoba, dealing with their programme in radio and television. Similar ones are available for other provinces. I have one here entitled: "Young Saskatchewan Looks and Listens," dealing with their programme. The hon. members will recognize the very thin, rather uninteresting booklet that I now have, entitled, "Elementary School Radio Broadcasts Presented By The Ontario Department of Education."

It seems to me I remember back in grade 5, that our teacher used to thumb through a leaflet that looked very much like this. It may be that this is just a reprint, with the date changed, and some updating of the programmes, but in essence, nothing has been done of a concrete nature, until the hon. Minister's announcement, made rather informally some weeks ago, and formally presented to the House yesterday.

We are familiar with the work that is being done in England. This booklet having to do with the BBC educational broadcasting is of interest; I was specifically interested to see the programme that is carried out in South Carolina, where they have a system very similar to the one that it appears we are going to have in Ontario with a government-owned outlet reaching every community. The whole network is linked to a central control, so that an efficient means of presenting this new educational facility has been brought about.

But there are some definite questions that come to mind following the hon. Minister's announcement. We have educational television in Metropolitan Toronto, and the association has a high standard. We have had educational television sponsored by private television—channel 9, and by the CBC—for some years. It is not apparent from the hon. Minister's announcement that there has been any real consultation up to the present time about what these people have experienced in the field and think about the hon. Minister's plans, and whether or not he has adequately consulted with them before making his decisions. I would like to know at what levels the consultations have taken place. I would like to know at what levels of education television would apply.

It seems to me we would be providing a reasonable additional service for citizens of the province if a television installation were set up in this House, so that when debates of great importance take place, the citizens of the country have an opportunity to see their representatives and their government in action. I would like to know whether the facilities would be available to Mr. Fairbairn and his division. Mr. Fairbairn, of course, operates an information bureau, and these facilities would, indeed, be adequate to bring to the attention of the people those things that he felt should be shown to them.

As a matter of fact, this all points up the fact that if the educational television network is controlled by the hon. Minister, or someone directly under him in the department, there is bound to be some criticism of the programming procedure. It would surely recommend itself to him that somebody would have independent control of it.

I was quite interested that the hon. Minister did not see fit to set up this new network under the direction of his audio-visual branch. This has been discussed before, and we know that the audio-visual people in The Department of Education have had some extensive experience in this line. I would be interested to know what the hon. Minister intends to do.

Mr. Chairman, I have tried to deal with some matters of importance in education. We have realized that our system is adequate in many respects. We know that the rate of change in education is as great as it is in any aspect of our community life. But there is one thing that the hon. Minister has not dealt with that may affect the future of education more than any single change in the last few years. We have been oppressed financially and our facilities have been strained by the large numbers of students that, since the war, have flooded our schools. One of the changes that started rather insignificantly, but is taking on tremendous proportions, are the medical advances in birth control. The new hormones and devices that are available for this are being prescribed on a more and more general basis; I do not know whether the hon. Minister would agree with me in this, but I am of the opinion that a large number of the young people who are presently in our schools were not all as a result of carefully planned parenthood. It does appear, however, that in the future we are going to see a plateau and maybe even a significant dip in our birth rate. I was informed by competent doctors just a few days ago that the birth-control pills now available which taken daily may soon be replaced by a pill taken once a month. As birth control becomes simpler, more readily available, and cheaper, we are going to see the birth rate fall, and we will see that the strain on our facilities is going to lessen.

I think that the hon. Minister should whisper to his computer some of the statistics that are beginning to come in from this change in our way of life in the North American communities.

I would predict that the computer is going to have some interesting work in the next two years, as this new information will moderate its predictions that have been made in the past.

It may well be that it will not be so difficult to reduce our class sizes to 20. It will not be so difficult to be selective in our teachers, and it may be that our schools will be boarded up, just like the gas stations are, on the corners of so many of our communities. I hope and trust that this will not be so, but I am sure, Mr. Chairman, that you would agree with me that the advent of practically universal birth control is going to have far-reaching effects on our educational system. But, of course, the hon. Minister is not suggesting that his computer is going to solve all of the problems of education. He has, however, got another valuable asset, recently added in an advisory capacity to his department, in the form of a 21-man committee, chaired by Mr. Justice Emmett Hall. I have a feeling that we will not be able to call this the Hall committee; we may have to call it the committee of 21, I do not know. The committee has been made up of very able people. I cannot say that I know them all, but we can see from the group that has been included that they have useful knowledge about the problems of education.

I must say that I have the greatest respect for Mr. Justice Hall. I have had occasion in the past few days to indicate this, and if his survey of the educational needs of the society of Ontario is as extensive and useful as his survey of the medical needs of Canada, then it is going to be a very useful report indeed, and it is going to be very different from some of the reports that the hon. Minister has had access to in the past three years.

I presume that the hon. Minister was as impressed as I have been with Mr. Hall's work in the past in a capacity such as this. I am amazed that a man of this position, coming from outside of the province, has time at his disposal to work not in the capacity of a Royal commissioner, but as chairman of the hon. Minister's committee to take on this far-reaching responsibility.

I would be prepared to say that this committee would be able to give us the best answers available to the problems that presently confront us in education; we look forward to their deliberations. I get the impression, however, that it is so high-powered that they may, in fact, meet once a year and see what the statisticians employed by them have to present to them. I hope that it will weld itself into a group of people familiar with individual personal responses of the other committee members, and will come out with a blueprint that will take us into the 21st century in education. I trust that this is the hon. Minister's intention, and he has our heartiest support in his endeavour.

It is interesting, of course, to note that he has realized the importance of the early grades in giving them, as part of their special commission, the study of the kindergarten to grade 6 area. In my brief experience in the Legislature, the hon. Minister has announced each year that this is under careful investigation. We have still to see the results of this investigation, because very little change has taken place. But certainly this area of our school system is seriously outdated and inefficient, and we look for its improvement.

Mr. Chairman, I want to say something about the provision of collateral training for those who have been subject to unemployment and who are in difficulties with continuing automation.

We know that the various programmes sponsored by the federal government, and taken up enthusiastically by the provincial government, has had varying success. Much has been said about the project that has been set in motion in this city and in other centres across the province. They have been more effective in some areas than in others.

I sense that there is a change in the hon. Minister's view of this. A recent editorial in the Globe and Mail, that I am sure he read just a few days ago, accused him of playing politics with this very important matter. I do not believe that this would be so. I do not think the hon. Minister of Education was so keen to win the Riverdale seat for his party that he would interfere with the educational process with premature announcements for that purpose. But I feel that there is a lessening of the concentration of the department in providing the facilities that are going to upgrade the educational standing of a good many of our citizens who have been passed over by the educational process in the past.

I suppose all of us, as members, have had telephone calls from students at the Jones Avenue school complaining about some aspect or other—mainly the fact that the upgrading process does not start low enough. I had one chap who had only grade 4 education, and the retraining programme did not start at a low enough level to help him. There have been other complaints along these lines and I certainly hope that the hon. Minister is prepared, this afternoon, to say something about a new enthusiasm and a new direction to the provision for these facilities to train and retrain those people who, at present, must be classified as unemployed.

Mr. Chairman, there is no hon. member of the House who is not prepared to offer his fullest co-operation to the hon. Minister and his department, and all those associated with education in their greatest of responsibilities. We listened to the hon. Minister's report with interest. I consider it a valuable report and I would look forward to undertaking further discussions with him on many aspects of it during the course of this debate.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Mr. Chairman, I have noted with interest that there is a practice growing in this House, that when a speaker rises to participate in a debate, he does so on the basis of a text. At least two hon. members have done that in the last week, and I am provoked by their action to do the same thing.

My text for my introductory remarks is as follows:

"Our education is 50 years behind the times. It did not matter so much a generation ago, but now it is a tragedy." Mr. Chairman, that reference was made with regard to the Ontario educational system. It was not made by an Opposition critic; nor was it made by somebody who was unknowledgeable with regard to our educational system. Believe it or not, that comment was made by Dr. Robert W. B. Jackson, professor of education at our Ontario college of education, the man who had been head of the educational research department in this government for some years, and who is the newly appointed director of the institute on studies in education. Indeed, when he was being designated to that new position, the hon. Minister referred to him, and quite rightly in my view, as the outstanding man in educational research in Canada today.

I would agree that, to take this in perspective, there has been a tendency for all educational systems to fall behind the march of time—not just the educational system in the province of Ontario. I would also want to be perfectly fair about it and say that, if we are 50 years behind the times in Ontario, then five years ago we were closer to 100 years behind the times. We have done a fair amount of catching up in the last five years under the direction of, first, the hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Robarts), and now of the present hon. Minister of Education, but, Mr. Chairman, I think we have to recognize the basic validity of the contention that our educational system is 50 years behind the times. I think the most convincing evidence of it is to take a look at reality—take a look at the facts in Canada today.

In Canada today, for example, there are

1,017,869 men and women who have no more than grade four education. For a country that believes it is a literate country, and would be shocked if anybody were to challenge it as not being a literate country, it is rather a sobering and arresting fact to realize that there are more than one million people who have no more than a grade 4 education. It is also rather sobering to realize—this has been pointed out recently in public comments arising from a report, I think, by the head of Frontier college—that 50 per cent of our labour force in the province of Ontario has no more than grade 8 education.

Part of this, I would concede, is due to the fact that we have had considerable immigration to this country. In some instances, this immigration has come from portions of Europe that are overcrowded and have had fewer opportunities for education, and therefore one cannot attribute all of this condition to our educational system. But it is still rather sobering to realize that when one examines—as has been done by the International institute in Toronto—the problems of newcomers, people who have just emerged in this metropolitan area, the basic problem faced by these people is no different; whether they come as a new Canadian, from southern Italy, or whether they come from the rural parts of Canada—whether it be the Maritimes or the rural parts of Ontario. This is underlined by the fact, Mr. Chairman, that 64 per cent of our people in the rural parts of Canada have no more than grade 8 education. This is the result, the end product or the reality of the educational system we have had.

I think there are particular reasons to suggest that it has at least as much validity in Ontario as elsewhere, and perhaps more, because we have tended to drift in the province of Ontario. Indeed, we have drifted for generations. I can recall when I first came into this House, my first participation in debate on the educational estimates in 1956, I laid my chief emphasis on the position with regard to trade schools—the fact that at that stage—and the situation has improved some, but not really very drastically—six per cent of our young people went ahead to higher education. And there was a very heavy emphasis on our education throughout the whole school system, particularly in secondary schools, to meet the needs of that six per cent who were planning to get a higher education. There was less and less consideration, or inadequate consideration perhaps to put it more accurately, for the 94 per cent who had neither the abilities nor the interest to go ahead for a higher education. Those years of neglect, combined with new and urgent demands arising from the nature of modern technological society and the kind of education required to meet them, have created a first-rate crisis in the province of Ontario in recent years.

To meet this crisis, we have had in pretty rapid succession, I would concede, some developments that will be of very far-reaching consequences in our educational system. We had the Robarts plan and the broadening of the educational system—I want to come back to it in a bit more detail in a moment. We had an absolutely phenomenal expansion of the educational “plant” to be able to implement the objectives of the Robarts plan. It is rather interesting to realize that in 1960, in the whole of the province of Ontario, notwithstanding the fact that technical and vocational education had been introduced in our system back in the early 20s, after World War I, there were no more than 72 schools that provided technical or vocational education, secondary schools. Fourteen of them were purely vocational schools; 58 of them were composite schools that provided technical education along with the other range of subjects.

In the intervening five years, with availability of 75 per cent capital funds from Ottawa and their ready acceptance by this government, we have developed a plant until today—I believe my figures are at least roughly accurate—there are something like 237 of the 435 secondary schools in the province of Ontario that have facilities now to provide in whole or in part, technical or vocational education. Now, that is an absolutely phenomenal kind of development, but let us face it, Mr. Chairman, this is a development that we have squeezed into a five-year period, at least in terms of providing the bricks and mortar, a development that should have taken place over a period of two or three generations prior to that. So it underlines the basic validity of the contention of Dr. Jackson, that our education is 50 years behind the times.

We have had vocational centres, we have had institutes of technology; now we have had announced the introduction into our system of the whole range of community colleges. All of these are designed to meet the crisis in education, to try to catch up on those years of neglect. But, Mr. Chairman, we are all painfully aware of the fact that it is a far cry from making announcements to achieving the objectives of those announcements; and it is going to take not only years, but hundreds of millions of dollars. Meanwhile, we are so ill-equipped to meet the situation today and the demands of today that Dr. Jackson describes the situation in no less harsh a term than "tragedy."

I want to take a look, Mr. Chairman, at a number of the developments that have taken place in the last few years, to examine the deficiencies that have emerged in them, so that we can be sure we are catching up in as sound a way as possible.

First, I want to take a look at the Robarts plan. As I mentioned a moment ago, the whole objective of the Robarts plan was to rescue an educational system that had been designed to meet the needs of the six per cent who were going on to university, and to recognize the needs of the 94 per cent who would go directly to the labour force or would want something other than a university as a post-secondary higher education. It was designed to cope with the inflexibility and the inadequacies of an educational system that resulted in an incredible waste familiarly known as the drop-outs in our educational system. And it has undoubtedly had some effect in coping with that problem. It established three streams, each stream having a course that would go through grade 13 to the normal higher education at the university, and each stream having a course that would go to grade 12 and then would lead to the vocational centres or the institutes of technology.

The important point, here, Mr. Chairman, is that this came a generation late—at least a generation late. There is growing evidence—and this is the rather disturbing thing as one takes a look at it today in depth—that we may, because we were so late in instituting the Robarts plan in the province of Ontario, be instituting something which, the experts consider, was to some degree out of date even before we got to the point of implementing it. I am referring to the amount of discussion that is going on now in educational circles with regard to questioning the wisdom of the early streaming of young people. We all know, for example, that in Great Britain the 11-plus examination, which has been accepted almost as the traditional approach to education, has been so seriously questioned that they are very definitely in the process of discarding it. It is interesting if one looks for example, as I did recently, at an article in the New Statesman and Nation of September 11, to some comments about the school system in Sweden. They were comparing the Swedish school system with the British school system, and they were exploring the objectives and the setup of the so-called comprehensive schools in Sweden. Just let me quote two or three brief comments from here:

The schools are forbidden by law to divide or stream their pupils according to ability—and this is a point I want to come back to in a moment in another context:

Each class has a range of ability and only in the final year is there any form of streaming. Even then it is on the basis of the child's own choice.

A little later:

In the final year the work is organized on a different basis, for the pupils are then divided into as many as five theoretical and four practical streams.

Again a later quote:

But the Swedes are determined to avoid the kind of segregation that operates in this country.

Namely, Britain. And finally:

There is a refreshing emphasis on the need for much more general education and the purpose is deliberately to reduce specialization at all stages for pupils up to the age of 20. It is encouraging to find that employers and trade unionists alike argue the case for broader education, basing their argument on industrial experience. They maintain that any specialized education was quickly rendered obsolete by the speed of technological change.

So here you have in Sweden as in Britain very serious second thoughts about the premature streaming of children. This isn't new. As the Minister commented when he was referring, I think, to the lack of knowledge of history in the United States, "this sounds like home," because we have heard much of this kind of thing from teachers, from parents, from educational experts. They wondered whether it was wise to start streaming in our own secondary schools at the grade 9 level, whether or not you were not cutting off the late bloomers and rushing them into a certain stream of education from which the whole forces so combined that it made it difficult, if not impossible, for them to escape later from that stream.

Then there is a related aspect to which I referred a moment ago. That is the necessity for a new look at our educational system in terms of its apparent crushing of a child's creativity. I was rather interested last fall, to read news reports of that ex-firebrand of the Cabinet, Robert Macaulay, who, when he was speaking to some body in the city here, referred to the great harm that our educational system did to our children. The nub of Mr. Macaulay's comment was summed up in one aspect of the report that was carried in the Toronto Telegram, which quotes Mr. Macaulay as saying:

Our educational system turns alert, curious, attentive, confident, assured, interested children into little people who are afraid, bored, confused and under great tension.

Now, it may be argued that this is to a degree exaggerated, but there is no doubt that there is a disturbing core of truth in it. Parents and educational experts have been puzzled as they examine what happens in an educational system, which results in the tendency to ossify the thinking of a child, to put him into a straitjacket, so that he did not seem to be able to develop in the fashion that is undoubtedly the theoretical objective of our system—that we want to develop the personality and each of the abilities of the child.

When one pursues the thinking along these particular lines—the question that was raised by Mr. Macaulay—I find that my attention as a former schoolteacher, and as a person interested in education from almost every viewpoint except the janitor in the school, I think—

Hon. W. G. Davis (Minister of Education): He is important, too.

Mr. MacDonald: I said, as a person having been interested and involved in approaching education from every angle except that.

Mr. Nixon: That will come later.

Mr. MacDonald: It may come later, yes.

Hon. Mr. Davis: They call them custodians now.

Mr. MacDonald: I recall one year between college when I wheeled cement into the basement of a prospective school at 35 cents an hour, back in the days when they were paying people about the equivalent of what the civil servants' pay is still here in the province of Ontario.

Before we got off on this tangent, I was about to refer to the writings of Mr. Frank Brown, who is the principal of Melbourne high school in Florida. Indeed, Mr. Chairman, maybe this is the appropriate day to discuss Mr. Brown and his ideas, because he happens to be the principal of the school at Cape Kennedy. Most of the children in the school are the children of the people who work around those launching pads that have projected a couple of American astronauts into this rather historic flight today.

Hon. Mr. Davis: This is why you have to be careful looking at that school.

Mr. MacDonald: I grant you that it may well be that you have a group of people who live in something of a world apart, a world that is something in the nature of a van-guard.

But I still agree with the basic contention of Frank Brown, namely that we have our school system in something of a strait-jacket of grades, instead of the phasing that gives an opportunity for a natural development in accordance with the abilities and the interests of a child. I still think this has basic validity. Indeed, Mr. Chairman, it has so much validity that I have learned, by way of a little birdie, that one of the first items put on the agenda of the Hall committee to study the aims and objectives of education is the question of phasing work through schools, rather than grading.

Hon. Mr. Davis: I spent a little time in Melbourne, so I do know about it.

Mr. MacDonald: Very good. I just want to quote, by way of underlining this observation that I am making, Mr. Chairman, two or three comments from an article that was written by Mr. Brown. Undoubtedly it is something of a condensation of a full-length book that he has done on this same topic. In an article that was carried in the Atlantic Monthly of November 1964, he said:

We simply removed all grade barriers and let the school's talented students pursue any course that they were capable of passing, without reference to the grade to which they had been promoted.

Let me pause there, Mr. Chairman. This really is not so revolutionary that it is unknown in our system. This is the kind of thing that obtains in many of our primary grades—the first three—in the province of Ontario. They go at their own pace, and then they tend to get into the regimentation from grades 3 and 4 up. Mr. Brown continued:

The outcome exceeded all expectations. Increasing numbers of students eloquently met the challenge and their parents were enormously pleased. Community approbation was so swift and convincing that in an unbelievably short time the whole process of grouping children into grades had spun out of existence. Once the stumbling block of the grade had been removed we were able to concentrate in earnest on the development of a new brand of education. What we were after was to organize learning on a radically different basis from the conventional plan which classifies youngsters in grades, largely on the basis of age. The idea of grouping students by age into grades has never been more than a poor piece of technology. For this reason the most urgent problem facing education has for a long time been the issue of how to gear the curriculum to what the students actually know, rather than to grades to which they have been promoted. We named this revolutionary new organization a phased rather than a graded curriculum.

The final quotation that I want to give is:

The notion of phasing deposes and refutes both the graded organization and the concept of annual promotion. The purpose is to replace stops and starts with continuous learning and constant advance.

I want to suggest, Mr. Chairman, without going into the detail because we get into technicalities here, that undoubtedly it will be the kind of thing that this high-powered committee—if I may borrow the adjective of the hon. member for Brant, with regard to the Hall committee—is going to be examining. But I suggest that that, combined with the second thoughts about the validity of separating our children into the very bright ones and the somewhat less bright, and down the scale until you get those that are just a stage or so above retarded, creates serious psychological effects on the children in a category that are potential late bloomers. They are licked before they really get to the stage where they can grapple with life's problems. Therefore, you have destined them for the rest of their life to that category. It results sometimes in the most incredible, perhaps irrational, actions on the part of parents, who feel hurt that their children are put in this rather than a higher category.

I was talking a week or two ago with a public school teacher in the metropolitan area. I will not even identify what municipality he comes from. He stated that they have eliminated the grading or this tendency to divide the grades into the various categories according to skills in their schools. Now, this is precisely the kind of thing that is done in Sweden. They simply do not divide their groups there and while I, as a former teacher, recognize the administrative problems this may create within an educational system, I am not so certain that if we can get over the innate conservatism of the teaching profession, we would not be able to work out another administrative system that we could handle without undue difficulties. We would be getting at that basic problem that worries so many thinking people today, and the one that Robert Macaulay, in his inimitable way, dramatized—the tendency of a school system to destroy the creativity and the interest of a child, rather than fulfilling the theoretical objective of a school system, that is to develop his creativity and his personality.

Mr. Chairman, I want to note, in the context of my theme and my text, a few other developments that have taken place, apart from the Robarts plan, and indicate the extent to which they are behind the times in their emergence in the province of Ontario. This, therefore, will underline the extent to which we have got to work to catch up from these years of neglect.

I will not go into the details of the trade school situation. I have talked about this, I suppose, at least a dozen times in the House over the past seven or eight years, and the fact that it was envisaged by Dr. John Seath as the result of a report in the early years of this century. It was envisaged in a statutory sense in the year 1911 and in the succeeding 50 years we built one trade school in the province of Ontario, down on Nassau Street. So that this in itself, underlines that we are 50 years behind the times.

In the past two or three years we have moved to some fulfillment. You have had a breaking-off, so to speak, from the Nassau school into our school of automotive trades, and another one, the name of which escapes me for the moment; I believe that it is under the shadow of Casa Loma. We have a vocational centre in Ottawa, one in London and plans for one in Sault Ste. Marie. I understand from the hon. Minister's statement that we also have plans for one in Hamilton, as well as on the Niagara peninsula.

When you move to the institute of technology, we have had, unquestionably, the development of an institute of technology that is of a high calibre in Ryerson, now off on its own as an independent institution. We also have some seven others scattered across the province of Ontario, but grossly inadequate in terms of meeting the needs of post-secondary education for those who are not going into the liberal arts. We now have, because of the inadequacies of both the trade school development and the institute of technology development, community colleges emerging. As I pointed out on second reading, community colleges are emerging because, once again, there emerged a weakness in the concept of the Robarts plan. The community colleges are designed to fill the gap. It was considered, with the Robarts plan, that when a child went through the stream to grade 12 that if he went to post-secondary education in the institute of technology, his grade 12 would be satisfactory. Or, if he went to the labour force, that degree of education from the high school would be satisfactory. Both of these are proving to be inaccurate—behind the times. Increasingly, our institutes of technology are requiring grade 13; increasingly, our children are finding that they cannot compete in the labour force if they go to work directly from grade 12, that they must have some post-secondary education. So we had to build some sort of a system that would pick up directly from grade 12. And the community college is the answer. The hon. Minister states, almost as if this were planned, that it is going to pick up in 1966 the first graduates under the Robarts plan in the four-year courses. I repeat, this is more by accident than by design. Topsy, in her development, just happened to develop at that right point, in terms of meeting those needs.

However, Mr. Chairman, I come back to a question that I asked the hon. Minister when we were debating this issue on second reading. Perhaps, because he was so pre-occupied with what he thought were the misconceptions of our community arts colleges on the part of the hon. member for Brant or perhaps he was so shaken by the purple passages of the hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Thompson) when he was conjuring up this concept of ivy ghettos as a description of our universities; perhaps he was so shaken by all that, that he did not get around to answering a point in which I am interested. I am going to insist on some comment from him and that is, a rationalization of all of this very varied development at the present time.

The news reports have indicated that it is likely that the first of our community colleges will be built around existing institutes of technology or vocational centres. The question that I asked on second reading and that I repeat here, is: Are we, in effect, forsaking the original concept of a separate system of vocational centres across the whole of the province of Ontario? Are we, in effect, forsaking the original concept of a separate system of institutes of technology across the whole of Ontario, and are we going to wrap it all up in community colleges, which will pick up from post-secondary education or for the upgrading or training of the unemployed or the various other adult education aspects of the community college work?

It seems to me that this is plain commonsense, but the untidiness of the pattern does not end just there. I am interested, for example, in noting in his introductory remarks, that the hon. Minister referred to the new technical educational centre in Hamilton—

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, I might interrupt here. The hon. member for York South unfortunately had to leave the House when I was making that observation in my remarks and I interjected at that point that, in view of the hon. member's comments on the second reading debate of the bill on colleges of the fine arts and technology, there was a real possibility that this new name that was mentioned in my estimate remarks may never come into being. I think that was, roughly, the interjection that I made.

Mr. MacDonald: Well, I draw, perhaps prematurely, the conclusion that my idea that they are all going to be wrapped into one, including the forthcoming technical education centre in Hamilton, is correct. But I will let the hon. Minister have his say and will not try to put words in his mouth.

Let me consider another interesting tag-end in this picture. I refer to the adult education centre, which the hon. member for Brant said he was sure was not thrown into the Riverdale by-election for political purposes—of course, this would never happen with the government on the other side of the House. I could not be persuaded of that, no matter how long you talked, but what I am interested in is why a need as desperate as this adult education centre should be frustrated as long as it has been by the various developments that were spelled out in a Globe and Mail editorial—in terms of finding a site. It now seems to be more or less indefinitely postponed, because they cannot break through the impasse.

However, let that go by. The point that I am interested in at the moment is: Is this an institution which, as an adult education centre, is going to deal with the upgrading of the unemployed? Is it going to be so specialized that it is apart from that aspect of the work that would normally belong to a community college? In other words, this is another tag-end, it seems, we have that to tidy up. The sooner we get it tidied up the sooner we will lay at rest a lot of unnecessary doubts and questions that are being asked as to what exactly is the direction in which we are going with regard to these very many aspects of our post-secondary education at the present time.

But with all this, Mr. Chairman, I come back to my basic theme. We are running madly, not only to keep up with the march of time, but even worse, to catch up, because of those years of neglect—basically because we are 50 years behind the times, particularly in this field of technical education which was so neglected by The Department of Education in this province up to the years 1959 and 1960.

Mr. Chairman, I want to turn, in the next portion of my remarks to deal with the five programmes that have been mapped out to cope with technical and upgrading education of recent years—the joint programmes with the government at Ottawa. I want to analyze them—and this has been touched on in varying degrees in other debates on welfare in the House this year, and the omnibus debates of the Throne and the Budget. But, at the risk of a minor repetition, I think it would be useful in a rather orderly sequence to take a look at each of these programmes, 1 to 5. I do not know whether hon. members are anything like me, but each time I start to think about these programmes, I have to take a moment out to remind myself what exactly is in programme 1 and what exactly is in programme 2. And so for their own guidance I will just briefly remind them of such.

Programme 1 is designed to supply young people in vocational and technical high schools with marketable skills. The federal government contributes 50 per cent of the cost—this is within our secondary school system—

Hon. Mr. Davis: Not of the operating cost.

Mr. MacDonald: Not of the operating cost—50 per cent of the capital cost, right?

Now, Mr. Chairman, the basic point and the basic problem which has emerged here, is an unresolved conflict—although on paper it has been resolved—between the Department of Education and The Department of Labour. I am hoping that some time soon the pleas that have been made to the hon. Prime Minister of this province will be carried beyond writing letters, to the setting out of the theoretical division of responsibilities to bring the various parties together, even if it requires bringing a few heads together and knocking them. As late as last week the situation was unresolved. Let me put it to the House by means of a few quotations in a release from M. J. Fenwick, who incidentally is one of the Hall committee, vice-president of the Ontario federation of labour in charge of educational activities within that body. Last January he said:

A seven-man educational committee of the federation of labour, which is meeting early in February, will be asking—and incidentally, I might interrupt, they did ask:

—Premier Robarts to resolve the apparent jurisdictional feud between two Ontario government departments, education and labour, as to which is promoting vocational studies in industrial training. Unless the Premier acts immediately, this province's reorganized programmes of studies, of which he is the author, the Robarts plan, will fall flat on its face. Industrial training will suffer an equally sordid end.

The federation education committee has received complaints from a number of high school principals that vocational studies in their schools have been rendered useless because the apprenticeship branch of The Department of Labour refuses to recognize skilled time spent in secondary school courses.

Another area of dispute between The Departments of Labour and Education are worker-training programmes. Under joint federal-provincial agreement, The Department of Education is charged with implementing manpower training programmes. The Department of Labour recently announced that it is entering the field of industrial training on a total basis, which incorporates its previous activity of apprenticeship training. These new programmes come under the scope of the amended Apprenticeship and Trade Qualifications Act, 1964, and its regulations.

The confusion which has resulted in a number of Ontario schools in the precarious position in which all of the vocational education has been thrown by the action of the labour department has made it imperative that the Premier intervene.

Because, as they point out, and this is my final quotation from Mr. Fenwick's release:

Now Mr. Rowntree announces in his blueprint for The Department of Labour, among other items, "new and flexible on-the-job training programmes to meet industry's current and projected needs for skilled workers."

Now, Mr. Chairman, this apparently did come to the ear of the hon. Prime Minister, and the hon. Prime Minister replied in a letter to Mr. Fenwick on March 16, 1965. The hon. Prime Minister stated in his letter:

As you were aware, the apprenticeship training system has been operated for many years jointly by the two departments. The Department of Labour has been responsible for that portion of the training programme carried out on the job in the normal work setting. The Department of Education, through the trade schools, has provided the associated or supplementary class instruction in the theoretical foundations of the trades. Essentially this same division will now be carried forward into shorter term and more specific training programmes that are operated under programme 4 and other allied provisions of the federal-provincial agreement.

In other words, The Department of Labour will be responsible for all aspects of the implementation and operation of training programmes undertaken on the job and designed to develop specific skills related to specific employment. The Department of Education will be responsible for all other forms of training.

An interdepartmental committee consisting of senior representatives of both departments will be established to act as a channel of communication between the two departments to jointly determine training needs and prescribed methods of satisfying them and to co-ordinate the promotion, developmental and operational activities of both departments, so that training and educational programmes will tie in with each other at all levels.

Now I will cease the quotation from the hon. Prime Minister's letter at that point.

I repeat, I was assured that, as a result of a meeting as late as last week, people who are involved—and I will not bother naming them, because this is obviously getting into politics and it may complicate their life—in these training programmes in the city of Toronto say that the situation is unresolved; that there is still, in effect, an effort to pursue this objective at the operational level, if you will, both on The Department of Labour side and The Department of Education. It would seem to me that, while there may be little empires that are being protected and somebody above those who guide the destinies of these little empires have to step in, public welfare dictates that they should step in and resolve these difficulties so that we will not have the unnecessary complications.

Now I go to programme 2, Mr. Chairman, for which the federal government pays 50 per cent of the cost. Is that operation as well as capital? Is it designed to train technicians at the post-secondary level? I think it is accurate to say, Mr. Chairman, that programme 2 has perhaps developed fewer bugs than any of the others.

Hon. Mr. Davis: I think programme 1 really has fewer.

Mr. MacDonald: It is the smaller?

Hon. Mr. Davis: No, it has fewer bugs.

Mr. MacDonald: Fewer bugs in it? Well, it is a matter of judgment, and I will not pursue the point any further. However, what I want to draw attention to, Mr. Chairman, is that we have so much further to go. I was very interested in getting a quick introduction as to exactly what the situation is; to go back to the rather recent and not too out-of-date testimony of the former superintendent of the technological and trade branch, Lorne Johnston, before the select committee on youth last September. On page 234 Mr. Johnston, in discussing the relative position of engineers, technologists, technicians and craftsmen, made this comment, and I am quoting:

On preparing our brief we were discussing what we called the pyramid, which we have talked about many, many times. If you compare our situation in Canada with that of Europe, we find in Europe that the engineers are at the point or pinnacle of the pyramid and, in numbers compared to the other classes, they are relatively few. We have the engineers forming the pinnacle and, we come down the pyramid, we have more technologists; and further down we have more technicians and we have the great broad base of craftsmen.

In Canada, this pyramid is almost inverted. We have a great number of engineers; we have fewer technologists; and, up until the last few years, we had virtually no technicians; and we are right out of skilled craftsmen.

Mr. Chairman, whether one is talking about education or whether one is talking about the requirements for development of a modern economy, to be able to sustain the kind of economic development we have in Canada at the present time—that is a most revealing and disturbing kind of statement, and I am convinced it is strictly accurate. We are—I come back to my theme again—50 years behind the times in terms of the kind of educational system that Dr. John Seath went across and took a look at in Britain and Europe in the year 1908, when he came back and reported to the government; and successive Liberal and Tory governments have done nothing about it for a period of 50 years since.

We are so far behind that we have this sort of basic pyramid of skills, in our society today, absolutely standing on its head. We have a lot of engineers, many of whom are wasting their time and their skills at jobs that should be handled by a technologist or even a technician. We have inadequate technologists; we have inadequate technicians; we are only getting around to training them now; and we have a situation in terms of the number of craftsmen—

Hon. Mr. Davis: The hon. member means an inadequate supply.

Mr. MacDonald: Yes, an inadequate supply of them. And we are now facing the situation, as far as craftsmen are concerned, where we have run out of them.

That, I think, underlines, if not the inadequacy of programme 2, at least the inadequacy of what we have been able to do within it because of the almost incredible need for development of skilled people.

However, I move to programme 3. This programme, Mr. Chairman, and hon. members of the House, has three objectives: To assist employed persons wishing to upgrade their skills; to help those about to enter employment; to provide training for those individuals wishing to retrain for a change of occupation. This is a programme, Mr. Chairman, which in terms of the numbers involved, is really pathetic. The report at the end of the first year, at the end of March, 1964—and I have not seen up-to-date figures, but I do not think they were that much of an improvement that I am going to misrepresent the figure by quoting the ones from the past year—only 21,000 persons out of a labour force of seven million received training under this section.

Once again, I would like to go back to the testimony of Lorne Johnston before the select committee on youth, to raise a number of questions of the hon. Minister. For example, on page 238, Mr. Johnston was referring to the kind of work that is being done in his department, in trying to identify areas in which they might be able to develop courses. He referred to the fact that they have approached the contractors association and that they had worked out, and were presumably initiating last September—at the beginning of this academic year classes in Ottawa; on Nassau Street here in Toronto; and in London—some 20 in each of these, and he said:

We are striving at all times to identify new areas such as these where we can be of service in training a technician.

I will leave my comment with regard to the fact that there is only one man involved in trying to discover where these courses might be designated, so that they could develop them and introduce them in the system, until a little later. But I was curious with reference to programme 3, and its overall inadequacies in terms of numbers, to have an up-to-date report from the hon. Minister as to what has happened, for example, in that course that was worked out with the contractors association; or any others that may have emerged in the last six or eight months.

Now, Mr. Chairman, on programme 4. This is the programme that is, in its own way, perhaps most exciting, but it is like the story of public housing in Ontario. For years we took a look at the public housing in Toronto and this was symbolized as an example of public housing through the whole country. It was a monument to what had not been done, really, rather than a monument to what had been done. In programme 4 I think we have the same kind of a story, with reference to the so-called leap programme—the upgrading of skills by in-plant training within the province of Ontario. This has been one that industry has not been persuaded to tackle with any great degree of vigour. As I recall the testimony of Mr. Johnston, he stated that there were cases that were emerging in two or three other parts of the province, and that would presumably be in operation by now. Indeed, he referred to one in eastern Ontario, one in northern Ontario and one in western Ontario. I am wondering if the hon. Minister could report to us exactly what has happened in terms of being able to chart a course and to get industry to act on a greater degree of in-plant training.

Moving on now to programme 5, and the retraining of the unemployed, which is basically the objective of programme 5: This is something that has been discussed so often in the House, in terms of the incredible number of people who drop out, so that maybe only half of those who enter the course ultimately graduate. It is rather an encouraging record in terms of the percentage of those who get jobs when they do graduate. I think a figure as high as 84 per cent, has been quoted. But the limited numbers in the first instance—indeed, in the first year, the number was something like 36,000 for the whole of Canada; only 10 per cent of the unemployed, and of that 36,000, more than half of them, dropped out. We still have a long way to go in terms of making that an effective kind of programme.

The general observation, I think, Mr. Chairman, that flows from all of this, is the vigour and the imagination with which we are pursuing the development of these programmes. Here again I want to come back to what strikes me as being the nub of the whole issue, the testimony before the committee in which some of the hon. members of the House were putting their fingers on the weak spots. I am quoting now from page 254 of the testimony before the select committee on youth, last September. The hon. member for Scarborough North (Mr. Wells) was testifying:

Have you ever thought in your department that anything can be done like this? As we all know, in this field there are a great number of school boards who move in and decide what courses they are going to have. Everybody uses his own yardstick and thinks up what is needed. I think this is where we are missing the mark. Is there any central person or organization in your department who could act as the vocational research department to provide for the whole province some guide posts, where they should be going and what type of things they should be giving? Does anybody research all the various fields and find out? We are crazy to be building shops because even in this field there is no chance of half of them getting into apprenticeship. School boards would have to have this information available and show them what the trends are.

Mr. Johnston: There is very little of that being done at the present time. There may be some that may develop.

Mr. Wells: Is this not the logical thing?

Mr. Johnston: Very definitely.

The Chairman (the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Apps)): We should ask Mr. Johnston what influence your department has, what liaison your department has in influencing the vocational schools.

Mr. Johnston: We have complete influence and control over the vocational schools, institutes of trades and institutes of technology. In the secondary school level, very little, because it comes under the superintendent of secondary education.

So here you have this division right within The Department of Education, where a great deal of this training is taking place, not under the superintendent of technology and trades branch, but under the department of secondary education.

Then the hon. member for Scarborough Centre (Mr. Peck) intervened:

Just to pursue what Mr. Wells has said, there is something that bothers me. Since the federal-provincial training programme came into effect, Mr. Wells said, certain school boards decide they are going to build a vocational school and the officials draw up various courses that they feel should go into this school, and it will be given to the advisory vocational committee and eventually to the board, and kicked back and forth. Somebody on the board in the particular industry would say, "I think we need a course in chemistry." I am using the example of what happened in one of the schools in Scarborough. This course is set up. It seems to me, these courses are set up in relation to what is needed in industry. This would have to be a provincial organization on which The Department of Education and vocational people and industry can sit down at various times and try to assess what the needs are. We do not like to see this classic example—I think in Cornwall, the retraining programme was started, and they picked up unemployed welders and trained 12 welders, and when the course was finished they had 13 unemployed welders in Cornwall. This is a classic example. I am sure it has happened over and over again.

To be fair, Mr. Chairman, Mr. Johnston intervened later and said that this got national coverage but it had never happened in Cornwall, but I think Mr. Peck's point is valid, that this kind of thing has been happening. Mr. Peck continued:

How many bricklayers are needed? We have a course in school for bricklaying. How many carpenters are needed? I don't think there is any attempt to assess these in terms of what industry needs. We may be getting further into technology, I do not know what the right phrase is, people are needed to service these machines which are coming in, but there does not seem to be any attempt from anybody to try and tie down these various trades in how they can work out through our school programme.

Now, a little later, Mr. Peck picks up again:

I am not picking out welding or any particular trade. I am talking about the overall concept of training youngsters or maybe older people, to fit in where they are needed, and the training to be of value so that they can fit directly into the job, or further on-the-job training which can be done in conjunction with industry in which they could easily fit into one of these jobs. There are so many openings and so much unemployment on the one hand, and it seems to me that there must be some way that industry and educational people can pull together and decide what is needed.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this is the nub of it.

Mr. Johnston: I agree with you. We have done a fair bit along this line. We have had an extensive survey done which became available to us within the last couple of months. This was a survey on a national basis which attempts to predict the needs in various trades in the coming years. We have developed a very close liaison with the Canadian manufacturers association. I agree with what you are saying wholeheartedly. There are problems in that it appears difficult for industry to tell us their exact needs five or 10 years from now.

Then later in the same sequence of that debate, the hon. member for Nipissing (Mr. Troy) intervened and said:

Have you any research people in your branch?

Now, after the whole point has been made, surely this is the nub of it. Here we are going to find out what we need, we are going to get to the answers instead of wandering around in the dark on this manpower problem.

Have you any research people in your branch?

Mr. Johnston: I have one man whose job it is to try to cover this area and who is in contact with business and industry. One man cannot do it.

For the whole of the province of Ontario. Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not know why we need to go on any longer. At the provincial level, if we cannot get an adequate coping of this problem at the federal level—and I will concede to the hon. Minister of Labour (Mr. Rowntree) that they have been wandering around in the dark at the federal level on the issue, but here we are responsible for the educational systems. We are responsible for implementing programmes 1 to 5; we are responsible for the vocational centres and the institutes of technology, and it is surely little short of ludicrous that there should be so much validity in the wondering as to whether or not we are not teaching obsolete trades; whether or not we are not spending tens of million of dollars on buildings that are inadequate, in terms of that rather delightfully entitled article that June Callwood did, in which the Jackson quote was: "Tomorrow is here and we are all set for yesterday"—an article in Maclean's magazine on January 23 of this year.

It is really worrying and absurd; we must get down to the answering of these questions, and no one man—if he were Solomon and all of Solomon's superiors rolled into one—no one man is going to be able to get all the answers.

A start was made by the committee that was headed by the hon. Minister of Energy and Resources Management (Mr. Simonett) that looked into manpower, but this is a continuing need. I cannot understand, in a department where there has been an encouraging degree of imagination in coping with the problems in trying to catch up with these years of neglect—when you face an age when catching up is not good enough, because the times are rushing ahead of you once again—why there is not a willingness to tackle this problem by getting a whole coterie of people to work on it. Get a dozen—15, 20 or 25—it will be far better to spend the money on getting the necessary force to be able to get the answers to these questions instead of wandering around in the dark as we have been up to the present time.

That brings me to a comment on the Hall committee. I am not going to repeat the observations of the hon. member for Brant; I think that most of the questions he put to the hon. Minister are particularly valid. I have some big question marks in my mind as to what was the original concept of the committee's approach—not the committee, because the objective is clear. It is to clarify the aims and objectives of education.

For example, I think, on the basis of what has happened up until now, that the hon. member for Brant is going to be disappointed if he thinks that this committee can come up with anything like a report of the proportions of the Hall committee report on medical insurance. That committee had a large staff that worked for years. Indeed, according to reports I have been able to get in bits and pieces—it is not public information—of the early meetings of the Hall committee, I almost got the impression that the chairman thought they were going to have a few discussions and they would conclude the activities this fall. But only slowly has he realized the proportions of the task into which he was lured, if I may use the term, by the government.

Mr. Nixon: How do you know? That is very interesting. Have you got the hon. Minister's office bugged?

Mr. MacDonald: Do not ask me how I know, but I can assure you that what I am stating is authoritative.

Mr. Nixon: I do not know whether that is good enough or not.

Mr. MacDonald: You will just have to accept my word for it. Under the rules of this House you cannot impute motives to me, nor dispute my word.

Mr. Chairman, I think the committee met once for an organizational meeting, and for a dinner that the hon. Minister gave them back in April when it was set up. They met again early this month and set up an agenda. They are now going to solicit briefs, and these briefs will be in—or at least an indication of the briefs—by the first of July. They will hear the briefs this fall and next year.

I am 100 per cent in support of the kind of study in depth by a committee that is starting out in the area from the kindergarten to grade 6, but has to examine the whole scope of our educational system, ultimately. I just have these reservations, when I have reason to believe that the chairman had no idea of the proportions of the job that he was taking on, and whether he has the time, or ultimately the interest, to pursue this in the fashion that undoubtedly he could pursue it, as he did in Medicare for two, three, four or even five years. At the moment it is kindergarten to grade 6—what is it going to be when he gets into the secondary and into the aims and objectives of post-secondary education?

In other words, this is a very good thing, except that there are many aspects of it on which, until now, the hon. Minister has to give us a bit more detail, and some assurance if it is really going to be a meaningful study.

Mr. Chairman, before I turn from this theme of being 50 years behind the times in our education system, I have one further chapter.

Last fall, as the hon. Prime Minister reminded us in the Medicare debate earlier this week, this government announced a very commendable programme in terms of expanding medical educational facilities. The details of that are known to the House, but what I want to put to the hon. Minister in very forceful terms, is what is being done by him, as the Minister responsible for education in this province, to meet the wide range of personnel needs to implement the public policies—the public assistance policies, if I may use that term—in the province of Ontario? For years we have had the hon. Minister of Public Welfare (Mr. Cecile), the hon. Minister of Health (Mr. Dymond) and the hon. Minister of Reform Institutions (Mr. Grossman) rise in this House and outline very important and desirable programmes within their departments. When we really put them to the test, their answer has been that they simply cannot get personnel at the top professional level, or at the various technologists' or technicians' level, to be able to back up the professionals.

Some day, it seems to me, this government has to quit making excuses and they have to tackle at the training level, and at the educational level, the turning out of adequate people to meet their own needs. Obviously, you cannot do it without meeting the needs of the whole of society because, generally speaking, your salary levels are less, therefore you are going to have a little difficulty in attracting your share of them.

We have rudimentary retraining programmes in some of the departments. There is a retraining programme, for example, in reform institutions—rather, a training programme. But it is not a very efficient kind of thing, in terms of the overall system, because there is a high degree of wastage. The people are leaving The Department of Reform Institutions in considerable proportions because of the general dissatisfaction with both the conditions of the work and, in many instances, the nature of the work.

We have some in-training in The Department of Public Welfare, and in The Department of Health there have been some minor approaches in terms of child care, but this is only toying with a desperate need. The government, through its various Ministers, has proclaimed this need. Everybody in society who is trying to implement these programmes has been emphasizing the desperate shortage of people. So my question to the hon. Minister is: What is he doing? Is he sitting down with the hon. Ministers that I have mentioned as a start, as he presumably sat down with the hon. Prime Minister and the hon. Minister of Health after the Hall commission had done the job for him and pointed out exactly what should be done? It presented them with a recommendation; you accepted the recommendation, and have implemented it.

Hon. Mr. Davis: The university affairs committee is working on it.

Mr. MacDonald: Fine. What committee is working on the other aspects of it? This is my point, and I would like the hon. Minister to address himself to it. After he has made some comments, my colleague, the hon. member for Scarborough West (Mr. S. Lewis) will undoubtedly return to this topic, because it is one that he is extremely interested in; it is raised in conjunction with the departments in which he has the lead-off responsibility in our group.

Now I turn, Mr. Chairman, to two or three other aspects of the educational system, and the hon. Minister's introductory remarks, not necessarily related to my theme of being 50 years behind the times. I do not know whether the first one is related to it or not, because I want to say a word or so about the question of religious education in our schools. The hon. Minister has announced that he has appointed a committee that is going to be headed by Keiller Mackay, who is so well known to all hon. members of the House. This committee is going to look into this very controversial issue and bring him a report. The hon. Minister has said that he thought it was wise to wait for the considered views of this report rather than jumping in with action that might be premature and be divisive, along with all the other divisive forces within this question at the moment.

Generally speaking, I am willing to go along with the programme that the hon. Minister has indicated. I think we might as well face the fact that the province of Ontario got off on an experiment in 1944, the results of which have become increasingly a matter of dispute and soul-searching among a growing proportion of our population. There is no other jurisdiction in the North American continent that has religious education in the schools in the fashion we have in the province of Ontario, with the exception of the province of Quebec, in its rather unique situation of two school systems, and the province of Newfoundland, whose school systems are almost completely within the religious framework. Certainly they were in the initial stages.

I think it is also accurate, notwithstanding the comments of some of my hon. friends in the Liberal Party, that this is an issue that cuts across party lines. I would frankly acknowledge, as the hon. Minister pointed out, that when the issue was raised in the House in 1944 and 1945 that the CCF group of the day were divided on the issue; the leader was opposed to it, and some of the members of the group were for it. But I think it cuts across party lines and if that division has not emerged at the caucus level in the Liberal Party, I am glad to find one issue on which there is not a division in their ranks. But I can assure them that it exists in the ranks of their members across the province.

In other words, I hope this is an issue that we can treat in an above-party, non-partisan sense, and, perhaps, putting it in the first instance into the hands of a committee under the chairmanship of Keiller Mackay, is a very good move. I was rather taken with the observations of the hon. Minister on page 42 of the mimeographed portion of his report to us yesterday, where he said on one hand:

Serious doubts are being raised in the minds of our people as to whether the present system of religious instruction should be continued.

And then further, he added:

It is my own impression, however, that the majority of our people would consider it a retrograde step to eliminate entirely from the classroom all subject matter which has to do with character building, ethics, social attitudes, and morals, and I think that would be the consensus of this House.

In my view, it is. I think there is a consensus; indeed, I suspect that a consensus has emerged. When you get to the point, for example, where you have the three Toronto newspapers all seeing eye-to-eye, either a consensus has arrived or the millennium, one or the other, and I think it is the consensus. Underlining it was an editorial in the Toronto Daily Star just a few days ago on May 31, where they pointed to the decision of the Anglican synod of Niagara Falls, where the Star contended that they had taken "a fair-minded and realistic stand on the subject of religious education in the public schools."

The synod approved a resolution calling on the provincial government to establish a course in world religions in the public schools. I do not know the nature of the debate that produced that resolution, or the nature of the thinking, but if I guess it correctly, I think it is essentially the same kind of thinking as was in that paragraph in the hon. Minister's introductory statement where he refers to the consensus in this House—of a support for the proposition that we do not want to ignore completely the study of moral values, and perhaps within the context of studying all of the great religions in the world.

For those who are convinced that the Christian religion is the superior religion in the world, its obvious merits and qualities will become obvious. But we should not impose on any one group, views that will be regarded by the others as unacceptable and, therefore, be accused of proselytizing. In short, Mr. Chairman, I would say to the hon. Minister that, speaking on behalf of our group, we are very clear in our own mind what we think should be done, namely, that we should review and change the decision that was made in 1944 and 1945, but we are willing to abide by the approach that the hon. Minister has accepted of first seeking recommendations from the Mackay committee.

I turn finally, Mr. Chairman, to a series of issues that the hon. Minister dealt with, and which I am going to lump together because I think they are related. The hon. Minister has taken a very commendable interest in developing among the students of the province of Ontario, and indeed the general public, a greater awareness of our history. The fact, for example, that as great a figure—and he is not now a Tory, in the hon. Minister's terms, "he belongs to all the people"—as great a figure as Sir John A. Macdonald should have been neglected so incredibly by everybody including Conservatives in this country until the last two or three years in terms of giving him the kind of annual acclaim on his birthday, as is done, for example, in the United States on Washington's birthday.

That is one of the disturbing things about Canadian history. I would agree with the hon. Minister that sometimes we underestimate our people's knowledge of it, or rather we overestimate their ignorance on this score because everything is relative. As the hon. Minister reported, despite the popular impression, Americans know no more about their own history. I think they can be pretty abysmally ignorant in the mass of their history, just as most Canadians are of theirs.

The hon. Minister referred, for example, to the St. Catharines project. I would say that one of the booklets that came to my desk had a magnificent little set of rather small pictures of the first Parliament buildings in Ontario in the various stages of the development of our Parliament. To whom-ever is responsible for making that available, particularly because it was free, I express my deep appreciation. I am going to spend a little money, and have them framed, because I think this is a magnificent vignette of history, set forth in the development of the series of Parliament buildings that we have had in the province of Ontario.

In the course of his remarks, however, the hon. Minister referred to Premier Lesage's speech in this House in which he emphasized the horizontal relationship among the provinces, urging the consideration of common problems and mutual interests. In line with that thought the hon. Minister announced that he has invited Quebec's Minister of Education, the Honourable Paul Gerin-Lajoie and his senior officials, to spend a few days in Ontario for a full exchange of views on what the hon. Minister described as "important new developments in education in our two provinces." Once again I want to express enthusiastic support for this kind of a move.

I have dwelt at considerable length in my Throne speech, last year and this year, with certain aspects of the history of French-English relations, and the relations of Quebec and Ontario as the whole core of the development of this nation. It seems to me that the hon. Minister's move in accepting the challenge of Premier Lesage in developing these horizontal relationships, is one that we should have taken up much earlier and some rather great advantages may have developed from it. Tied in with this are developments in Ontario, and this is where I think many of these things are related.

During the past year the hon. Minister has appointed a director of French instruction. As a result of development and the added incentive that this man has been able to add to the work, there has been a significant increase in the number of children in classes that are learning French at the elementary school level in the province of Ontario. In the last year there has been a significant increase and we have now got to a figure of approximately 140,000. However, let us face it, Mr. Chairman, 140,000 is approximately 10 or 11 per cent of the children in our secondary schools, so we have a great distance to go.

I raise the question, indeed it was intimated following Mr. Bennett-Alder's French classes at the federation convention, that the hon. Minister was considering establishing the teaching of French on a compulsory basis in our elementary school systems, starting at one level or another. I am wondering if the hon. Minister feels that he can be rather frank in the secrecy of this Chamber, telling us what his own thinking is on this matter. I raise it because I would like to touch for a moment on the Georgetown episode of a week or so ago.

I want to touch on it because I was rather puzzled, disturbed and on the odd occasion, encouraged by the thoughts on this issue, by the editor of the Oakville Journal Record—with which the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Kerr) is undoubtedly thoroughly familiar. Indeed I think I may be thoroughly familiar with some of the people on that paper. I believe that “import” they brought in to run against me in York South last time writes for it periodically. He has had a lot of time to write on it since the election.

An hon. member: You are still alive though.

Mr. MacDonald: I am still alive and I hope he is too, he is a good fellow, but politically very misguided.

Let me, Mr. Chairman, quote one or two observations in an editorial on May 13 from the Oakville Journal Record. They are speaking in the context of how regretful it is that the parents of these children at Georgetown had got their children involved in this rather nasty squabble and exposed them to all these divisive forces.

The great wrong committed by the French-Canadian parents of Georgetown is involving children. But let us give the children a chance. Let us give them a solid grounding in the history and the make-up of Canada. Let us teach them the roles the two founding races played in this country's development. Most of all, let us encourage them to accept Canada as a bilingual country, thereby encouraging them to understand the problems which will result from a dual personality.

Now the first thing that puzzled me is accepting what is written there, and I would accept it; it would seem to flow from that set of objectives that one would be an enthusiastic supporter of the proposition of bilingual schools. Therefore one would not be opposed to the extent that the editor later indicated he was, to the Georgetown parents' rather determined stand—because the fact of the matter is that the French-Canadians are making a determined stand today because there simply has not been an acceptance of bilingualism in our country. The latter part of this editorial reads:

What was displayed in Georgetown this week was not give and take, it was another display of stubborn selfishness on the part of a minority group putting the interests of itself ahead of those of even its children, while at the same time putting itself at odds with those who have already come half way. Such displays are a shabby show of ignorance, the type of ignorance which right now has a nation with great potential in hot water, the type of ignorance we hope will not plague the upcoming generation upon which will fall the burden of keeping Canada together and keeping it happy.

Now if I may borrow the hon. Minister's phrase with reference to the “ivy ghetto” comment about our universities on the part of the hon. leader of the Opposition, I would say that editorial was rather unfortunately put. This action by the Georgetown parents surely is not ignorance of Canadian history—rather, it reflects an appreciation of it. But the confusion—and now I come back to the hon. Minister's part in this on the question of making French teaching compulsory—is resolved a bit in a subsequent editorial the following day. This is what the editor had to say:

The Department of Education has paid lip service to bilingualism in Ontario. It has permitted some schools, Holy Cross being one, to establish classes in French elementary grades, but so far has refused to make the language a compulsory subject or introduce a universal programme for teaching it in grade school.

There is little evidence that The Department of Education has shown the idea of making French a part of the standard grade school programme any more than wholesale neglect. This, although Premier John Robarts himself has called for “the promotion and expansion of the use of both French and English in every part of Canada.”

Despite the overwhelming evidence, in support of grade school French teaching, The Department of Education has consistently, over the years, stayed away from officially establishing it in elementary curriculum.

One would conclude, perhaps with a minor reservation of uncertainty, that the editorial writer is in favour of French being taught in the schools, and what he is doing is chastising the hon. Minister for adopting a contradictory stand in not making it compulsory through our grade schools while appearing to be on the side of the parents who were seeking to have bilingualism not only throughout the public school grades, but at the kindergarten level, too.

I think the editorial writer has a point as to why the government is hesitant in establishing French as part of our school system—maybe from grade 4 or 5 up—throughout the whole of the elementary level. I think, however, the next step is that we should have bilingual schools where there is an opportunity for them. If you look at statistical table S-103 in the hon. Minister's annual report for 1964, you will find that there are some 30 secondary schools in the province of Ontario with significant numbers of French-speaking students in them. I have discovered, as I looked into the situation, that these schools not only teach French in French—if I may indulge in what may sound like an Irishism, because you can teach French in English and that is what we do throughout most of the province of Ontario—

Hon. Mr. Davis: We refer to it as "français" in French.

Mr. MacDonald: I know. For a while I was deeply puzzled. I studied the head of that table and I had to call somebody in the department to find out what "français" was and I translated it to teaching French in French—

Hon. Mr. Davis: Right!

Mr. MacDonald: —which is more meaningful to me anyway. But if we can teach French in French, maybe we can do as they have done in some schools and teach Latin or history or geography in French. I read a news story just last week that the schools in Cornwall are considering the introduction of history in French in their bilingual classes.

Surely it is just the Canadian way, that in a bilingual country—if we can get the Tories to accept the fact that Canada is a bilingual country, after Davie Fulton underlining it again last night—this is only a fulfilment of the destiny of Canada, and that in the province of Ontario there should be every encouragement. The thing that saddens me with regard to this issue is to find that so many people in the province of Ontario regard teaching of French on almost an anti-racial basis. Their attitude is not that it is good to have a second language; not that it is good culturally; not that it is fulfilment of the destiny of Canada as a bilingual country; but almost the attitude of the southern white towards the negro. It is the English-speaking Canadian, Protestant WASP attitude, if I may put it in the most extreme form, toward the French-Canadians, and surely we can get over this. Indeed, I think we are getting over it, and I would give the hon. Prime Minister and the hon. Minister of Education marks for giving the lead in terms of saying that we should learn to speak French. If the hon. Prime Minister said it will not likely be until his grandchildren's day before we will be able to do so, I feel it is because we are teaching French in English. And I want to come back to that in a moment, because that is the crippling aspect.

However, there is another question I would like to put to the hon. Minister. I am convinced that if you pick Ottawa, Toronto and Sudbury—those to illustrate my point—you could establish bilingual schools in the province of Ontario among English-speaking students. In other words, you could start to develop a school among people who were not French to begin with and who would like to, by the time they got to the secondary school level or at some stage in the school system, get to a position where they would be getting bilingual classes instead of just having bilingual classes among those who are French. Because the interesting thing is, if we are going to accept bilingual classes as only being those which started out with French, we are still operating on the old concept of bilingualism—it is all right for the French-Canadians to learn English, but why do we English have to learn French? I think it is desirable for cultural, national and other reasons that more English-Canadians should learn to speak French.

There are difficulties involved in the realization of this objective, but I come back to the proposition that the hon. Minister has said that he is going to sit down with Gerin-Lajoie and his senior officials and work out some of the problems that have emerged in the educational system. I am presuming to suggest some of the problems that I hope will be discussed. In the course of these meetings undoubtedly one of the first things you are going to have to face up to is the prospect of exchange of teachers, because here is the really crippling problem. You can teach history or geography in French, but the teacher must know history and geography as well as French. We are not going to be able to develop this kind of group of teachers overnight.

I would like to say, Mr. Chairman, that a few months ago—a few weeks ago, as a matter of fact—my counterpart in the province of Quebec, the New Democratic Party leader Robert Cliche, made a speech which has had a very interesting response in the province of Quebec. Indeed, it was so interesting that it even got reported on and carried in the Toronto dailies. His contention was, instead of the province of Quebec being so preoccupied with the right or the desirability of making treaties internationally, why did it not consider the proposition of making "treaties" with other provinces.

In other words, essentially the same thing as this horizontal relationship that the hon. Minister is now pursuing in his meetings with Gerin-Lajoie. He argued, for example, that the roads to Canadian unity do not all lead through Ottawa; many of them may lead through the development of a relationship with the provinces. If you were to sit down and discuss this you might be able to work out with the province of Quebec an exchange of teachers which would make it possible for each province to meet the minority needs or the broader teaching of French in the province of Ontario. Indeed it might have another very salutary effect: Within the province of Quebec today there is a trend—I find a little difficulty at this distance to assess its strength—but a trend towards unilingualism, a reaction on the part of French-Canadians, that, "Oh well, if the rest of Canada is not going to learn French, they are going to be unilingual, fine let us be unilingual." It is an effort to put history in reverse and try to make Quebec become a purely French-language province.

Now this would be very, very regrettable, and it seems to me that one way we could undercut it is by showing evidence of good faith in the establishment of a bilingual country through developing these horizontal relationships—to have the kind of meetings that the hon. Minister is proposing with Gerin-Lajoie, to consider particularly our educational needs and the need for teachers so that we can build greater unity in the nation, through stronger ties between the provinces as well as with the federal government.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, I shall endeavour to reply to some of the issues raised by the hon. members for Brant and for York South. If I neglect to cover them all in the course of my remarks I am sure they will pick them up as we go through the individual votes. I think I should point out that we are in complete agreement with the remarks made by the hon. member for Brant with respect to the place of a teacher within the school system. I would point out to him, though, just speaking generally, in view of his concern—which is our concern, too—as to the number of specialists in the school system, that if he would look carefully at the tables, I think he will find, Mr. Chairman, that actually the number of type A people is not decreasing. He did not take into account the number of certificates, some 460 people who were granted their certificates on the basis of their third summer course. The 191 that are presently in this year's course are really a higher number than were in last year. The number is actually going up. But I would say this, Mr. Chairman, that there still is need and we recognize it, and this is the reason for the provision for the bursaries or scholarships to increase the supply of type A personnel. But I would point out that it is not decreasing; it is in fact increasing.

Mr. Nixon: If the hon. Minister will permit me—in 1958-59, 35 per cent of the candidates for teacher-training were type A and 33 per cent in 1964-65. I must say it is up from last year, but it is down from, let us say, 1958-59.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Oh, it may be down, but it has gone up since last year and the year before; it is on the increase again. Now, dealing with the question, Mr. Chairman, of television. As I understand the remarks of the hon. member for Brant, I am a little disappointed to a degree, because I can recall two or three speeches he has made on the subject, not only in the House, but in several other areas where he suggested that the Minister was perhaps not moving as rapidly as he might in the field of educational television. I can recall—I think it was in this House—when the hon. member suggested that the department move in and establish it. In fact, I think he used the word "government"; the government should move in and establish a provincial network.

I should point out also to the hon. member that we have had a committee studying educational TV; they have made a report to me, there were personnel on it, as I recall, from the CBC, CFTO, the teachers' federation and many other interested groups, and we have followed in what I think is a very general and specific way the recommendations that were presented to me as to the establishment of educational television within the department. Now, one area in which there has been no departure from their recommendations because there were not any specific recommendations, is on the question of the licence and I would have to say this, Mr. Chairman, that really the application by the department for a licence is an attempt to move TV along the road with as much rapidity as possible to bring some order into the situation, and also to deal with a situation that potentially concerns a very expensive medium as far as instruction is concerned. It is an effort to co-ordinate the activities and, quite frankly, to centralize them. I am familiar with the article that the hon. member read; it was really a newsletter giving the opinion of one of the personnel. I do not think it represents necessarily the feeling of the board. There is some concern here that the control be in the—

Interjection by an hon. member.

Mr. Davis: Yes. There would be some control in the department, but I should point out that there are some 22 state departments or local boards holding licences and I do not think you can draw any parallel with the United States.

There are a number held by school boards or state agencies within that jurisdiction and, of course, there are licences held by colleges and by universities. Really, I think, Mr. Chairman, you can draw a parallel between the approval and the issuance of textbooks and the material that is being transmitted or will be transmitted by television. Actually, one of the recommendations from the personnel from META on this Minister's committee was that any programme that is transmitted would be approved by the department. I think, really, this is an issue that can be determined as we progress.

We are starting out in a field and, while we are behind, one might argue that if you study other jurisdictions you will find that there are many problems facing them still in the field of educational television. You refer to the one from North Carolina, and, as the hon. member pointed out, this is a state-controlled system. It is one of the more effective systems in the United States and yet they still will admit, I think, that they have a long way to go. I say to the hon. members of the House, Mr. Chairman, that this is our approach. We expect it will alter and change as conditions vary but we think that this is the best way to get the ETV programme in this province off the ground.

I do not think there is any need to comment on the views of the hon. member on the question of history. I think we share these views. I would go back to the teachers for just a moment. I do not have the exact figures in front of me but the statistics on teachers' salaries can be interpreted in many ways.

Actually, if you break them down and you take the 1962-63 or even the 1963-64 figures,

I think it will be found that we are behind Alberta and BC in the elementary schedules. I think part of this, quite frankly, can be traced to the separate school situation that has existed.

The salaries in the separate school system have been less than in the public school system in Ontario. I think this has been substantially rectified within the last year, but nonetheless we may be slightly less. There are a number of teachers in the separate school system who do not receive an honorarium, though I cannot tell you whether these figures take this into account. But at the secondary level—

Mr. Nixon: They may be rated as zero?

Hon. Mr. Davis: On this I am not sure, but I can tell you that at the secondary level the average salary here in Ontario is in the neighbourhood of $7,400 to $7,600, whereas in British Columbia and Alberta it is $6,900 and $6,500, so that the average secondary school teacher in Ontario is receiving a salary, I think, substantially in excess of that in the two western provinces. There is one other reason, I think, which may be altered here as time goes on, why the salaries for elementary teachers may be higher in our two sister provinces. It could relate to the fact that they are paid equal remuneration out there on the basis of equal qualification, and many of their elementary teachers go through their faculties of education and come out with the same degree, perhaps, as the secondary people. This, I think, could perhaps account for some of the figures to which my hon. friend refers.

Dealing with the grade 13 committee report, Mr. Chairman. This is a very basic document. It is perhaps a very fundamental one and relates to our whole structure of education for this province. There are many matters that relate to it—the community college programme; perhaps, to a degree, the university programme—many factors are involved in the eventual conclusion of the grade 13 committee report.

The initial report recommended certain changes that were implemented for this present year, changes which I think were welcomed by most people. I am sure they would have been welcomed by the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville (Mr. Newman), because we have not gone to the full extent of marking the papers locally, or doing it on the basis of the principal's recommendations. But this year 25 per cent will be so marked, that is 25 per cent of the mark will be allocated on the basis of the term work.

The initial report did recommend consideration of the general and advanced levels. A committee was established with representatives from the universities to consider this general proposition. While there has been some discussion recently in the press as to the university's reaction, I think when the committee stated to me in the report that the principle of a general and an advanced level was generally acceptable, they did this with every justification. The presidents of universities had had the initial grade 13 report and my understanding was, at least until the past few weeks, that there had been no opposition to the principle of a general and advanced scheme. I think where the difficulty is coming, if there is to be difficulty, is in the number of subjects to be taught at the general and advanced level. This is why we have distributed this report rather widely, and we have postponed the experimental stage until next year to give an opportunity to develop curricula and to have further discussions with the universities.

I think I should, in fairness, point out, Mr. Chairman, that our responsibility must be with the students who are going through the secondary school system. In most other jurisdictions the admission requirements to universities are established by the universities, usually through the college entrance board. As for the rest of the school system, the state system, the graduation requirements or the curriculum, and the number of subjects in the curriculum of the secondary school are left to the state authorities.

I would like in this province to work closely with the universities because I think there is an obvious relationship. This is what we intend to do. My reaction to date is that there may be some areas of debate—I am sure there will be—on the specifics of a general and advanced level. But I think that the principle of having two levels for grade 13, or what may be eventually grade 12, has had fairly wide approval.

Certainly at an informal meeting, all the directors who, I guess, administer on behalf of boards covering three-quarters or certainly two-thirds of the secondary school students, were unanimously in favour of this approach to the final year of our secondary school programme. But we are having further discussions and we are making a very careful analysis. If the hon. member thinks the report itself is not complete in detail—it is a general report—I can assure the hon. member that there was a lot of detail work in material that went into it that has not, of course, all been published.

Perhaps I can deal with the references of both the hon. members to Justice Hall's committee. The committee has had two meetings; it plans three or four meetings for the fall. The purpose initially was to deal with grades 1 to 6. I must confess that I am to a degree responsible for the thought of the establishment of this committee, because I feel very strongly that in some way, Mr. Chairman, we should be identifying the aims, objectives and the philosophy of education. I am not at all surprised if some of the hon. members are now realizing the task is going to be a very large one. I do not know whether this came as any great surprise to Mr. Justice Hall or not, but I can assure the hon. members that he now realizes this is a big job. And I think it is going to be a big job for the whole committee. To me it is a very important project, and I think that if—

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Chairman, might I ask the hon. Minister if the comments of the hon. member for York South about his information concerning the committee were essentially correct?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, I could not say. I assume that the hon. member for York South has been chatting with some member of the committee who himself might not have known the full extent or the great depth of this problem. This I could not say, but I say from my standpoint that we recognize the overall scope of this and that it will be a very large task, and one that will take some time.

Mr. Nixon: Is "we" the hon. Minister and the chairman?

Hon. Mr. Davis: When I say "we" I mean myself and the department.

Dealing with the adult education centre, perhaps this is related to the arguments raised about programmes 1, 2, 3, 4 and 5, but I had better deal with this specifically. I notice the editorial in the Globe and Mail which was suggesting there were some political motives here. I can only assure you, Mr. Chairman, that the request to attend the graduation of the Jones Avenue school came to me long before the by-election in Riverdale was announced. I accepted this invitation to attend this graduation ceremony; this was their class at the Jones Avenue school of the retrained people. I indicated to the officials of the department—I am giving a little history here—that when I attended this graduation I would like to be in a position to announce a decision as to whether we would get in the field of adult education in a formal and specific way. This decision was announced some time in September.

There has been some discussion about site. Mr. Chairman, we have not as yet selected a site, although there are two or three areas that are presently under consideration. In case my hon. friends opposite are concerned, I can tell them that we have had personnel from the department visiting Vancouver, Denver, California, and three or four other centres, gathering information. We have accomplished some of the specific planning. We had many discussions with the Toronto board of education; I can assure the hon. members there is no intention of delaying this development whatsoever, although I would have to say, and I think I indicated this in my remarks on the colleges of applied arts and technology, it is conceivable as this programme is developed that this adult education centre—I would have to be frank about this—may form part of a college of applied arts and technology, with one faculty of it here in the Metro area. I would not preclude this possibility, but at the present time our arrangements are with the city of Toronto board to administer this school for us. As I say, this could alter as the centre itself materializes.

I am sure I have missed two or three of the points of the hon. member for Brant, but he will have to remind me of them as we go along through the estimates. Of course, I am not unfamiliar with the article which the hon. member for York South referred to in Maclean's magazine. I was somewhat instrumental in arranging the meeting with Dr. Jackson and the young lady who wrote the article. She also interviewed two or three other people on the staff and I think, generally speaking, it was an article that was rather worthwhile.

I should point out it did not appear in print and I cannot find any record of it, but Dr. Jackson did make a reference, and I am glad that the hon. member for York South has as much confidence in Dr. Jackson as I have. He observed that some four or five years ago we were 100 years behind. He was not referring to Ontario; he was referring to education generally in the western world. He had some very provocative and good thoughts about the direction in which we should be moving as time goes on. So if we make as much progress over the next five years, Mr. Chairman, as we have made in the past five years, perhaps we may catch up, at least in Dr. Jackson's own figuring. This leads me to the question of the Robarts plan, and the principle of streaming, the question of being out of date, and some comparison to what is happening in Sweden and Great Britain.

Mr. Chairman, it is very difficult to make comparisons with other jurisdictions. I hesitate to do it, particularly within our own country, because comparisons are sometimes misleading. I would only say that I do not think that we are making the mistake here in Ontario in having the streaming of youngsters so long as we maintain a high vocational-academic ratio, which we are doing—50 per cent wholly vocational and technical areas. I think the prime purpose behind secondary education today must be to make the student as adaptable or as flexible in his approach to education as possible.

I should also point out to you that, in my view, at least, many of these youngsters would not be in our school system today if it were not for the Robarts plan, and you will find this in Great Britain. If you check the number or percentage of students in Great Britain, say, in the age group from 14 to 16 or 17, you will find that it is substantially less than it is here in the province of Ontario. You will find, I am sure, that one of the reasons that many of these youngsters have remained within the system is because they found there a course that has some appeal to them.

I had the pleasure of attending the state superintendents' meeting just before Christmas in the United States. These are gentlemen comparable to Ministers of Education, except that 50 per cent of them have the good fortune, or misfortune, of being appointed by the governor rather than being elected. These gentlemen were discussing this whole question of vocational education. The director of the Chicago board was here some time in January, as I recall. Mr. Willis, when he was referring to the need for vocational education in the United States where traditional background has been primarily academic—and I had the pleasure of listening to Dr. Conant, who has done something of a full cycle in this regard—was making, I think, a very strong statement to the state superintendents in favour of what they call the comprehensive high school—we call it the composite high school—and this is coming from the federal aid.

It will be made available under an agreement, not dissimilar to the one we have with the federal government here in Ontario. I do not like to make statements about other school systems, but I think you will find there will be a tendency in many jurisdictions south of the border to move into the technological or technical area within their secondary school programme. Those people who had the pleasure of visiting California to view the community college situation there, will recall, I am sure, that traditionally this was an academic situation that has moved now into the area of technician and technological training. Many of the people there who were responsible raised the point with me that it is difficult for us to deal with these students at this level because they have had no vocational or technical experience at the secondary level.

So, Mr. Chairman, there are a lot of unanswered questions in this regard. I do not ignore this for a moment but I would say, generally speaking, we are moving in the right direction as long as we maintain a very high academic content as far as vocational and technical courses are concerned.

Getting into the area of the community college and its relation to adult education in a broad sense, I stated here on page 12 of my statement, and I will repeat it again:

Our efforts here could, I suppose, be considered also as a co-ordination and culmination of all previous work in this area, a welding into a coherent whole, so to speak, of the parts which have sometimes seemed fragmented and unrelated, so that we have a complete system extending from the kindergarten to the post-graduate level.

I would say, generally speaking, Mr. Chairman, that while the council of regents and others will be asked to direct their specific attention to the relationship of our existing institutions to the new colleges of applied arts and technology, that out of this will come a recognized pattern, or recognized establishment, so there are no tag-ends, as referred to by the hon. member for York South. I would have to point out this one area. I am going to ask the council to look very specifically, for instance, at the position of Ryerson; whether there is a place in our educational system for a single type of technological institute, I do not say approaching MIT, at this stage. Whether this should fit into this pattern, I am not in a position, Mr. Chairman, to tell the House at this time. I think this will require a very careful study.

I have already touched on the question of the possible future position of the adult education centre itself, and I hope that I have indicated to the hon. members that we have moved in the planning of this. We are fitting it out for educational television, because we think, quite frankly, that ETV will have its greatest role initially in the adult field. We think there is great scope here.

As I mentioned in the University Affairs estimates, we have allocated—and the grants will be going very shortly—some three-quarters of a million dollars for ETV at the Scarborough college.

Now I think the hon. member for York South touched on the question of a purported dispute between The Department of Labour and Education, with respect to apprenticeship training. I think he was really referring to programme four, and that is training on the job. This whole question is the subject of a study committee that has been appointed between the two departments and I must point out, Mr. Chairman, this is a new field in this province. The programme in the secondary school has really only been in effect, practically speaking, for three years. I do not pretend to understand some of the intricacies to the question of getting approval from the designated trades, but I do understand that the matter is in the process of resolution. It is not just a question of any jurisdictional argument, but I understand there has to be some co-operation from the trades themselves.

When it comes to the question of programme four, I think the hon. Minister of Labour made a statement to the House that I could only probably repeat; that is, on-the-job skill training to be done by The Department of Labour. The Department of Education is to look after training those within its own institutions—the actual educational aspects. We think this works out very satisfactorily, or will, as the programme develops, so that we can specialize our activities; whereas those in The Department of Labour who are familiar with the skill situations on the job can do their task more effectively.

As far as programme 1 is concerned, this is primarily the secondary school programme, and I would say that it is working effectively. We have, I think, the largest programme in this area of any province in Canada in a percentage way, or any other way that you might prescribe. We are reasonably satisfied with the progress that has been made to date.

The hon. member for York South has raised this whole question of the availability of technicians and technologists and skilled craftsmen, and, Mr. Chairman, I do not stand up in the House here today and say that this is not a problem, or that we have it solved. I think we are moving in the right direction. I think the increasing acceptance and the number of youngsters enrolling in our vocational centres and institutes of technology indicate an acceptance by many of the public that a technologist, or a technician, has an important part to play in our society today as a man of professional training. This has been one of the traditional barriers, Mr. Chairman, in this province; many parents have insisted that their youngsters enter the professions. I know that the hon. member for Brant has suggested on occasion that the Minister of Education has been overemphasizing technical education. I can recall this in one of his speeches. Mr. Chairman, I do not think this is the case. I think it is a case that, over the years, technical training has been underemphasized in Ontario and we are doing our best to rectify it.

Mr. Nixon: I think your total recall slipped there.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Well, my total recall might have slipped a bit, Mr. Chairman, but I know there was an observation of this nature.

Mr. B. Newman (Windsor-Walkerville): Mr. Chairman, if I may ask the hon. Minister, in the 1964 figures there has been a percentage drop in the number attending the technical schools. In the previous year, in grade 10, there were 40,000 in the academic schools, against 44,000 in the technical schools; and in grade 9 it was 58,000 against 46,000 in the technical schools. There is a percentage drop in there.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Well, Mr. Chairman, it all depends on what one defines as a technical school and what grade level you are moving. I would say we are hoping to strike a rough balance, as this programme develops, of somewhere around 50 per cent in the straight academic and perhaps 50 per cent in the technical-vocational and occupational programmes.

Those tables will not show this accurately for another two years.

Then dealing with programme 4 and programme 5, Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for York South has pointed out that we have had success with one or two pilot projects; the one here in Toronto. We have two others underway and we hope this will extend through industry into other sections of the province. We have had many inquiries from outside our own province as to the success of these projects and we feel, quite frankly, if we can interest industry we must also interest the individuals. I point this out to the hon. member for York South, that the individuals on the jobs themselves have to show a greater interest in the availability of programme 4. I have discussed this with a number of people, and it is unfortunate that there are some people who will not face the fact that they need an upgrading; or will in two or three years' time, and must face it at the eleventh hour, so to speak. I think we can do more, perhaps, to promote the availability of programme 4. I think this is really a better approach, if we can, than through programme 5 area where we are doing it at the eleventh or the twelfth hour.

As far as programme 5 is concerned, once again, I am sure some of the hon. members have had discussions with programme 5 trainees. I would say to you that our percentage enrolment in Ontario is higher than the other provinces but, nonetheless, we do still face some problems. One of the main problems is that we have trainees who, partially through their course, are offered a job opportunity. Perhaps financing is part of it. I think some of them, quite frankly, would prefer to take the immediate opportunity of a job rather than carry on with their course. How this can be resolved, quite frankly, I am not sure, but we have had fairly good success, certainly with the graduates themselves, in that our figure is now approaching the 90 per cent mark as far as employment ratio is concerned.

Mr. Chairman, touching on this question of what can be done to assist the development of those people that are needed not only by government, but by other agencies. This is a very difficult problem, not just from an educational point of view, but from the acceptance point of view by the existing professions, for example in the field of social work. I am going beyond the extent of my own specific knowledge in this area, but will professional social workers accept the idea of having people who have had perhaps a two-year course at Ryerson—where we have a course now for people interested in welfare and for nursing assistants—will they accept these as being a necessary part of an approach to a social work problem or in the field of welfare?

Mr. MacDonald: Will engineers accept technicians?

Hon. Mr. Davis: I think they will; I think they have to.

Mr. S. Lewis (Scarborough West): Mr. Chairman, could I interrupt the hon. Minister to remind him that at the 1964 convention of the Canadian association of social workers, they passed unanimously a resolution endorsing a welfare-worker-career line reflecting exactly that principle. Indeed, they passed a resolution reflecting several career lines requiring even less educational status. The attitude of the profession has obviously altered.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, as I understand it, this has not fully permeated through—and I do not say particularly in this province—but there are still some professional social workers who—

Mr. MacDonald: Do not use it is an excuse.

Hon. Mr. Davis: I am not using it is an excuse because I think this is one of the areas in which the new colleges of applied arts and technology can fulfill a role in this whole paraprofessional—if that is the right term—field. If you will notice in my statement, this is an area that we intend to cover specifically. I think that, as you say, the engineering profession, I would gather, the social workers' profession and other areas, will now be accepting the principle of having technicians—if you want to use this word—or technologists being an integral part of whatever programme they are pursuing. I think you will find that as we develop these programmes at Ryerson on a private project basis, these will become two of the areas—at least, this will become one of the main areas where we can perform some services as far as the colleges of applied arts and technology are concerned.

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): You could have another look at Waterloo Lutheran University.

Hon. Mr. Davis: No, that is not the answer because, Mr. Chairman, we are talking there about a graduate school. I am referring to the vast numbers of people that are needed at this other level.

Now, touching on the question of French—just very briefly, Mr. Chairman—I think there is a distinction, perhaps. They are different problems and I am not sure that the editorial writers in the Oakville papers really covered the difference in problems. One is the question of the bilingual schools. We have a large system and, I think, a good system, of bilingual instruction in the elementary grades in many sections of Ontario. At the Easter convention of the association of bilingual trustees I announced that as soon as books were available and staff was available in the secondary area, the programmes in instruction in French could be extended to Latin, history and geography.

After some discussions with the association—and there is not complete agreement on this—I am sure that most of the educators feel this is a good division of responsibility in the areas of instruction—Latin, history and geography in French, and the math and sciences to be instructed in English—

Mr. MacDonald: But you are now talking about secondary schools.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Yes, this is secondary. In fact, there is some misunderstanding in many people's minds. Most of the elementary programme is almost entirely in French as far as the elementary instruction is concerned. Part of the proposal that we put to the association is an upgrading of the English course in the bilingual elementary schools. They have accepted this and we intend to move into this area to assist these youngsters improve their English in the elementary school system.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, may I ask the hon. Minister how widespread are elementary bilingual schools in southern Ontario?

Hon. Mr. Davis: It all depends on one's definition of southern Ontario; but in eastern Ontario, in Ottawa and the Ottawa Valley, in northern Ontario—and there is one in Georgetown and there are several as I recall it, in the Essex county area; these are generally the areas for bilingual instruction. Instruction in the elementary grades is primarily in French and it gets into secondary where there will be now something of an equal division. We hope through this to have more of the secondary school graduates able to move into our universities and teachers' colleges.

I will be very frank; one of the problems the bilingual system has had is the availability of teachers, because some of the students did not move, perhaps because of language, through the secondary grades to the Ottawa teachers' college. We think that this will now be altered.

I think I should point out, Mr. Chairman, that while, I think, we all agree in principle as to what we should be attempting to achieve as far as bilingual interest is concerned, nonetheless you must realize that many of these youngsters in this province will be working or earning a living in primarily an English-speaking province. We must make a real effort to see that they are properly prepared to take their place, because many youngsters will not work where they went to school. They will have to move from one section of the province to another and, as I pointed out to the association, we might be doing these youngsters a disservice—certainly at this stage—by having an exclusive French instruction programme in the secondary grades.

Mr. MacDonald: Make them genuinely bilingual.

Hon. Mr. Davis: There is a distinction between bilingualism as we understand it and the system established in Quebec. Their English school system is completely in English, and the French system is almost completely in French, whereas in Ontario we have been developing a bilingual system as far as the French-speaking youngsters are concerned.

I should point out, too, Mr. Chairman, that in my statement I did establish the departmental policy for 1966. It is not compulsory and the reason that it is not compulsory, I think, is obvious: We just would not have sufficient qualified staff to make it compulsory. But there will be a provincial curriculum and this is the first time this has been accomplished for grades 7 and 8. Now some people could debate here, and quite successfully, that you could start from an educational viewpoint at the grade 4 or grade 5 level, but we think that to tie it in with the secondary programme, it is essential to start at grades 7 and 8. As the supply of teachers becomes more available and the programme increases, we would move down then from grade 6 to 5 to 4, whatever would be the reasonable starting point.

You will notice from my statement, that we have taken, I think, a very flexible approach to teacher training. The regulations say that a person who has grade 13, or the equivalent, and at the discretion of the Minister, may be certified as far as French instruction is concerned, for French only, if they have fluency in that language. We think, from the response to date, Mr. Chairman, that we will have more than sufficient applicants for the course here in Toronto this summer and that we can develop sufficient teachers to build this programme on a very sound basis. But there is no point in saying that it can be accomplished within one or two years.

This will take time if we want to do it properly and intelligently. I think that the acceptance has now been made and we will have a provincial curriculum in grades 7 and 8, starting in 1966. I, for one, feel that this will go a long way to develop the spirit that I think should exist between the two peoples of this country, and we are very encouraged, quite frankly, by the progress that may be made.

Mr. Newman: Recently the hon. Minister announced the reorganization of the department. Is that reorganization leading to economies?

Hon. Mr. Davis: I wonder if the hon. member would mind repeating his question, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. Newman: Yes. Is the recently announced reorganization of the hon. Minister's department leading to any substantial economies and if so, where?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Well, Mr. Chairman, it is very difficult to say what the economies may be. The final outcome of this reorganization—as I pointed out in my statement, there were three or four basic reasons. One was a philosophical reason, and that is combining or bringing a much closer relationship between elementary and secondary, which I think most educators can accept. The other was to relieve professionals from administrative chores. In this, we think, in the long run there may be a saving. At the same time we feel that our approach may filter down through to the various school boards in Ontario so that we have maybe a board-of-education approach, and we think there will be administrative savings in the long run in this area.

I will be very frank. The costs or the economies were not the prime purpose behind this. There may be limited economic saving in the department by having different types of personnel doing the administrative work rather than having professional educators concerning themselves with grants and so on. But this, I would say, Mr. Chairman, would be a marginal benefit, it was not the prime purpose.

Mr. Newman: Thank you, Mr. Minister.

May we discuss programme 5 under this vote or would that come under some following vote?

Hon. Mr. Davis: I think, Mr. Chairman, that programme 5, if we wish to go into that further, would actually come under the federal-provincial agreement, 512.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Chairman, having to do with the reorganization of the department, I understand that the hon. Minister's executive assistant would be very close to him and not come under the regular organization. But I was wondering about Mr. St. John. Does his office come under the direction of the Deputy or is it, in fact, directly responsible to the Minister?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, there is no hard-and-fast rule as far as this is concerned, because I have stated to Mr. St. John and to the Deputy Minister that I want the Deputy and the Minister to work very closely together. If the Minister is not available, I want the Deputy Minister to feel he has the benefit of Mr. St. John's group and his advice responsible or available to him. If one were to be technical, you might say that the planning and development council was responsible technically to the Minister, but the way it is developing in the department, it will really be responsible to both the Minister and the Deputy as we tend to work very closely together.

Mr. Nixon: If you will permit me, Mr. Chairman, I have said in other places, and I would like to say to the hon. Minister, that since Mr. St. John's column ceased in the Globe and Mail about a year ago, there has not been an adequate centre for public discussion on a good many educational problems. While Mr. St. John may be very valuable to the hon. Minister and the department, and his advantages come down to the public good in this way, I think the hon. Minister did a great disservice to those interested in education, since nothing has come in any of the widely read newspapers to replace him. I hope the hon. Minister realizes that this is a significant criticism. I do not suppose it would be possible for him to do any public writing while he is in a position as a public servant. It is difficult to have it both ways, and I think it was better the other.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, I might just add this. I had some thoughts myself along this line, but I felt, in looking at it carefully, that in the common good, or in the overall analysis, Mr. St. John can do more for education within the department than writing for one of the newspapers. I think this was his own personal feeling, too.

Mr. Nixon: I think the Globe and Mail should buy him back. I do not know whether it is fair to ask, but how difficult would that be?

Hon. Mr. Davis: You would have to ask the Globe and Mail.

Mr. Nixon: What would they have to pay in order to get him back?

Hon. Mr. Davis: I have no idea.

Mr. Nixon: You do not know what he is paid?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Yes, but I do not think one could assess whether he would even want to go back, Mr. Chairman. I do not know.

Hon. A. Grossman (Minister of Reform Institutions): He wants to work for a great government.

Mr. Nixon: I think he was bought off. I want to ask some more questions about community colleges. Does the hon. Minister intend, in the setting up of the colleges between now and September, 1966, to have any new construction at all?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, this is once again difficult to state. I pointed out in my remarks about the possibility of the vocational centres or the institutes of technology, whether these will form sort of the nuclei. There are plans still going ahead for the physical additions or construction of these buildings, so it is very difficult to state at this point.

Mr. Nixon: Could the hon. Minister tell us what the earliest time might be when an entirely new institution or community college, would be set up in Ontario that would be of new construction?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, I cannot say. I could not tell the hon. member this as far as new construction is concerned. It is theoretically possible that a college of applied arts and technology could be in operation by September, 1966. Many community colleges have started in the United States, as the hon. member knows, in warehouses. I cannot tell you how soon it would be in a completely new physical facility.

Mr. Nixon: Does the hon. Minister expect to start that way—that is, get a thing going and then build—

Hon. Mr. Davis: I would think, Mr. Chairman, there is a possibility that one or two areas may, in order to get started immediately, start in something that is not a permanent facility. I think this is possible.

Mr. Nixon: Good!

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, could not that community college set-up start practically immediately, using the secondary schools on a 4 o'clock to 10 or 11 o'clock basis?

Hon. Mr. Davis: We could spend a lot of time discussing the pros and cons of this. I would have to give this some consideration. It would depend on the availability of secondary school accommodation; perhaps in the evening-class programme it might be possible. I do not think it is the most desirable way to get it started, but perhaps this could be considered. But I have reservations about it.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, the secondary schools in any community, not all of them, are used for evening programmes.

Hon. Mr. Davis: No, they are not, I agree.

Mr. Newman: There would be one secondary school in practically every community in which you could initiate your community college idea.

In the setting up of the community colleges, is it the hon. Minister's intention in communities in which an institute of technology is to be newly built to, at the same time that that institute of technology is being constructed, incorporate a community college?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, I really think I have touched on this two or three times. I have said that the council of regents, when it is appointed, will be asked to investigate the possibility of having the institutes of technology and the vocational centres become colleges of applied arts and technology. I cannot prejudge what the council will determine, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Nixon: Has there been any indication to the hon. Minister of a university that is anxious to begin a plan of university work in any proposed community college or in any centre?

Hon. Mr. Davis: No, I think the interest has come from perhaps two or three communities who are interested in having a university actually operate a year or two-year programme within their community.

Mr. Nixon: Is one of those Orillia?

Hon. Mr. Davis: There is a group in Orillia, as I understand it, who are interested in having a college established in affiliation with Waterloo Lutheran, and I understand there is a representative committee also from that area who are interested in establishing a college of fine arts and technology. I cannot tell the hon. member any more than that at this point.

Mr. Nixon: Speaking specifically about that problem, would the hon. Minister be in a position to make a decision on this basis? From his vantage point he should surely be able to advise them whether they should go for a university or whether they should perhaps have a community college with university facilities.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, it is very difficult to advise at this point until the regulations and the proposals, that will be drafted by the council of regents are ready. This we have communicated to the people in the Barrie area.

Mr. Nixon: I wonder if the hon. Minister would comment on the decision of—

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Mr. Chairman, I do not want to interrupt the hon. member; he obviously has more remarks to make on this vote. But I would move the committee rise and report progress and ask for leave to sit again.

Motion agreed to.

The House resumed; Mr. Speaker in the chair.

Mr. Chairman: Mr. Speaker, the committee of supply begs to report progress and asks for leave to sit again.

Report agreed to.

THE PUBLIC HEALTH ACT

Mr. S. Lewis (Scarborough West) moves second reading of Bill No. 15, An Act to amend The Public Health Act.

Mr. S. Lewis (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, I shall try to pronounce the central term of this bill accurately—phenylketonuria. PKU, as it is better known, is a metabolic disorder of childhood causing a chemical imbalance in the blood which leads to severe and permanent mental retardation of the infant concerned. It is an irretrievable kind of mental retardation, Mr. Speaker; it results in an IQ level of roughly ten to 30, a range which in many ways is beyond rehabilitation.

The central principle of this private member's bill is to provide for testing of infants during the first 28 days after birth and the recording of such tests to establish the presence of PKU. Once established within this 28-day period, a special additive to the diet can avert a lifetime of severe retardation, human misery and obvious despair. It is, I suggest to the hon. members of this House, an astonishing medical discovery. Amongst the over 200 known causes of mental retardation, this is one of the very few for which a correction is now available. It is a dramatic breakthrough in the field of preventive public health, and has been recognized as such in several jurisdictions across North America.

The hon. members of the Legislature will be interested in the incidence of PKU. According to a New York state testing survey, one out of every 10,000 infants is born with phenylketonuria. According to a Massachusetts survey, and I read from the Medical Tribune of July 22, 1963:

Nine cases of PKU have been confirmed among the 53,000 new-born infants tested in Massachusetts; a surprisingly high figure. That would be approximately one in every 6,000, and a cross-nation survey in the United States of some 400,000 infants established an incidence of one in 10,000 in the years 1962-63.

Mr. Speaker, I would point out that in Ontario the number of live births in the years 1961-62-63 averaged around 158,000, which makes it possible to predict that there are 15 new cases of PKU each year, 15 cases of people confined to a lifetime of hopeless retardation.

It is estimated that 0.1 per cent of the retardates in our society are retardates as a result of PKU. Dr. Frank at the Ontario hospital at Smiths Falls, with whom I have discussed this matter, suggests that he has 23 children at Smiths Falls suffering from PKU. Let it be said for those in this Legislature to whom the economic factor is important, a lifetime of institutionalization can run upwards of $100,000.

Mr. Speaker, the test to which I am referring is itself exceedingly inexpensive; 50 cents or 60 cents for each test; tests can be processed at the rate of 150 an hour; there can either be a urine sample or a blood test, the famous heel prick as it is known—the Guthrie assay process which is being used widely in the United States. Similar legislation to that which I am proposing in this Legislature, exists in the states of New York, Massachusetts, Connecticut and other jurisdictions. Let me read into the record of this House, Mr. Speaker, the Act from the state of New York, January 8, 1964—almost a year and a half ago:

An Act to amend the public health law in relation to the testing of infants for phenylketonuria.

It shall be the duty of

(1) The administrative officer or other person in charge of each institution caring for infants twenty-eight days or less of age, and

(2) the person required in pursuance of the provisions of section 41 of this chapter to register the birth of a child, to cause to have administered to every such infant or child in its or his care a test for phenylketonuria in accordance with rules or regulations prescribed by the commissioner. Testing and the recording of the results of such test shall be performed at such times and in such manner as may be prescribed by the commissioner.

It is mandatory in the states which I have mentioned; it is permissive in Nevada, in Delaware, in Kansas. The Mead-Johnson survey in the United States reports that 41 of the 48 continental United States have laboratory facilities for conducting PKU tests.

It seems to me a totally logical piece of legislation, Mr. Speaker. I hope it will avoid contention but let me anticipate the arguments that might be put forward, I suspect, by my friend from Scarborough North (Mr. Wells) when he speaks subsequently.

First, it can be said, and it doubtless will be said, that there are much better tests on the horizon. That you can test for 10, 15 or 20 metabolic disorders simultaneously as they are apparently in the process of devising in Montreal, and that this is the test that we should ultimately apply. That may very well be true, Mr. Speaker; no one is averse to the introduction of such tests in Ontario but the truth is that in the process of time we may lose another 15 lives. We know that the Guthrie tests work and I urge this Legislature to adopt them as a first step and expand the metabolic testing later, if necessary.

Secondly, Mr. Speaker, it can be said that most carriers of PKU are known. This is true, but it has been demonstrated by medical practitioners with far greater expertise than myself, that it is impractical to test the entire population for carriers, and, frankly, we will never know them all anyway. And I suggest that society has a moral obligation, when such a test is available, to avert even the incidence of one new child with PKU, because not even in this society—in fact, in no society—is it acceptable that a life of retardation can be countenanced when prevention is possible.

Third, there may well be an objection to that part of the bill, subsection 2, which puts the onus on the parents. If government wishes to amend that section in committee, we, on this side, will be pleased to have them do so.

It does not really relate to the primary principle of the bill but let me say that it is necessary for the Opposition to phrase it in that fashion because we are not enabled, as you know, on this side of the House to introduce financial bills and that was the only alternative.

Fourth, it may said that there is an element of compulsion in this bill. I hope this debate will not deteriorate into that traditional argument. If it is the intention of the hon. Minister of Health (Mr. Dymond) subsequently in his estimates, or if it is the feeling of the House generally, to introduce generally spread PKU testing under the OHSC to all hospitals in Ontario, through the central laboratory of the public health agency, then again no one on this side will object—as long as not a single child in this province filters through that apparatus. I would not want to see this bill scrapped or adjourned, Mr. Speaker, simply because there is another academic and semantic argument over compulsory vs. permissive legislation. The basic PKU testing is a fundamental principle.

Let me say, Mr. Speaker, that they are testing at Kingston general, they are testing at the sick children's hospital, they are testing at the East general in Toronto; all these hospitals have clinics with tragic cases of PKU infants. All these lives destroyed, can be avoided and I strongly urge the principle to commend itself to the hon. members of this Legislature and hope that they will join with me in approving second reading.

Mr. J. B. Trotter (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, I wish to add a few words to what the previous hon. speaker has said in support of this bill. This is another instance where we know that something can be done to effect a cure. When I say "effect a cure," if the disease PKU is caught early enough, and we now know it must be caught in the very early stages, a great deal can be done. I have seen from my own experience in my riding where there have been two children in one family—one where the disease was caught at the very beginning, the child has been able to lead a normal life; and where the PKU is left for a considerable length of time, the child is now a hopeless case in one of the hospitals for retarded children.

As the hon. member for Scarborough West pointed out, PKU, unless caught in the very early stages, can lead to mental retardation. The maximum amount of brain damage occurs in the first month or two of the life of the child, and that is why it is so important that steps be taken with every child so that we know beforehand if action must be taken.

The disease is inherited and it is relatively rare; it occurs approximately once in every 25,000 births. Mr. Speaker, when we see it is that rare we may ask, "Why be bothered going to the expense, or why be bothered being involved in legislation?" Well, again, it may be rare to the general population, but if it happens to your family or to your child or to your next-door neighbour, it is something that becomes of the utmost importance. In fact, more recent researches have ascertained that it can become even more common than once in 25,000 births.

A recent study, published June 6, 1964, in the Canadian medical association Journal, indicated that in case studies in Ontario, PKU was found to occur once in 1,100 to 1,900 births, and this conclusion which has been supported by other researchers, on different grounds indicates that PKU is becoming a more serious problem. It may become more serious, Mr. Speaker, because it may be one of the diseases that, over a period of time, is gathering force within the bodies of various individuals; it is passed on from person to person over a period of time, and it eventually appears to such an extent that it leads to mental retardation.

A case study in the Canadian medical association Journal, May 6, 1961, indicated that there were approximately 250 cases of PKU in Ontario of which only 83 were known. Over the 13-year period 1961 to 1974, the number of births expected with evidence of PKU is 111.

We know already from researches made that in this period from 1961 to 1974 that these cases are going to occur. So for two reasons we should take action. Here are 111 cases in which, if we take action, people who would be completely retarded could lead reasonably normal lives; also, we can step in and stop the continuation of PKU—in other words, this matter of carrying on the disease from generation to generation. Now, 111 cases may be a relatively insignificant figure when considered as a percentage of the population, but, as I said earlier, Mr. Speaker, it becomes tremendously important if it is your family, or if it is your neighbour. When we think of the cost of the drugs that are fed to some of these children, it amounts to a very high cost in the long run on the Treasury of the province of Ontario.

There are several reliable tests that can determine whether or not a young child is suffering from PKU. The test depends—and here I use a technical term with which I am not familiar—on amino acid phenylalanine being present in excessive quantities in the blood and urine. The hon. Minister of Health can define that technical matter for us, but in essence we are not trying to deal in technical terms. It is a fact that the men who are learned in this type of disease know that something can be found. If we provide the facilities and the necessary law, those who have the medical learning can do a great deal to protect our children here in the province of Ontario.

When it is true that these tests show a positive reaction for this disorder of PKU, the steps can be taken to supply the drugs. Tremendous steps have been taken in this field in recent years; it is unfortunate that we allow one single child to become retarded when the retardation could be stopped.

Both urine and blood tests are effective, but studies have shown that blood tests will yield a positive reaction within four to six days after birth, whereas urine tests will not necessarily yield any positive information until four to six weeks after birth. In other words, it has been shown and proved scientifically that by taking a blood test within four to six days a doctor can determine whether a child is suffering from PKU. Once detected, the disease can be controlled by prescribed diets which are low in that acid which brings about the retardation. If the diet is prescribed early enough, present studies show that the child will be able to live a normal life and develop quite well. So again I emphasize, Mr. Speaker, our present researchers tell us that there will be, in the next 13 years, at least 111 cases that are going to require help.

In the state of Massachusetts, as the hon. member for Scarborough West has said, there is legislation making blood tests of all newborn infants compulsory. They found—incidentally, this legislation is very recent; it was brought forth in Massachusetts in 1962—that by November 1, 1964, 27 cases of PKU had been discovered and were being treated. Here are 27 individuals who, because of a law that was passed in Massachusetts, are going to be able to live normal lives; instead of being a cost on the taxpayer of the state of Massachusetts, they are going to be able to get out and pay their own way. So it is not only a matter of humanity, as in so many of these cases in this type of legislation—it is sound economics.

The Massachusetts Department of Public Health supports a clinic for children with PKU and other similar problems. This clinic is available at no charge for consultation services or complete medical services. In December, 1964—and again I point out, Mr. Speaker, the recent figures—there were about 50 patients receiving treatment in the clinic in Massachusetts, and they test a good many children over the period of a year. The clinic in Massachusetts costs them $30,000 per year, which amounts to about 50 cents per child that they test.

So that would mean that they are testing about 60,000 children. Out of this they have found 50 cases necessary to treat. It has been estimated that the total annual cost has been about half as much as the cost of maintaining one of these children in an institution for life. So again I point out to this House, through you, Mr. Speaker, the sound economics that the cost of the entire clinic in Massachusetts for a year is what it costs to keep one child for life in an institution.

In Canada, Saskatchewan has introduced a provincial programme for the detection of PKU in which all the hospitals may participate, and a pilot programme has been introduced in Nova Scotia, in British Columbia and Manitoba. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, it is time for Ontario to get moving.

In Ontario, only the East general hospital in Toronto, and a few hospitals in other parts of Ontario, are doing PKU tests as a matter of course. Case studies in this province, according to the Canadian medical association Journal of July 1964, have shown that laboratory time required to administer a study and to study the blood tests amounted to some four hours every two weeks, while the cost of the tests were approximately ten cents per newborn child. So we are not asking the government to spend a tremendous amount of money. When it is figured it costs ten cents per child for this test, it is a very wise and proper thing to do.

What forms the basis of a well-planned programme for detection and treatment of PKU, Mr. Speaker? Of course, there are many answers to this, but basically it is a matter of research; it is education, it is publicity, and counselling is of prime importance. But in addition, there is room for positive government action in this area. This would basically take three forms.

First, instituting compulsory blood tests for newborn infants and possibly for mothers during pregnancy. Again, along with the hon. member for Scarborough West, I hope that the government is not afraid of the word compulsory.

Two, financial help for the programming of tests and for families with a PKU patient under treatment. This treatment represents, for some families, a financial burden and arrangements should be made to assist families of low economic status. One practical aspect of that, Mr. Speaker, is this: I remember a few years ago where they discovered a PKU baby in my riding and the drugs were found to be so expensive that the family could not afford to pay it. Fortunately the hospital for sick children—even some of the members of the staff—chipped in to see that the drugs were provided and eventually—I give the government credit for this—I notified The Department of Public Welfare and they saw to it that drugs were provided. But it is common sense to see to it that a child who needs this type of treatment receives it immediately. Otherwise the child is going to be a charge upon the province of Ontario as long as it lives.

Third, the registration of PKU persons in a central registry is of the greatest importance. It would serve a dual purpose: one, the keeping of statistical data; and two, the continuity of supervision for families with high risks. Now this could be done, and the beginning of doing this, if such legislation was made law by this House.

I have one or two criticisms of this bill. I repeat, we support it in principal. I believe that the hon. member for Scarborough West would agree with me, his problem was that this involves the spending of public money and therefore he could not make it as broad as he would wish. But I would like to say that this could be done. The bill before us in this Legislature makes PKU tests compulsory within a period not to exceed 28 days from the date of birth. It in no way covers either recommendations 2 or 3, in which I mentioned we should supply financial help for families with PKU children—

Mr. S. Lewis: It is done.

Mr. Trotter: The government will supply drugs when asked through The Department of Public Welfare and I have got the help here financially from them, but you have to go to The Department of Public Welfare. I am glad they have improved it, because I know that when I not so long ago had—

Hon. M. B. Dymond (Minister of Health): It was done last year.

Mr. Trotter: Well, I am glad to see it has been brought up to date because I know when I applied to the government I got it, but it was a matter of compassion more than law and regulation. So if that is true, number two then has been done.

The third suggestion I had was the listing and keeping of a central registry for all people and all families suspected of PKU, because this is passed on from generation to generation. This is something that could be stopped. It is in our own interest, in hard-boiled financial terms, to see to it that this disease is conquered.

In addition, there is room for this agreement to the extent that the test is made at the behest of the parents. I would rather see a law that the request should be made by the hospital, because what if the parent does not bother, does not know or does not want to? It means, if the child does have PKU, it will be condemned for life to a hospital for retarded children; or it means that the disease will be carried on for another generation. Therefore, instead of the test being done at the behest of the parent, I would rather see it the law of the land where the child must have a PKU test. Basically this is a good bill. It is a good beginning and I wholeheartedly, and this party wholeheartedly, supports this bill. I do wish that the hon. Minister of Health would stand up and agree with what we have had to say. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. T. L. Wells (Scarborough North): Mr. Speaker, I would like to join in this discussion of a very interesting topic. First, in speaking on the principle of this bill, I would like to indicate some points on which we all agree and that is that there is now considerable evidence that a low phenylalanine diet will prevent mental deterioration in patients with phenylketonuria. Although much has to be learned about the optimum use of this diet, it certainly seems evident that the younger the baby starts on this type of diet the more intelligence he will retain.

Now, because of this medical discovery, tests were developed to try to trace down this metabolic abnormality and we have heard of some of these tests today. I think that we all have to agree that the whole development in this field is certainly a significant development in scientific medical diagnosis.

I also think we all agree that all newborn infants should have this test. I certainly wanted my children to have it, and they did have it as long ago as 1960. I think that we can understand and appreciate the concern of the parents of children who to live with this condition now, and who have banded themselves together into an association to try to help prevent future children from suffering the mental deterioration which their children suffer. But, I think, Mr. Speaker, the bill we have before us today is just not a practical bill. I think in saying this we should reflect on the great impact that this type of testing will have.

First, we have the two tests: The ferric chloride test where they put some ferric chloride on the wet diaper of a young baby, and from that they are able to test for PKU; and the other test, as the hon. member for Scarborough West has mentioned, is the Guthrie test. This consists of a prick in the heel to collect a blood sample. At one time the ferric chloride test was thought to be the ultimate, and then the Guthrie test was developed. Now, in Montreal, tests and studies are going on to show that you can not only test for PKU, but for many other metabolic disorders in children that need to be treated from the very outset, and that multiple tests are now being developed.

What this all suggests to me, Mr. Speaker, is that—as this testing for enzyme abnormality is changing constantly—what we want here is a pattern of flexibility, not a pattern of rigidity. In other words, this field is moving so fast that, from one day to the next, types of testing are changing. Why should we be tied down by legislation in specifying one specific test? I think that we need this flexibility. What may be a good test today, next month may not be; what may be a test for PKU now, may develop into a test for four or five metabolic disorders. What we need is an urging of voluntary use of testing, which certainly any recognized doctor and hospital today—through education—is being urged to do. This is part of his adherence to his professional studies, and I am sure he will religiously carry this out.

The second thing specifically on this bill, Mr. Speaker, is that I think as it is worded—and it is all very well for the hon. members to talk about how they would like to have this bill worded—to make the screening of the newborn infant mandatory on the parent. I think that, in this, there is a potential trespass on the rights of the citizen. There are those, who for religious grounds, feel they should not have any tests done, particularly a blood test, and I think that this represents an infringement on the citizens' rights.

Mr. S. Lewis: How about the rights of the child?

Mr. Wells: Now I would like to say, Mr. Speaker, it is all very well for my friends to talk about this. They bandy around the word "compulsory" very lightly.

Mr. S. Lewis: The hon. member is the one that bandies it.

Mr. Wells: What they should realize, Mr. Speaker, is that there is now no case anywhere in the legislation where any medical test is compulsory. The only thing in this allied field that is compulsory, is the putting of silver nitrate on the eyes of the newborn infant. So that all these other things that we may think are compulsory, are not compulsory by law, but they are done. Vaccination for smallpox, the antitoxins for diphtheria, all these various tests that we all know must be done on the newborn, none of them is compulsory.

I think, as I have said, that making it compulsory could be a potential trespass of the citizens' rights.

The third thing I would like to deal with, Mr. Speaker, is, as I said, that we have to study the potential impact of this type of legislation, the legislation which makes mass screening compulsory. We may arrive at a point of mass screening. I think we will arrive there through a voluntary method. I believe we will arrive there through a voluntary method. But no matter how we arrive there, we must study the potential impact of this type of testing. The first thing we must study and we must prepare to institute, is an educational programme, because no programme of mass screening will eliminate the false negatives and the false positives.

In other words, there are going to be people who will actually have PKU, but will, through testing, come out negative. Now this may be a very small group, but we must be prepared to educate the citizens of this province to the fact that this is a possibility, that not everyone will be caught by the testing. Further, we must have the extensive facilities to track down thoroughly and analyze every positive result, because we will obviously come up with some who appear positive but who are, in reality, negative. For this, of course, we will be very grateful for any battery of laboratory tests which could show this. But I think that we must realize that with any system of mass screening, must go a programme of mass education as to the value of the screening programme—what is being done and what are the potential hazards of the programme.

As I said, we must be prepared to make sure, as we go into this field, that the special tests for the confirming of false positives are available just as readily as the mass screening tests. We must be prepared to have the laboratory, clinical, hospital and therapeutic facilities to treat the people—the children who are found to have PKU—and we must be prepared, I think, not to offer this test in areas where these facilities are not immediately available.

Now, another field that we must look at—and I am going to quote from the medical literature here, because it is a field about which, of course, the hon. Minister of Health knows more than I do, or probably any other hon. member of the House; this is in this field of phenylketonuria and genetics. If we are going to have mass screening, the medical literature says that:

If mass screening is effective, undamaged individuals with genotypes homogenous for several of the hereditary metabolic diseases such as PKU will be the legacy of this exercise.

That is the exercise of mass screening.

And approximately half of these people will be women whom we presume will be fertile and desiring children of their own. We have to be prepared to look at this problem and consider what we shall offer these women during their pregnancies, knowing that abnormal homogenous maternal phenotypes can constitute a hazard to the foetus. What facilities for counselling and testing will be available for prospective partners in marriage who might question their own phenotype.

These are some of the things that the medical literature suggests must be seriously considered, as we embark on a programme of mass screening.

Now I think, as I said earlier, Mr. Speaker, that we all agree that this test should be done. I feel that it can be done on a voluntary method, as all our other tests are done. I think that, as has already been pointed out, we should realize that it is being done in the Kingston general hospital, in the East general hospital, in the sick children's hospital in Toronto.

We should realize also that the college of general practice of Canada carries on a campaign with the general practitioners in Canada. They have been distributing booklets explaining phenylketonuria, sending testing material, sending log books, urging the doctors to do this test. This is a fairly new procedure, and it is becoming very effective now, as these men become more accustomed to this test, which, as I said, is really a new test.

These things are going on, and I am sure that more things will be going on, Mr. Speaker. I feel that the prime consideration here is to seek to carry out this type of testing on a voluntary basis without infringing on the rights of our citizens, as I feel this bill does.

I would like to conclude these few remarks by reading a quotation from a doctor, who is eminently qualified to comment on this programme, because he has done much medical research in this field, and is doing much at the present time. He is one of those groups who are actively interested in this field of metabolic disorders in children. Dr. Charles R. Scriver, of the Montreal children's hospital—and these are his words, from a paper which he has presented:

There seems to be every reason to encourage the cautious use of screening methods for detection and study of metabolic disease in the newborn period, under controlled circumstances. In some cases we can prevent harm to the infant through early detection and therapy. In other instances we are bound to learn anew. Whether screening programmes can be made community-wide now is, however, still undecided, because there is much more to be understood about the problems of mass screening than the technical tests. In the meantime the Canadian medical community can do much to assist in pilot studies, which will determine the best use to be made of the available screening techniques. At the same time the broader problems of resources and organization for mass screening programmes can be investigated.

It would seem advisable to discourage any legislation which may be brought forth now, which specifies how screening must be done, and the fact that screening should be mandatory. The field is advancing too quickly not to have flexibility in planning.

Mr. Speaker, these are the words of an eminent doctor in this field and I think they sum up my reaction to this bill.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to contribute to this debate, but I think in fairness to the House this is one time when we can all say that we are in agreement on principle. I think that the thinking behind the underlying intention, if I may put it in an Irish way, is very sound. It is very encouraging to all of us in medicine to know that tests are being devised to bring to light these conditions and to help us prevent a life of despair, as the hon. member described it.

I do want to say, however, in the case of the remarks of the three points emphasized by the hon. member for Parkdale, that only one is not being done in Ontario—that is, compulsory testing, we have now for over a year been providing the phenylalanine diet to families because it is a very costly diet. We also have a central register of all cases on record.

Mr. Trotter: All the cases the hon. Minister knows of.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: If my hon. friend would just wait a minute and not bite my tongue off before it is even protruding.

I was about to say, sir, that we have completed testing of all the children under our care and we have established a register of all of those known in the province and we have them on record already, so the two points are already under way.

I would just like to advise you, sir, that when I present the estimates of my department I will have a positive proposal to put before the House, which we believe will produce the desired effect inherent in the bill proposed by the hon. member.

Hon. Mr. Dymond moves the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to.

COMMISSIONER TO INVESTIGATE ADMINISTRATIVE DECISIONS

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview) moves second reading of Bill No. 32, An Act to provide for the appointment of a commissioner to investigate administrative decisions and acts of officials of the government of Ontario and its agencies, and to define the commissioner's powers and duties.

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): Mr. Speaker, in speaking to Bill No. 32, and in moving second reading, I would advise you, sir, that this is an Act to provide for the appointment of a commissioner to investigate administrative decisions and acts of officials of the government of Ontario, and its agencies, and to define that commissioner's powers and duties.

May I say, sir, at the outset, that I believe that Ontario today needs this sort of an official. He is sometimes described as a parliamentary commissioner, and sometimes described as an ombudsman.

The growth of government business and services has made it necessary, in the interests of all of the people in Ontario in 1965, to have a tremendous administrative machine, and hundreds if not thousands of civil servants to look after it. This sort of procedure is necessary today because of the new role that government is undertaking in these complex times. In several countries, administrative machinery actually stands between the individual and the state. Certainly it does in this province.

The private citizen has often been frightened and frequently completely overwhelmed by the very formidable task of attempting to deal with matters which so vitally affect him through the ministrations of nameless and faceless civil servants. We have reached the point where, in some cases and in certain ways, and with substantial justification, the personality is perhaps being crushed by the overwhelming growth of legislative services. They feel a particular awe by this machinery which, of necessity, must have an impersonal character in their relationships with the machinery.

That is why I think that we must make sure that the citizens of this province are not led to believe that their personal interests and their security can be vitally affected by a group of persons over whom they have no control.

Mr. Speaker, I think that the points about which we hear more discussion than anything else in this House relate to the concern that individuals have in their relationship with the vast overwhelming machine of government, how do they cope with it, what do they do about it. On occasion, they come to their member of Parliament. The member of Parliament investigates as best he is able, and he attempts to lay the facts of the individual's problems before the House in the hope that something will be done about it. The tenor of my remarks is that this is not good enough in the complex world in which we live; that there is another remedy, and that this is the remedy that we are putting forward and is contained in this Bill 32.

In brief, as I say, Mr. Speaker, in this bill I am presenting today I am suggesting that Ontario appoint a parliamentary commissioner or ombudsman, who would have the duty to examine citizens' complaints, and, if he deems them unwarranted, which he might on many occasions, convince the complainant that he has not, in fact, been ill-treated or placed in an untenable position, and the state has not been unfair towards him. I think this is important because all complaints that we hear as members of, the Legislature are certainly not justified. But I think the citizen who feels he is aggrieved should have the opportunity to have an impartial official examine his complaint, and a great deal of the concern about government and its size and its impersonality could be done away with if there was such a person or such an office available to explain to the apparently aggrieved citizen that he is not too badly aggrieved at all.

On the other hand, and we see many of these instances too, sir, if the complaint is warranted the commissioner would make to the state or to its officials the necessary recommendation so that the situation could be remedied.

This officer, of course, must be impartial. He must be a completely independent person who works first of all for simplicity in all procedures. And what greater boon could we give, sir, to the people of the province of Ontario than a limitation on red tape, a cutting-through of complicated and hard to understand procedures? And what greater job could any official of the province of Ontario accept as his first task than the taking on of a real examination of complicated and unnecessary administrative procedures and to make them simple and understandable? He should have the same independence, in my opinion, as is presently enjoyed by the only other official we in this Legislature know—the provincial auditor.

The concept, sir, of an ombudsman developed initially in the Scandinavian countries. We may well ask if this concept can be transmitted or transplanted into Ontario, where there is a somewhat different system of government. We have a parliamentary system of government, of which one of the basic and fundamental principles is a ministerial responsibility. Government is not conducted in the same sense in the Scandinavian countries. While perhaps the concept cannot be transplanted in toto, certainly such an official has a most important role to play, in my opinion, in this province, in connection with protecting the rights of the individual. How this might be done and in what areas this official would operate, and what would be the nature of his authority, are matters that I have attempted to outline in my bill. I believe that as a community we must provide ourselves with another instrument of control, operating in a manner somewhat different from that used by our courts, in order to fill in some of the gaps which are glaringly wide in modern circumstances. The Legislature must attempt to penetrate at certain specific points this apparently impregnable shield which protects such a vast area of legislative and executive decision from proper scrutiny. The ombudsman can be used as a weapon to penetrate that shield.

My bill, Mr. Speaker, is modelled substantially upon the provisions contained in the New Zealand bill of 1962, which I have attempted to adapt to the mood of Ontario. I am suggesting that the principal function of the commissioner would be to investigate any decision or recommendations made, including any recommendation made to a Minister of the Crown, or any act done or omitted to be done relating to a matter of administration and affecting any person or body of persons in his personal capacity in or by any of the departments, or any of the agencies of government of Ontario, or by any officer or employee thereof.

Section 9 of the bill is an important section, within which all the essentials of the parliamentary commissioner's jurisdiction is to be found. I have departed in section 9 from the New Zealand precedent of naming in the schedules setting out specific departments and government organizations and have, in fact, suggested that this bill be made applicable to all departments of government and to all agencies of government. The jurisdiction which I am suggesting be given to the ombudsman extends to matters of administration, with the consequence that matters concerning policy only would be, as they should be, excluded.

In so doing, I hope I am removing from discussion and I hope, sir, with this bill before the House, that we will hear from government, and particularly from the Cabinet, some real analysis and opinion in connection with this suggestion, which is one that has been before the people of Ontario and the people of Canada for some months and some years. It has also been discussed at various meetings of Bar associations. The Hon. Guy Favreau, the Minister of Justice in Ottawa, has suggested that a committee of the House of Commons be set up to investigate this. Briefs have been presented to Mr. Justice McRuer in connection with this, and I would hope that in a matter of such importance—in a matter that I believe is so needed in the province of Ontario—that we would hear some real discussion and real criticism emanating from the government benches, particularly from the front government benches.

The jurisdiction which I am suggesting be given to the ombudsman extends to matters of administration. I say that matters of policy—I am repeating myself—only would be, as they should be, excluded.

I would think that where a matter arises that might concern the parliamentary commissioner, which involves both administration and policy, he could still be empowered to investigate; if he strays beyond the bounds given to him, resort could be made to the courts to restrain him. This very question was posed to Sir Guy Powells, who is the New Zealand ombudsman, when he appeared here in Canada a couple of years ago. He suggested that the mere thought that he might be straying into fields of policy was an ever-present warning sign in his mind, but where he thought that he was dealing with mixed fields of administration and policy, he went in and investigated. He said that insofar as his actions had been concerned, while there was, of course, resort to the courts to restrain him if he strayed beyond the four walls of his enabling statute, no one had, up to the time he had been here, and he had been in office for a few years, had seen fit to go to the courts in an attempt to restrain him.

It goes without saying, of course, that should this bill be accepted by the Legislature, the person whose appointment I envisage must be a person of the highest possible integrity, of the utmost ability, a person who by reason of his training and experience and reputation, could at once command the respect not only of all members of the Legislature, but also of all of the people of Ontario. He must be a person whose tenure of office would be determined not by government but by the Legislature; he must be a person who could not be arbitrarily removed at the whim of a new Prime Minister or of a new government; he must be a person whose abilities would command at least the equivalent salary to that of one of the supreme court judges. In other words, sir, he must be a person of extremely outstanding ability, and a person who I think we could find without too much difficulty in this province if we set our minds to it.

Mr. J. H. White (London South): The hon. member would take it himself, would he not?

Mr. Singer: If my hon. friend wants to put my name in nomination, I might seriously consider it.

Mr. White: The hon. member is the only man I can think of with all those attributes.

Mr. Singer: This bill, sir, advisedly stops short—and I think this is an important point—of giving to the ombudsman the authority to inquire into the decisions of Ministers themselves. But any recommendation made to a Minister or by a department, even if the Minister has already acted upon it, may be re-inquired into and, if necessary, reported upon. I can imagine cases where a Minister has refused the advice of a civil servant and made a decision that has caused complaint. In such cases, surely the complainant should be entitled to know that the decision he does not like was not that of a civil servant but of the Minister?

I think this could be a very important method of procedure so that if a citizen says: "I do not like such-and-such a decision," he should be in a position to be able to say: "Well, if it was not the civil service who recommended it in usual procedure, it was the Minister." And the Minister should as a responsible Minister be prepared to say: "This was my opinion and I think it was right." There should be the ability for the citizen to find out who really made the decision. I think this type of inquiry which the parliamentary commissioner, the ombudsman, could carry on would have very substantial dividends in satisfying the concern of people who are affected by such decisions and to feel that they might or might not be unfair.

Contacts with government departments and agencies could and should be kept on an informal basis. The idea behind this bill would enable a parliamentary commissioner to find out the truth about the facts surrounding a particular complaint. He could, by personal contact with the heads of departments, obtain co-operation that is possibly denied to an ordinary citizen. We all know of cases where the ordinary citizen is just completely overwhelmed in an effort to try to get through to the person who can responsibly advise him or responsibly state the basis for a decision. His operations to be successful must, of course, not only have the confidence of Parliament, they must have the confidence of the administration. And what I mean in that, sir, is obvious. He not only must be a persona grata to all of the members of this House, but he must be a person who can get along with the Deputy Ministers, with all of the people who make up our civil service, with the heads of commissions and boards and agencies.

He must, of course, be given very complete official powers of investigation. He must have the power to summon and to examine persons on oath and must have complete rights of access to departmental records and to departmental premises. Questions, of course, will be raised on the issue of Crown privilege. And I am suggesting in section 15 that any rule of law in effect authorizing the withholding of documents on the grounds of public interests should not apply to any investigation by the ombudsman unless the Attorney General certifies that the disclosure might, in the circumstances, involve matters which would disclose deliberations of the Cabinet or would involve matters which might in his opinion be secret or confidential in nature and which would be injurious to the public interest. As in New Zealand, Mr. Speaker, I am attempting to limit this privilege as it now exists so that it can be exercised only by a certificate by the Attorney General.

It would be my thought that departments and agencies would be most reluctant, as a general rule, to approach the Attorney General for such a certificate; except in the most unusual circumstances, because such a request would obviously convey to him—and in saying this I speak particularly of my hon. friend who occupies the post at present (Mr. Wishart)—and subsequently to the people of Ontario, that they have something to hide. I would think not only would there be a reluctance in an approach to the Attorney General to ask for such a report, but there would be real reluctance on the part of the Attorney General to grant such a certificate just as a matter of course. He would want to satisfy himself on every occasion that the granting of such a certificate was fully authorized and justified.

Of course, the ombudsman himself, and his staff, would be required to maintain secrecy in respect to matters coming before him, except insofar as disclosure may be necessary in the interest of carrying out the investigation to support his recommendation.

As to the actual power and authority of the commissioner, I know—as hon. members have read the bill—that they will realize that he has no power to make anything in the nature of an executive order or decision. He is not going to be a legislator; he is not going to be a law-maker; he is an investigator and a reporter.

Mr. Speaker, it has been pointed out to me that it is 6 o'clock; my remarks will take some time yet. Is it your intention now to leave the chair?

Mr. Singer moves the adjournment of the debate.

On vote 501:

Mr. R. F. Nixon (Brant): Mr. Chairman, I was interested to read today in the newspaper that the Mennonite community in the Elmira area has decided to leave the public school system and establish its own schools. I wonder if the hon. Minister would care to comment on the reasons for this and to what extent other religious groups are interested in establishing parochial schools.

Hon. W. G. Davis (Minister of Education): Mr. Chairman, the only group that we know of is the Mennonites, who may or may not in that area—it is not confirmed yet. I think that one of the reasons for leaving will be the question of the central school, or perhaps the question of transportation. I understand that this is one of their problems. Also, over the years, they have become used to having a concentration of their own youngsters in the one school. We regret this development; I think perhaps we all do, and to date we have had no indication of this happening with any other group. We do not think that this is a general condition.

Mr. Nixon: In my own constituency there are a large number of Dutch Reform Church members who have established their own schools, and I believe they are of very high calibre. Would the hon. Minister be in a position to provide us with any statistics as to the rate at which parochial schools of this type are being established in the province?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, I might be able to get this information. It is difficult to obtain the number that are going into the so-called parochial system. One thing with which I can help the hon. member is that a year ago we agreed to inspect the schools, so that they are now under a system of provincial inspection. The rate of growth of the Dutch Reform or Christian Reform schools is very hard to predict at this point. Whether the families will continue, we quite frankly do not know. It is not a large percentage but there are some; there is no question about it.

Mr. Nixon: Is there any thought that, in the schools of this type that have been and will be established the government would be able to give some assistance, let us say, in connection with the textbook programme?

Hon. Mr. Davis: No, this has not been the policy, Mr. Chairman, and I doubt that there will be any change of policy unless the whole question is opened up, which I do not think the government would be doing at this time.

Mr. Nixon: In connection with private schools, there has been from time to time, announcements in the metropolitan papers of small groups getting together to form their own private schools as something less than a large commercial enterprise. Does the hon. Minister have any statistics that would indicate if this is a programme that is accelerating or is this the way it has always been in the past? I am under the impression that there are many more of these being formed now than in the past.

Hon. Mr. Davis: No, Mr. Chairman, unless the hon. member is referring to some of the Jewish parochial schools—I would say that the number of private schools today is not substantially increased in the metropolitan area except with the natural growth, say, in the separate schools—if the hon. member is referring to this type of private school. If he is referring to this type of private school, they are increasing—Neil McNeil and Michael Power and so on—in size, but I think it would correspond roughly to the growth in population. I think the two could be related.

Mr. Nixon: The hon. Minister in his opening remarks commented on the St. Catharines flag day proposal.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Oh, Canada Day.

Mr. Nixon: Canada Day, yes, and I understand there is a possibility that in the future this might be declared a school holiday if it were a programme that were received with favour in all parts of the province. Perhaps the hon. Minister might serve the purpose of that discussion if he would say more about it himself.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Well, Mr. Chairman, there is not a great deal more I can add, really, to what was in my preliminary remarks. The St. Catharines board decided to observe a Canada Day; they prepared their programme; they invited us to attend but unfortunately we could not be there. We thought it a very excellent programme and that there was some merit in the idea. We brought it to the attention of other principals to get their reaction. I would not want to predict at this point, Mr. Chairman, whether it would become general across the province as a school holiday, but certainly we felt the idea had merit and as a result we encouraged them. We will sense the reaction over perhaps the next year, as to how the other school boards feel about it.

Mr. Nixon: Dealing with flags and problems arising therefrom: It is interesting to note that around these buildings there seems to be some confusion as to what flags will be used, say, in this chamber, at the entrance to this chamber, and in various areas around the Parliament buildings. As a matter of fact, when the bill calling for a provincial flag was introduced, I made some comments, I believe, that were construed by one member of the press as calling for a brainwashing of the students of the province of Ontario into the acceptance of our national flag. Now perhaps I will be taking the risk of being accused of the same thing, but it seems to me, in driving through the countryside, one sees a variety of flags flying. I suppose it will not be long until our provincial flag will be seen flying in front of some schools; and of course our national flag is flying in front of many schools.

I would like to suggest to the hon. Minister that it would not be beyond the realm of financial possibility if a suitable flag were made available at no charge to the school board that had the facilities and the desire to fly it. My own feeling is that each school in this province should fly the flag of the nation and I would make this strong suggestion to the hon. Minister, but perhaps he will not care to comment on it.

Hon. Mr. Davis: I would like to think about this, Mr. Chairman, but in my travels around—and I have seen a number of schools even in the last two or three months—I think the great bulk of them are flying the new Canadian flag, at the schools I have observed.

Mr. Nixon: I felt it was rather unfortunate that flag day, as such, was missed by most schools. Unfortunately, it was difficult to get the new flag in time and it has been suggested, I believe, in the Parliament at Ottawa that this historic day might well be properly marked in the years to come with fitting ceremonies and with an appropriate remembrance of the great occasion.

Hon. H. L. Rowntree (Minister of Labour): You mean the Ontario flag?

Mr. Nixon: No, I mean the flag of the nation, and this is the one I would propose to the hon. Minister of Education and to the government, to take the place of honour in the schools of the province.

Vote 502 agreed to.

On vote 503:

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Chairman, on vote 503. Our school system is more and more beset in the minds of some teachers, and assisted in the minds of some school boards, with people who are taking over various administrative duties in the schools themselves, and certainly for the various school boards. I wonder if the hon. Minister would comment on a programme that might be already established in his department so that school administrators would have an opportunity to be kept up to date with the latest methods and the best methods in this expanding business of education.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, there are two or three things of interest in this area on which I could spend some time. The whole question of school business administration is becoming a very important one as far as the growth of education in this province is concerned. It is related to the availability of technological equipment, such as computers, and we have been doing a very substantial study in this area to try to develop—within the department—a system of computerized statistical processing that will be able to assist the boards, the business administrators and relieve a lot of pressure from the teachers themselves.

There are two areas, really, of use as far as the computer is concerned: one is in the area of instruction which I think will take some considerable time to develop; and the other is in the administrative area where we can, I think, assist the teachers with records, such as attendance, and assist the principals, we hope, in the development of timetabling.

The business administrators have their own committee, and we have a joint committee with them to look into administrative practices. We think we are making some progress. Our concern is, quite frankly, that some of the major boards might be moving into this area of data processing and not relating it to what other boards are doing. But we are trying to co-ordinate their efforts so that eventually we can tie in our own data processing systems with those to be established by the major boards and, of course, we eventually hope to provide some form of uniform provincial service for them. We have also had, through the CEA, a committee looking into the feasibility of tying the provinces in from this standpoint as well. Dr. Jackson has been chairing the committee that has been looking into this for the past, roughly, nine months now and they, I think, are coming to the conclusion that we must solve our own provincial problems before we can relate it on a national basis; however, we are encouraged by the response of the other provinces. They have been, I think, very co-operative and interested in what we are doing, and Quebec has made very major advances in this area. All in all we are encouraged, but it is a very important section. A lot of people tend to look at education in terms of curriculum, teachers and so on, but administration is becoming a very key factor. This is why, in the re-organization, we have given added emphasis to the whole question of school business administration.

Mr. Nixon: In the calculation of grants by the individual school board the business administrator must surely take some considerable responsibility. Is there a tendency with the building up of the computer facilities here in Toronto for these calculations to be done centrally and with the main responsibility taken at the central office, or do the people out in the field have to go through the laborious procedures of first interpreting and then finally calculating the grant procedures?

Hon. Mr. Davis: I would say, Mr. Chairman, that they are still going through the procedures, and there is no point minimizing the complexity of the grant regulations. But we think, as the number of boards decrease, as the units become larger and our own equipment becomes more refined, that we will be able to relieve the boards of a lot of this burden. Obviously, if we can have the ideal system so that we can have up-to-date accurate information almost on a weekly or monthly basis, the day may come when we may be able to centrally calculate the grants for the boards. We are dependent, of course, on their information and much of the work is still done by the local boards, although our own grants office endeavours to be as helpful as possible in assisting the administrators in their calculations.

Mr. Nixon: Are all the calculations checked by your office before the money goes out?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Yes, they are checked.

Mr. Nixon: Have there ever been cases where an incorrect grant has been awarded following which the board would have to receive a short grant for some years to make up for too much money in a single year? Excluding the case of the illegalities in the Renfrew area?

Hon. Mr. Davis: No, I would think there perhaps have been two or three situations, Mr. Chairman, out of the some three or four thousand grants that are calculated every year. I would have to be very frank in suggesting there may have been three or four errors of this kind during the course of this time. I do not think there is any doubt about this.

Mr. Nixon: I remember hearing—I do not know how accurate it would be—when an error in the other direction took place in the case of at least one school board. It appeared that, following a change in the directorship of education in the area, an error was brought to light involving very heavy repayment on behalf of the government to the school board. Have errors of this nature taken place in the past which the hon. Minister is aware of?

Hon. Mr. Davis: I cannot recall, Mr. Chairman, any major errors in the last, say, two or three years, of large sizes. No, I cannot recall any. If the hon. member has any specific situation in mind, I would be delighted to check it.

Mr. Nixon: The point of my question is this: the grant system is extremely complex. Many hon. members will surely remember the hon. Minister explaining it at the session last year and we all felt at the time that it was quite complex. Unfortunately the hon. Minister would not be available to give assistance to every school board and perhaps it might be advisable for the computer facilities that are at his disposal to make these calculations on behalf of the various school boards and these could be run through rather rapidly. They would, I suppose, still have the right and responsibility to check them on their own behalf, but it might save a lot of wear and tear on the abilities of a good many of the people concerned.

Further in the matter of administration, I would presume that principals would come under this particular vote, or our dealings with principals. Would that be correct?

Hon. Mr. Davis: I do not—

Mr. Nixon: Would you put them under teacher training?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Perhaps you might, but if the hon. member has a question we might as well deal with it here, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Nixon: All right. I do feel that principals of schools are, in fact, a part of the administration at the local level; and although many of them do retain their membership in the teachers' professional organizations, this is always up for some discussion. In my own experience they have always supported the teachers in every way in that connection. But I would like to say a word or two about the process whereby the department selects individuals for training as principals and thus, in fact, takes them out of the teaching situation. It always seems to me a great shame in many ways that the very best teachers, those I believe rated by the departmental inspectors at the level of 6 or 7 on the scale from 0 to 10, are more or less informed in a quiet way that their application to the department for admission to the principals' course would be greeted with favour.

My understanding is that once the application of an individual to the principals' course is accepted, then there is no chance of him failing the course or the examination. I believe the hurdle is the acceptance by the department.

I realize that it is imperative that the principals in any schools have a close association with the teachers in the classroom and have an understanding of the problems they face. But as the school system increases in complexity and size there are becoming a significant number of our best teachers removed from the situation where they are needed most and put into positions of administration where, in almost every case, they no longer have any teaching responsibility. I do not know whether there is any answer to the problem that this presents, and I would ask the hon. Minister to suggest his own views on this and perhaps his department is considering some departure.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Well, Mr. Chairman, I think it is obvious that you want to select good personnel for your principals. The source of personnel obviously is the teaching staff or the members of the profession, and I do not think there is any real solution to it. You cannot go outside the teaching profession to select principals. I do not think we could accept this principle, any of us, and to suggest that you do not pick a good teacher to become a principal or take the course, does not really serve the purpose either.

I think, really, what we should be attempting to achieve is to free the principal from his many administrative tasks to become the intellectual leader of the school besides being the administrator. He should be free to devote a lot of time to the development of the members of his staff. If this is the case, I think that he is really performing as important a service as if he were head of a department or a specialist in the school itself. I think if we can free our principals to do more of this type of work, to give guidance particularly to the inexperienced members on the staff, that he is performing a function not dissimilar to superintendents or inspectors. In this way I think we could reconcile the fact that we have lost a good teacher from a staff itself.

Mr. Nixon: Just before this vote carries, I want to say that this is precisely the view that I, and many teachers, would have of the function of a principal. It would surely be one of the responsibilities, one of the biggest responsibilities of the administrative branch and the administration in the individual school, to see to it that the principals are relieved of the many responsibilities—paper work responsibilities—that have tied them down heretofore.

I think the same is true of department heads who could very well, with efficient administrative leadership, be freed of many of the responsibilities that now keep them from performing the duties that would be most obvious for them. In most cases they are the specialists who are in such short supply and who could give the assistance to junior teachers who would be needed in this connection.

Mr. B. Newman (Windsor-Walkerville): Mr. Chairman, under this vote, I would like to ask of the hon. Minister if he is aware of the recommendation made by the Ontario physical fitness study committee in its report submitted to the government in 1961? The recommendation asked that action be taken to bring about better co-ordination, communication joint planning and pooling of resources among provincial government departments, local authorities or voluntary agencies.

I refer to the construction of gymnasias and gymnasias facilities in communities. The community quite often approaches The Department of Agriculture to get financial assistance and, because of having to approach several departments, often finds itself quite confused. Were the approach to be made only to The Department of Education, where the grants that would normally come under the community centres branch—I think it is some branch of The Department of Agriculture—then the community would not be so confused.

The authorities would simply go to one central body and obtain the grant for the construction of the gymnasium. In my own community it was the construction of a swimming pool that necessitated the board of education and the recreation department to set up sort of a phoney community centre on paper to be able to get that grant.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, I am not really familiar with the particular situation. I think the hon. member is referring to The Community Centres Act under The Department of Agriculture, not the community programmes branch of The Department of Education. The only observation I have to make here is that it is not often that this is related to the actual school building programme as far as gymnasias are concerned. It is, in many areas, as far as swimming pools are concerned; but usually this is with the community centres branch and the individual community itself.

I would be quite pleased to look into this if there are occasions when the school grants form part of the programme, but I have not heard of this happening where the community centre programme is also involved. I would be pleased to look into it. I do not really recall this happening on any occasion. We have made a point, though, of informing the trustees that we feel that the facilities of the schools should be available for recognized community recreational activities. We have made this quite clear to them.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, if I may follow through with this. One of the other recommendations made by the same report was that playrooms adaptable to gymnasiums be provided in all elementary schools. This, I presume, would come under school planning building research. Has the department followed through and made any suggestion that facilities in new schools being constructed be multi-purpose facilities?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Yes, Mr. Chairman, this probably would come under school planning and design, but we have encouraged the elementary boards to have—as we call it—multi-purpose rooms for both physical and recreational activities; and also to use it for auxiliary instruction if the timetable permits. I could go into this at great length. We also think, in the whole area of school design, we should perhaps become more flexible in our approach to size of room allocation and so on to accommodate team teaching; as well as the variations we may be finding in classroom sizes, but it is a big subject.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, if I may follow through with this same topic, may I suggest to the hon. Minister then that he establish a few experimental centres where this community—what is called now?—the community school set-up be promoted by the department so that a programme somewhat similar to the programme in the city of Flint be experimented with in various parts of the province, and I would suggest at this time that he possibly use my own community as an area in which this experiment could be conducted. The city itself is seriously considering the establishment of a community school; in fact, they actually do have the beginnings of one in one of the elementary schools where they have obtained grants and put on a small addition to the school and now it will be used—this is an elementary school by the way—and it will be used not only during the regular school day, but also during the evening for adults and other activities.

Vote 505 agreed to.

On vote 506:

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Chairman, in the programme branch the responsibility for educational television is referred to in item 7 and I have some questions to ask concerning this.

I understand that the hiring of staff for this began some weeks ago. I wonder if the hon. Minister would comment on some criticisms that have been voiced from both the CBC and from META as to the qualifications of the staff that are presently being brought together. I do not think there is any personal criticism at all, but merely the fact that surely the people who are going to put together this new educational television branch must have wide experience both in educational matters and in television programmes. I think it would be worth while if the hon. Minister would comment on the qualifications of the staff that he is gathering and what he hopes to do in the time that is available before we go into operation.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, quite frankly I am not aware of any criticism from the CBC.

Mr. Nixon: That word is perhaps not the one that I should have used; concern would be better.

Hon. Mr. Davis: I think perhaps there is some concern, or there was initially, which we have cleared up, as to the ultimate responsibility for educational television and that the responsibility should lie ultimately with a person who is a professional educator. This we have accepted by having it as part of the curriculum branch and responsible to the director of curriculum. At the same time, to get this programme off the ground we have placed emphasis on the personnel that has been acquired to date in the technical area because, frankly, the development of the programme depends on answers to technical questions. The whole problem of Channel 19, and where to locate antennas, and whether in fact it will function in this area, and the material that is required for the application to BBC, is primarily of technical character, so that we have initially acquired personnel who are competent to do this. But I think, in my statement, I hope I made it really abundantly clear that the ultimate responsibility would be in the hands of a professional educator, because it is obvious we want the content to be academically sound; in the final analysis this is what we are concerned about, and this is what we will achieve.

Mr. Nixon: I agree with the hon. Minister that the programme content is all that we should be primarily concerned with, and I wonder what sort of timetable is established for the development of the courses that would be provided. Is there any thought that programmes already established on tape and film from the United States or other areas would be purchased or leased for use?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, I thought I had said in my statement, that we would avail ourselves of the national film board material. We have actually a library now with some material; META has some excellent programmes that could be used again, and we would avail ourselves of any material that we felt was sound for use. There is no limitation on what material would be used as long as we feel it will fit into the academic programme.

Mr. Nixon: With the technical staff that you have had available for some time, have you an estimate what the first station in Metropolitan Toronto, channel 19, would cost to put into operation?

Hon. Mr. Davis: No, we have not had this yet, Mr. Chairman. This is what they are presently working on. We have to have this finalized for the BBC. We have not got any final figure on it yet.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, the youth committee in their travels to California were much impressed with the tape system of education used at San Mateo junior college. Is there any experimentation being done in this province with the use of tapes as teaching aids at the secondary school level?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, there is some experimental work going on. I visited the same library in San Mateo. It is confined at the moment to the junior college level. It is a fairly expensive programme. It has not been thoroughly evaluated yet and yet we think there is great merit in it. There has been no establishment of this nature in the secondary school programme here other than the language labs which are really individual situations that are quite comparable to the library facility at San Mateo. But this is one of the very intriguing and I think helpful things educationally that are coming. I think you can anticipate such development within our university structure and within our colleges of applied arts and technology. How general an application it will have, say, in the secondary system, I think we would have to evaluate very carefully.

Mr. Newman: In other years I have asked the hon. Minister if he would consider marking departmental exams on the local level. What is the drawback, really to the marking of the departmental exams on the local level? It certainly would facilitate things here in Toronto, where marking be done in each of the metropolitan areas of the province.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Well, Mr. Chairman, we could get into the whole question of the validity of external examinations in grade 13, but to be specific as far as this question is concerned, the prime reason why the papers are marked centrally is to try to maintain a uniform provincial standard. Now I think we will be able to get some idea as to the possibilities of extending the 25 per cent to a third which is in the committee's recommendation, and eventually to 50 per cent on the basis of local recommendations, when we see how the recommendations of this year tie into the final marks. We are really doing this, quite frankly, to be as fair to the students as possible and to have a uniform provincial standard.

I fully appreciate that there are some who feel that we could do this locally, that the individual teacher is quite competent to give the student a grade. I think, statistically that probably they could come fairly close, but we want to be very careful before a departure of this nature is made. We feel there is still some benefit in the principle of external examination. The day may come when we can mark these more readily on a local basis; I don't know, but we have made a fairly major advance in this present year by having 25 per cent of it done on a recommendation of the local people.

Mr. Newman: As a result of that policy can the students expect this year to receive the results of their departmental exams much earlier than they have in previous years?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, I will have to be very frank. With the numbers of students in grade 13 this year we are hoping to achieve the same goal as we did last year. It will not be easy to better the examination result release date of last year. The number of papers has increased very substantially and this is hard for people to understand. But the number of good markers has not increased apace, and the actual compilation of the material does not become any easier. I think we were fortunate last year to get the information out as rapidly as we did. I would point out this to the hon. member, that while this obviously causes a nervous strain to the student, I think the students now are making earlier and multiple applications to the universities, so that there is not quite the same confusion about getting into the university which existed three or four years ago. I think most students do know by the third week in August whether or not they have been accepted into the university to which they have applied.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, the hon. Minister mentioned that there was a difficulty in obtaining markers. Were it marked on the local level, you would have solved that problem, more than likely.

Hon. Mr. Davis: I put your proposition to the committee, I can assure you.

Mr. Newman: May I ask the hon. Minister then, if the department plans on allowing grade 13 students to write supplemental exams?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, this has been the subject of some discussion and I must say that I am quite sympathetic to a student in grade 13 who misses, say, one or two subjects. We have had several discussions and there has been no decision made on this partly because we are concerned about the ultimate place of grade 13. We are considering this at the present time, and also the great problem that is created by supplementals. I could give a long and detailed explanation of this, but if the hon. member realizes that if they get the results, say, the first week in August, the students have been out of school, there is no opportunity for a further period of instruction. The student would be given, perhaps, two or three weeks to review certain material on his own, and it might mean that by the time these papers were marked again and compiled, it would be well on into the middle of September or the later part of September, before the supplemental results would be available to the student. Because the schools would not be functioning, the student would have to do whatever studying he could on his own, without any additional help.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, it would still be better to have the student do all that on his own and save himself a whole year.

Hon. Mr. Davis: If it were possible to do it. As I say, we are very sympathetic to this problem, but there are difficulties in the way of trying to solve it.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Minister, being sympathetic does not help that youngster who is to be deprived of one year of education at the university, simply because he has been held back by one subject, especially when it happens to be English. Universities generally will not admit students unless they have English.

Now, the next is under item 8, the centennial youth travel programme. May I suggest to the hon. Minister that he extend this programme and accept students who do not necessarily come from the top level of the class—the top bracket of the class, the first-class students—but accept some of the students who may be just barely pass-mark students; because they, more than likely, would benefit a little more by this programme than would those who are simply top-notch students.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, the selection, quite frankly, varies from school to school. Some of them do it on the basis of drawing lots. There is no hard-and-fast rule as far as academic requirement is concerned. It is a very difficult task for teachers to select those who will be privileged to participate in this programme, but in many schools that we know about the academic line has not been drawn. It has been done on the basis of what youngsters might be interested. To a degree, I think you might say it has been based on the flip of a coin, although, quite frankly, there are some schools who have selected their best students, because they feel they perhaps might benefit more from it. I think this is one of their reasons. We have left this primarily up to the school authorities themselves to determine what youngsters will participate.

I should point out also, that this is a shared programme with the federal government. We think it has been very worthwhile to date, and we look forward to an extension of this up to and including the centennial year, when we hope many hundreds of young people in this province will be participating.

Mr. Newman: May I suggest at the same time to the hon. Minister that this not only be an interprovincial programme, but an exchange programme right in the province itself, so that students, say from Toronto could go up into Timmins and students from Timmins might come down into Kingston, students from Kingston might go to London, and so forth—an idea of twinning. The mayors and municipalities at one time used the idea of twinning municipalities and it was a very effective way of promoting goodwill between municipalities. Likewise, a means of passing on information from one municipality to learn of the problems of other municipalities.

Mr. J. R. Knox (Lambton West): Mr. Chairman, in this programmes branch portion, I have some material here which I think might be interesting because it deals not only with programmes and particularly programme 5, but it also deals with the Indians and I think that also comes under this vote.

I think it is possible we could be witnessing the early start of some dividends from programme 5 in an area where it is extremely welcome. The union of Ontario Indians had a meeting at Moraviantown on May 15, and this meeting was reported extensively in the Chatham Daily News and the Windsor Star. I am especially interested in this fine group, because the present secretary is a young man from the riding of Lambton West, Simpson Brigham, who is also a councillor for the Walpole Indian reserve. He is one of the young men that I spoke of earlier this year as having enrolled in programme 5 at Windsor. Now since I spoke last, Mr. Brigham has successfully completed his grade 10 course and he is now enrolled for the fall term, to work to his grade 12 standing. His expressed intention of taking this course in the first place, was that he could work in Indian Affairs when he had properly educated himself. Because of this experience, he is realizing just how much can be learned through our Department of Education, and how much help he can get and give to his people.

At the meeting of May 15, the union met with Mr. Wilfred Pelletier, executive secretary of the Indian centennial advisory committee in Ottawa, who is presently on a nationwide tour to promote centennial projects among Indians. Out of this tour, any request to the centennial commission will be made under the voluntary programme established by the commission to assist in educational work among the Indians. I have the feeling that one of the real sparks of this union is its secretary, Mr. Brigham, and as a result of this meeting on May 15, the union will seek grants to finance a provincial conference in North Bay in August, to discuss various centennial ideas and finally select one or more.

One of their pet projects is to hold federal-provincial conferences of Indians across the country, of which only one has been held in the past. Said Mr. Brigham: "We know the government discusses us at its federal-provincial conferences; now we are going to get together to discuss them."

Many other projects were talked about, but two catch my imagination; one is a plan to set aside one day in each year, to be known as National Indian Day, beginning in 1967. The other is the possibility of establishing an Indian library and a cataloguing of Indian songs, stories and legends. In connection with this, Mr. Brigham was able to tell me that back about 1910 or 1912, he thought that the annual report of The Department of Education contained several very valuable and authentic reports, or stories, or legends, of Indian personalities, which were very valuable and which he felt he could not procure anywhere else; and he would so much like to be able to get those to refer to them. I did a little research of my own library and it established the fact that such fine records do in fact exist but they are contained not in the actual report of the Minister itself, but in archaeological reports which were published from 1886 to 1928, as appendices to the Ministers' reports. Now, sir, these are available in any first-class library. In the area in which Mr. Brigham lives he will have access to at least three such libraries.

I noted that it was stated at the Moravian-town meeting, that Indians are misunderstood and misrepresented by a great many Canadians and that one of the great goals before this union of Ontario Indians is to help the white people to understand them better, their culture, their background and their tradition.

While Simpson Brigham was in Toronto on May 17 and 18, he inquired if I could help him get display and information material on all adult education programmes from The Department of Education here, with someone to explain them at one or several conferences of Indians to be held across the province. You see, this is as a result of his own participation in these programmes.

I may say that the co-operation I received from the department of yours, Mr. Minister—through the Chairman—was most commendable. In order to see this young man, one official had to forego most or all of his lunch hour, but see him he did and Mr. Brigham was most happy about the arrangements he was able to make. Beyond this he has revealed to me—and I do not know if he revealed this to the department or not—that he hopes to get programme 5 courses set up on certain Indian reserves, Walpole being one example.

He also asked me to see if he could get someone to set up a series of courses in councillor training—and that councillor is municipal councillor—so that Indian councillors could be trained in parliamentary procedure and efficient methods of handling resolutions and bylaws. Again I appealed to The Department of Education officials and again got a hearty and eager response. As a result a regional representative from London will call upon Mr. Brigham at his home where all of Mr. Brigham's ideas can be thoroughly discussed, and, if possible arrangements made for a course or courses on this subject operated by The Department of Education.

I think that this demonstrates one more avenue, this time education, through which this government is helping the Indian reach his proper place in the life of this great province, and as I said earlier this year, I believe that if we will listen to the Indian and help him when and where he wants help, he will solve a great many of his own problems.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Mr. Chairman, there are two, perhaps a third point, that fall into this vote, which I would like to raise with the hon. Minister.

The first one has to do with the programme that he has announced in connection with educational TV. In general terms, and without going to great length—I will leave that to the government backbenchers—I would like to commend him for the start that has been made on this programme. I can recall some years ago when we were discussing the possibilities of the use of TV in connection with coping with the explosion of population at the university level, I raised the question whether or not the practice that had been adopted in Quebec—of grants being made available to the universities as an incentive to the use of TV—would not be a good practice here in Ontario. From that point forward, apparently, we have moved a considerable distance. But I wonder if the hon. Minister could give any assurance to the House: Are the plans envisaged to secure channel 19 by application some time later this year from the BBC; are these routine? Has the BBC indicated that the government will be granted channels for educational purposes and, therefore, it is just simply a matter of making an application and you get it?

And in relation to that, do the regulations lay down, and, if so, what are the limits in which you can go in educational material? Without dwelling on it at great length and letting my imagination lead us too far, one can envisage an argument arising as to exactly what does fall in the category of educational TV and therefore what it is appropriate should fall under the direction of a provincial government in a field that might be construed as "propagandizing the people of the province." I wonder if the hon. Minister would comment on this.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, I think I should make it clear, I do not think it is a routine situation. The policy of the BBC has been not to issue licences to governments but there has never been an application for an ETV channel, and we have had some unofficial discussions about the policy with the chairman of the BBG. My impression is, and it is just an impression, that they are very sympathetic to the idea of an ETV channel in the Toronto area. Whether the policy will be laid down as to whether or not they will grant this to a provincial department, has not been determined.

One purpose of our application to the board will be to have this matter resolved. I would think, once again from the informal discussions, that the limits or the policy will be laid down by the BBG as to the type of programme that will be allowed on the particular channel. I do not think there is any doubt that they will impose some ground rules. I cannot tell the hon. member specifically what they will be, but I am sure there would be some. In fact, we would like to have some.

Mr. MacDonald: One other aspect of the whole ETV programme that I look forward to with considerable satisfaction is the involvement of private stations. There is a great deal of soul-searching and discussion, particularly among people in the business today, as to the quality of TV broadcasts and the whole tendency of the medium to aim at the lowest common denominator and be attached pretty closely to commercial interests.

It would seem to me, since this would fall into the category, no doubt, of Canadian content, that the development of certain programmes that would be available on a local private TV station, available for the schools, might even develop an interesting communion between the parent and the pupil in that the parent might be able to see the programme at home. It is my guess that some of the programmes which might be most kindly described at the moment as "fillers" could usefully be replaced by educational programmes that were both entertaining and educational.

The second point I want to raise with the hon. Minister is that in this year's presentation of the Toronto and district labour committee for human rights on behalf of a list of some 19 community organizations, their concluding paragraph read as follows:

We would suggest also that a greater effort be made to involve The Department of Education in the human rights educational programme. The elementary and secondary schools provide a splendid forum for human rights education. It would be well to prevail upon The Department of Education to consider the introduction of course material designed to promote greater knowledge of racial, religious and ethnic groups throughout our community in the world. A greater insight and understanding of pluralistic composition of our society is an indispensable element in democratic citizenship.

I wonder if the hon. Minister has given any consideration to this? Is there any prospect of a fuller integration of the educational material of the Ontario human rights commission in our school curriculum, where we would meet what everybody concedes to be the long-term answer to discrimination, namely, a change of attitudes on the part of the people in the community?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, there is no specific programme with respect to curriculum yet but over the past three or four months now, we have been distributing from the department—on the first occasion at the request of the Minister personally—the human rights bulletin to these schools.

We had a very interesting response. For example, the hon. member will recall the issue that was devoted to the Indian problem.

I had scrapbooks from one school in the Ottawa area from every student in the class, addressed to the Minister; it had pictures of the Indians' home yesterday—which was the wigwam; today—and it was not a very flattering picture; and tomorrow—and I saw homes of $40,000-$50,000, where these youngsters were envisaging the Indians might be living in the future. It was really a very interesting experience and this all came about because of the human rights bulletin that we distributed.

We have also sent out the most recent one, but there has not been to date a formal integration of this into the programme, and we are quite concerned about this. We have adopted this method, at least for the time being, of bringing this to the attention of the school system.

Mr. MacDonald: I am very interested in that scrapbook; I would suggest to the hon. Minister of Education that he pass it on to his colleague, the hon. Minister of Energy and Resources Management (Mr. Simonett), who thinks that Indians like to continue living in wigwams in the 20th century.

Is this the appropriate estimate to raise the question of free textbooks?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Not really. It should be under the legislative grants, but I have no objection to it here, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MacDonald: Well, if I may raise it here, Mr. Chairman; basically, I do not think there is any doubt but that there is very widespread support, at all levels, and particularly the parent level, for the proposition of free textbooks. But I have been a little disturbed by a number of comments I have heard, particularly from teachers—perhaps along the line that my hon. friend from Brant raised this afternoon—as to whether or not there are not inefficiencies and costly factors creeping into this that would be ignored because, after all, the government is paying.

It was all rather neatly summed up, and perhaps I can make my point by referring to a letter—something of a circular letter, I think—that I received a few months ago from John Strebig, who is speaking on behalf of the Etobicoke secondary schools association of English heads.

He pointed out that the concern had reached the point that the Ontario secondary school teachers' federation had set up a committee to study the issue and to make representations to the hon. Minister and, indeed, he expressed some unhappiness that the hon. Minister had extended the free textbooks further throughout the high schools without awaiting the representations from the OSSTF.

His complaint, I think, could be put in two categories: one was that the system is inefficient and wasteful, the cost of ordering, marking, storing, distributing and collecting and checking texts is exorbitant and unnecessary, in addition to which it takes a great deal of time by school staffs who, apparently, are getting more and more burdened with administrative details far beyond the days when I was a school teacher.

Secondly—and I personally respond to this—the idea that a student does not own the text, therefore he is told that he cannot mark it. If a text is something that I am studying, I consider it a work sheet and mark it accordingly. It is in my possession and is mine alone, and perhaps everybody else will be unhappy with its appearance, but that is not the point. The student is forbidden from doing this in most instances, because it is not his property. Indeed, he adds, in the course of his letter:

All teachers, but especially English teachers and even the department's English inspector, condemn the idea of expanding the present grant text system.

My question to the hon. Minister would be, after the experience we have had in the system so far, are these criticisms justified? What can be done to correct them—and why did he not await the representations from a body like the OSSTF?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, actually I met with Mr. Strebig and one or two others. I also met a formal group from the OSSTF when this policy was announced, if hon. members will recall, in September of 1963, when we introduced the policy for grades and 10—

Mr. MacDonald: I think there was an election going on.

Hon. Mr. Davis: I understand there was at that time.

Mr. MacDonald: No association whatsoever.

Hon. Mr. Davis: It was indicated at that time that this would be extended into the senior grades in the following year and I think even the OSSTF, in fairness, acknowledged that they had let it lapse themselves before bringing it to our attention, and they did this after the decision was made. It was not a case of not waiting until they made their representations. However, after their representations were made we set up a joint committee—composed of personnel from the curriculum branch and a representative committee from the OSSTF—to go into the problem of textbooks. Quite frankly, there is an economic saving on the broad provincial scale; there is no question about this. The duplication of orders will decrease and the purchasing costs will be less. The problem that arises, and it comes primarily from the English teachers—and I have every sympathy with their concern—is that there may be a certain rigidity in the selection of textbooks available to them. It is our intention through the joint meetings with the teaching profession to try to resolve this the best we can. We think we have made the grants sufficiently generous that, in the English subjects, it will be possible for the boards to provide in paperback form, which I know appeals to the hon. member for Brant, many of the English novels so that the student can have these to keep. After all, they are only 50 cents—or perhaps $1 in some cases—and we think the grants, after the system has been in operation, will be sufficient so that the students can have these.

We recognize this problem. You have to examine the disadvantages with the advantages, and we think the advantages outweigh the disadvantages that will be experienced. We think also that we can effectively work out the problems in co-operation with the OSSTF as the scheme develops.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, may I ask of the hon. Minister if he has any intention of carrying this textbook programme into grade 13?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, there is no intention—certainly at this present time—to carry it into grade 13 until we have resolved the overall problem of grade 13 with the possibility of the general and advanced levels and also with the possibility that is recommended in the grade 13 committee report of the grade 12 structure, and so on. We thought it advisable not to advance it into grade 13 at this time.

Mr. A. E. Thompson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Chairman, could I ask a question of the hon. Minister? Under examinations. I have had about three cases that have been sent to me in connection with children who have physical difficulties in writing examinations. One of them is an eye difficulty and another has a type of word blindness which apparently makes it difficult to spell properly. From all I gather from the principal and the teacher, this is a very conscientious young student. They were of the opinion that he never would be able to spell too well, and if his examination papers were to go to a central location where the person doing the marking does not know his particular problem, I presume he would fail. What is your procedure in such cases?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, I want to make it very clear: When there are exceptional circumstances such as this, and they are brought to the attention of the department, the revising board takes these matters into consideration. There is no question about this at all.

Mr. Thompson: I have three of these. Do they write to the department or the principals?

Hon. Mr. Davis: The principal should communicate this to the department.

Mr. Thompson: Thank you.

Mr. H. S. Racine (Ottawa East): Mr. Chairman, on the question of textbooks, I have obtained this afternoon from the assistant Deputy Minister a copy of circular number 69 regarding textbooks. I have had many communications from people in my area regarding this, and I think now is the time to say a few words about it.

I think, for the record, I would like to read paragraph 2 of circular number 69:

The extension of the policy of providing all texts in grades 11 and 12, as well as in all grades from kindergarten to grade 10, inclusive, according to previous regulations, is an integral part of a carefully considered programme to provide equality of educational opportunity for the youth of Ontario.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this memorandum does not state anywhere that private secondary schools are excluded. Everyone I have talked to in my area was left under the impression that this applies to all secondary school students. It might be useful to tell hon. members of this Legislature that there are a number of private high schools that are not operated by religious orders. I believe there is one—of which our friend, the hon. member for Russell (Mr. A. B. R. Lawrence), is a member of the board administration—that falls in that category.

All those private high schools do not participate in this new plan. My main criticism, Mr. Chairman, is that Reverend Father Kavanagh, principal of St. Patrick's college, on behalf of five high schools in the area, wrote to the hon. Minister of Education on February 23, regarding the free texts. Now, not having received a reply, Father Kavanagh wrote again to the hon. Minister. I think the date of his last letter was April 13. I know the hon. Minister is a busy man with plenty of problems, but it is hard to explain why to this date Father Kavanagh has not had a reply to his letter or his letters.

Mr. Chairman, I want to make a few comments on that part of the statement that reads as follows, and I would like to repeat the phrase that I have read from circular No. 69, that the intention is to "provide equality of educational opportunity for the youth of Ontario."

I would like to say that in many other respects, Mr. Chairman, these high schools are treated in exactly the same way as the public high schools. For instance, films issued by the department are made available to these schools; all students are eligible for scholarships; all teachers have to obtain the same diplomas in order to teach in these schools; the regulations in force are the same as in public high schools.

Now, the parents, who are also taxpayers at all levels, contribute to the cost of education in the province and, adding insult to injury, these schools have to pay a $200 fee for the services of the department inspector.

I would like to ask the hon. Minister through you, Mr. Chairman, first, why Father Kavanagh's letters were ignored and, secondly, why these free texts are supplied to non-resident students when they are not supplied to students in private high schools.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, since the announcement from the department, the book stores in the Ottawa area do not carry those textbooks, sir, and that tends to complicate matters for the administrators who already have enough problems. I wonder if the hon. Minister would care to comment.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, I understood that Father Kavanagh, or some of the group, had been informed about the difficulties of this but I will check and make sure that he is informed.

I think the hon. member appreciates that we make every effort to assist the private schools through inspection. The teachers do not have to have the same qualifications—the hon. member should know this—they are not required to have the same qualifications as in the public school system. It has not been a policy of government to make grants available to the private schools, and this applies to the private school whether it be in the Ottawa area, whether it be St. Andrew's college or Upper Canada college. Private schools generally do not receive government grants. This is the policy, Mr. Chairman, and this is the difficulty. The textbook grants, I think, must be considered in the same way as other types of financial assistance.

Mr. Racine: I would like to make one more point. I believe that there is a difference here; this grant is not made to the schools—this grant is made to the students.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I would like the hon. Minister to tell me whether any students that are not attending any of the schools but may be taking a course—a correspondence course—would they be entitled to the free texts? I would like to make myself clear. This grant goes to the student and not to the school.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, there is quite a distinction. The correspondence course is treated as a government school, so that if the person is communicating and taking his work he is taking it from the department, he is not taking it through a public or a separate or a private school, he is taking it from a departmental school. So there is quite a distinction, Mr. Chairman.

The grants are not made to pupils; the grants are not made to the parents. In some provinces, grants are made directly to the parents or the homeowners. We have not adopted that policy here in Ontario. The grant is made to the school board, the school board is required to provide the textbooks for the youngsters. Mr. Chairman, this is the policy of the government, that grants are not to be made available to private schools. It really is as simple as that.

Mr. Racine: Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the comment of the hon. Minister that he thought that someone had answered Father Kavanagh's letters.

Hon. Mr. Davis: I will make sure that Father Kavanagh knows about it.

Mr. Racine: I think he knows this afternoon. Possibly in the future, any announcement of that kind should be made so that everybody understands exactly what it means, because I have had letters from other sources and I have some editorials from the newspapers, and in every case no mention is made that those grants are not available to private schools.

I think possibly it might be better for the record if in any future announcement it might be specified that the certain type of high schools do not share in these grants.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, may I ask the hon. Minister, are grants made available to training schools—textbook grants?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Which type of school, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. Newman: The schools under The Department of Reform Institutions.

Hon. Mr. Davis: In training schools—and I would have to check this with the hon. Minister of Reform Institutions (Mr. Grossman)—I understand that all materials are supplied in their schools. I am not really familiar with it.

Mr. Newman: Does The Department of Education supply them with any materials at all?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Not that I know of, Mr. Chairman, no.

Mr. Newman: May I ask the hon. Minister if grants are available for boards of education that conduct summer schools, that is schools in the summertime, to enable a student who may have failed one or two subjects to catch up on that subject?

Hon. Mr. Davis: No, the summer school programme, Mr. Chairman, has been operated to date on the responsibility of the local board. There have been no grants, up to this point at least, for summer school programmes.

Mr. Newman: Then may I suggest to the hon. Minister that that is one of the reasons why some communities have been a little backward in establishing summer school programmes. Were grants made available to the boards of education then more than likely we would find programmes in practically every large community—summer school programmes to enable the student to save one whole year of schooling.

While I am on my feet, Mr. Chairman, may I ask the hon. Minister about the $17,000 under physical education services, what does that include? Does that pay for the salary of the individuals in the physical education branch of the department?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, this does not include salaries. This is the general item for the physical education programme in the department. It does not include salaries.

Mr. Newman: Where could we discuss the physical education portion?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Maybe two areas, Mr. Chairman. I would think that perhaps the appropriate vote would be 511.

Mr. Newman: Thank you, Mr. Minister.

Then may I ask the hon. Minister if the department is prepared at this time to follow the recommendation as presented to him by the committee on physical fitness? The recommendation was that the present time allotment is minimum and should be interpreted for grades 7 to 13 as 120 minutes a week. They suggest that the word "suggested" be changed to "required"; and also that physical education be restored as a compulsory subject in grade 13. Is The Department of Education considering any changes in the physical education programme in both elementary and secondary schools?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, this matter has, of course, been reviewed from time to time. While I think there are many of us who are personally sympathetic to physical fitness or education programmes in the school, at the same time certain priorities must be established. I think there is very substantial debate as to whether grade 13 should be compulsory. I do not want to let my personal views enter this. I might say that I am enthused about this, but I think I would have to be very frank and say that perhaps in the grade 13 year if, in the opinions of the principal and the school administration, they felt that physical education was not essential for the grade 13 year, that I personally would not object.

We have also discovered from our physical education people that the amount of time being devoted to physical education in the school programme is on the increase and there is a greater interest in it. Now it does not perhaps come up to the time allotment that has been suggested in the physical fitness report, but I think there is progress being made.

Mr. Newman: May I suggest to the hon. Minister, then, that he consider the physical education in grade 13 as being a prerequisite to anyone intending to take a degree course in physical and health education.

Mr. S. Lewis (Scarborough West): Mr. Chairman, because of the affection which we on this side of the House have for The Department of Reform Institutions, I was rather intrigued by a question in which the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville suggested that in view of the widespread commendation for the hon. Minister in taking over the educational requirements in Ontario hospital schools, would he or his department consider entering the educational field in the training schools? It is not as far-fetched as it seems, because, of course, the United Kingdom system is essentially organized in that fashion, which thereby places the emphasis on the educational and training aspects, an emphasis which was obviously thought desirable in the Ontario hospital school system.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, this is an area of considerable discussion and I am not, quite frankly, prepared to pass an opinion on it. I think it is a very valid question in a general sense, but I do not think I can comment whether we could be prepared or whether the department would feel this advisable. We may perhaps be going to do this, I gather from past reports, in the Ontario hospital schools. Whether this could be extended to reform institutions I think would have to be studied.

Mr. Racine: Mr. Chairman, I was pleased to hear the hon. Minister announce that he was having a meeting shortly with the Minister of Education of the province of Quebec and some of his officials. I have no doubt that this meeting will be very fruitful.

I have two questions of the hon. Minister. First, will some of the radio broadcasts and television programmes be prepared in the French language? Second, would it be possible to discuss with Monsieur Gerin Lajoie the possibility of a joint programme with The Quebec Department of Education, especially on certain subjects?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, the items that the hon. member has mentioned, of course, are two of many that will be discussed with Monsieur Gerin Lajoie. The invitation has been extended. We believe that he is going to come with his officials and, quite frankly, Mr. Chairman, if the hon. member has other subjects that he feels might be discussed between the two groups we would be very pleased to have these suggestions.

Mr. Nixon: The hon. Provincial Secretary (Mr. Yaremko) yesterday introduced amendments to The Liquor Control Act of Ontario and in his introductory remarks he indicated that when the hon. Minister of Health brought down his estimates we were going to hear of a programme on alcoholism education, anti-alcoholism, the like of which has never been seen in North America. I would think that if this programme is going to be nearly as significant as is predicted, the place of The Department of Education in it would be paramount.

The hon. Minister of Health (Mr. Dymond) may very well have the money and the facilities to look after those who are already afflicted with alcoholism but if there is going to be any significant decrease in its incidence it seems to me that a programme in the schools, a factual programme drawing to the attention of the students the relevant statistics and facts, is something that would have to be introduced. I understand that it is already a part of certain aspects in the teaching of health, but in my own view this is inadequate. I wonder what part the hon. Minister of Education will play in this new programme.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, I think the hon. Minister of Health, if he is going to announce such a programme, will be doing so. I would as soon—

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): Does the hon. Minister not know about it?

Hon. Mr. Davis: —if there is such a programme, if the schools are to participate, I think the same co-operation, Mr. Chairman, will exist as has existed in the distribution of material with respect to smoking and the problems of cancer that result. That material was prepared by The Department of Health and has been distributed very widely to the schools. I might report, Mr. Chairman, that the most popular piece of literature, apparently from the reaction we have had from the schools, is a comic book that went out.

Mr. W. D. McKeough (Kent West): Particularly in Brant!

Mr. Nixon: As a matter of fact, the hon. Minister's distribution of anti-smoking pamphlets is not particularly popular in Brant; neither are the efforts of the Minister of Health and Welfare at the federal level.

But I would like to say, before I leave this subject, that if the educational part of the programme that we will look forward to hearing about later, are not paramount, then the programme will be completely inadequate. I would like to know what instructions go with the packet of material on smoking—the anti-smoking literature—so that it will be used in the schools; or is it just mailed to the schools?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, generally speaking, the material is sent out with a letter asking the principal and the staff to bring this to the attention of the students and to spend a certain amount of time pointing out the dangers that are involved from a statistical or factual point of view. They try to stay out of any other type of discussion. They are also asked if they want further material to distribute.

This is made available to them primarily on an information basis. We try to make available as much information as we can to the students. I cannot report to the House, I have no idea, how effective this programme is.

Mr. Nixon: What education is there on alcoholism? I notice a grant is provided for the Ontario temperance association. I suppose this would assist them to visit the schools; is this the effort that the hon. Minister is putting forth?

Hon. Mr. Davis: As far as alcoholism is concerned, Mr. Chairman, we co-operate with the addiction research foundation; we make reference materials, manuals and films available to the teachers. The two guides in common use are the teachers' manual for alcohol education by Mr. Spears produced by our physical education branch and an alcohol studies guide for teachers prepared by the alcoholism research foundation of Ontario. These materials are supplied to the schools in quantity.

Mr. Nixon: Is it a formal programme to have the temperance federation visit the schools?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, I am speaking now from memory. I do not believe it is a formal part of the programme to have the temperance federation visit the schools.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if the hon. Minister could tell us if his department's approach is a prohibition approach in line with the so-called temperance federation, or if it is an approach to promote understanding. While his colleague, the hon. Provincial Secretary, got up yesterday afternoon and said we are making certain changes in our liquor legislation which are hardly a prohibition approach, I wonder if The Department of Education is promoting, through its grants to the temperance federation, the prohibition approach. Are we hiding our heads in the sand and suggesting in the schools that the approach is prohibition, whereas the hon. Provincial Secretary gets up and says that the approach is reasonable liquor laws, with reasonable supervision and proper control? What real role does The Department of Education play in this, if any?

Hon. Mr. Davis: We give a grant to the Ontario temperance federation to assist with their youth work. The material is distributed to the schools and the attitude generally taken by the school people is one of reason, not one of prohibition. In fact, we would like to take the position that we do this with all subjects in the schools.

Mr. Singer: My hon. friend mouths very nice words, but my hon. friend knows, as I do, Mr. Chairman, that if he finances the efforts of the temperance federation, even though the temperance federation calls itself a "temperance" federation in the proper English sense of the word, it is in fact a prohibition movement.

What I would like to know, and what I think the people of Ontario are entitled to know, is whether or not The Department of Education is promoting the prohibition aspect while his colleague, the hon. Provincial Secretary, is promoting, in the true sense of the English word, "temperance"; or whether in fact The Department of Education is advancing its money to promote a real understanding of the use and abuse of alcohol.

The day is long since past in this province where any politician can stand up and say the answer to the liquor problem is to prohibit people from drinking. We have recognized, and I am sure my colleague the hon. Minister of Education recognizes as well as anyone in the province of Ontario, that you can no longer prohibit. He must encourage real temperance if he believes in the things in which his colleague, the hon. Minister in charge of The Provincial Secretary's Department, believes. He can no longer prohibit the use of alcohol.

Are we spending money in one department to advocate prohibition, whereas in another department we are encouraging reasonable use, temperate use; and through his colleague the hon. Minister of Health, control, treatment and that sort of thing? Are we having again, as we have seen so often, two or three different departments going off in two or three completely opposite directions? I think the hon. Minister of Education should be prepared to be quite frank and honest in this field, as he is in so many other fields, and really tell us what he is doing by giving these grants to the Ontario temperance federation.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, actually I would think discussion of the grant to the federation would more properly come under the miscellaneous grants, but I can tell the hon. member that I do not know how much experience he has had with the Ontario temperance federation, but this grant is given for the Toc-alpha programme, which is a programme with young people primarily, quite frankly, in various churches. They have seminar meetings, discussions and annual meetings. It is an attempt, as I understand it—and having had some personal experience with it—to bring the problems of alcoholism, not in a prohibition way, to the attention of the young people. I might say it is done, in many instances, through the church. Quite frankly, Mr. Chairman, it is a very excellent programme and I make no apologies for providing funds to the temperance federation to assist in its sponsoring. I am sure that there are hon. members opposite, Mr. Chairman, who have had some experience with this programme and know what it is doing for the many young people who are participating.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, I am impressed with the sincerity with which my friend, the hon. Minister of Education promotes this programme. As I understand it, this description of Toc-alpha is taken from the Greek letters T and A, and it is not a temperance approach. T, as this association uses it, is total, and A, as it uses it, is abstainer. It means total abstainer.

What I am trying to figure out, Mr. Chairman, is this. Is the government out of one side of its mouth advancing money to a group that believes there should be total abstention from alcohol, and out of the other side, through the hon. Minister of provincial affairs, getting up and saying that our liquor laws must be more lenient, and does one side not know what the other side is doing? Does the government believe that only in Education we should be total abstainers, but that in the hon. Provincial Secretary's department our liquor laws are not those that the people of the province believe in?

Let us be honest, let us be frank and let us be completely clear about this. In one branch we are supporting a group that says drink is bad no matter to what extent it goes. Do we support a group which says the only answer is total abstention—Toc-alpha, TA, total abstention? I say that he and his colleague, the hon. Provincial Secretary, are working at cross purposes. I am suggesting, and all the applause in the world and your colleagues—

Mr. McKeough: That is nonsense.

Mr. Singer: No, it is not nonsense. My hon. colleague from Kent West is taking the typical Tory ambivalent approach. They want to be all things to all people at the same time. Does the government believe that what the hon. Provincial Secretary said as early as yesterday afternoon makes sense or does the government believe that the hon. Minister of Education tonight makes sense? Does the hon. Minister of Education believe that you can promote total abstention on one side and have reasonable liquor laws on the other side?

In other words, let us get off the fence, let us be reasonable. What approach are you taking in The Department of Education, what approach is the hon. Provincial Secretary taking and what approach is the hon. Minister of Health later going to take?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to prolong this. I would point out that in my understanding of the statement of the hon. Provincial Secretary yesterday, he did not extend the privileges as far as liquor is concerned to young people, and this is dealing with young people, many of them

16 or 17 years of age. As I understand this programme it is not a case of total abstention, it is a case of—

Mr. Singer: TA, the letters are all there.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, if the hon. member wishes to go to some of their meetings, attend them and see just exactly what these young people are doing, I would be delighted to arrange this for him. I have been to one or two of their meetings and I say to the House they are doing a worthwhile job. It is not just related to alcohol, it is forming into a group where these young people come together to exchange ideas and some of their discussions go far beyond the problem of alcohol.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, I can only say that the words of the hon. Minister speak for themselves. The government through one face, through the face of its very eminent representative, the hon. Minister of Education, espouses one word, while his colleague, the hon. Provincial Secretary espouses another and his colleague the hon. Minister of Health is going to get up in a few days and announce this great programme that he is going to take in attacking the dangers of alcoholism. Let all you fellows get together and emerge with one programme and not be phoney any longer.

Hon. A. Grossman (Minister of Reform Institutions): Mr. Chairman, there is nothing at all incompatible with the policy of the government. What is incompatible are the things that the Liberal Party have over the years been attempting to do by way of a liquor policy because it really has no liquor policy at all. The members keep talking about "sane liquor laws" but they will never lay out, chapter and verse, what sane liquor laws are. As a matter of fact, I am familiar also with the work which Toc-alpha does: and it does a wonderful work. There is nothing incompatible with, on the one hand, saying that if you can get along without alcohol through life that is a good thing for you, but if you are going to drink, this government is going to see to it that you are entitled to drink under respectable circumstances and in decent surroundings and there is nothing wrong with that.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, since we seem to have got into a liquor debate at this point with my good friend, the hon. Minister of Reform Institutions—

Mr. McKeough: Completely out of order.

Mr. Singer: It may well be completely out of order and I did not encourage the hon. Minister of Reform Institutions here. Mr. Chairman, if we are going to get into this, let me say this, I think the government has a duty to present at least a joint face through The Department of Education, through The Department of the Provincial Secretary, even through The Department of Reform Institutions, as my hon. friend gets into it, and through The Department of Health. Let us face it, we have a serious problem in this province in relation to the consumption of liquor and the old problem that goes on here—

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, sir; the order of business tonight is the estimates of The Department of Education. The question of liquor is a very important matter and it is one which interests not only your party but the government of this province. With respect to the grants, and I gather that the debate arose over the grant of The Department of Education to an organization which represents a certain position with respect to the use of liquor, I think it is the position of the government to see that all aspects of a subject are explored and researched. Regardless of the position that anyone may take, this government has always accepted and advocated the policy that we want the whole subject researched. I would say that as long as the temperance federation exists we will accept its researches, it being an accepted and respectable organization, so that we may have—

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, with great respect to my hon. friend who rose on a point of order. He is answering an argument. There is no point of order that he has made as yet and I think that I had the floor and I think that I should continue to have the floor.

Mr. Chairman: The member, if he cares to debate this subject, may well do it in the Budget debate.

Mr. Singer: That may well be, sir.

Mr. Chairman: Now we will get on with the estimates.

Vote 506 agreed to.

On vote 507:

Mr. Thompson: I am sorry, Mr. Chairman, I—

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: If I may finish my remarks—

Mr. Thompson: Is that on a point of order, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. Chairman: You have been told.

Mr. Thompson: But do you not tell us if it is a point of order?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: It is a point of order.

Mr. Singer: He is debating, it is not a point of order. Mr. Chairman, if you are holding the submission is improper, then my hon. friend should sit down and I should continue.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: The point of order is simply this, that the debate which has been advanced by the hon. member for Downsview is completely out of order, and I, on behalf of the government, object to it being admitted at this point. I will simply add this comment that—

Mr. Singer: Oh no, Mr. Chairman, there is no comment—

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Chairman: Will the members be seated, please? This concludes the argument at the present time. We are going on with the estimates—vote 507.

Mr. F. R. Oliver (Grey South): What have we come to now?

Mr. Chairman: Vote 507.

Mr. Nixon: If you will permit me, Mr. Chairman, one remark on 506. It has been indicated that there should be some sort of adequate recognition as a centennial project by way of writing a history of the province of Ontario. This was raised last year and I was wondering if the hon. Minister has reached any conclusion on the subject. I had a bit of research done and apparently there was an official history of the province published in 1907 by a Mr. Fraser, and one published in 1928 by two authors, Middleton and London. It would appear that the time is now ripe for another history that would be brought up to date, and it might be advisable, as a centennial project, this might be commissioned as a part of the programme of our educational system. I was wondering if the hon. Minister has any thoughts on this.

I know that there has been some criticism, even by the school groups who come to this Chamber, that there is not an adequate publication to put into their hands having to do even with the history of these buildings or the history of this assembly. The hon. leader of the NDP mentioned some time ago in this debate the usefulness of some of the pictures and folders that had been brought out by the hon. Minister of Education, but it seems to me that we might have something more adequate for the visitors to this Chamber and also for the students across the province.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, on the two aspects: I talked to the hon. Provincial Secretary about The Commonwealth booklet which I think was rather well done this year—I take no credit, it was done by one of the officials in the department—and I think there is some thought being given to perhaps extending this or enlarging it and updating it, and making it available to the students and visitors who come to the Parliament buildings.

The observation made by the hon. member for Brant last year about an Ontario history has received consideration. I am not in a position to elaborate on this at this time, although we understood, too, that perhaps two or three other organizations are contemplating perhaps just not an Ontario history but a Canadian history as well, that is related to the centennial. We understand that there are perhaps two or three agencies that are interested and we are certainly concerned ourselves.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: On that point, Mr. Chairman, may I say this: that in presenting the history of Ontario we will do so neutrally and independently so that the people of this province can judge history in its proper light—in the same way as our donation to the temperance federation is given so that both sides of the question may be presented to the public.

Mr. E. W. Sopha (Sudbury): I am provoked to ask, since I have heard this gratuitous comment from the hon. House leader: He will present the history of the province neutrally and independently of what?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: That is a very good question; we will endeavour to do it and see that it is done to the best of everyone's ability.

Mr. Sopha: I still have not heard and I am asking for elucidation—and I may be a bit stupid tonight, but what was the meaning of the comment? "We will present"—I hope I paraphrase it correctly—"we will present the history of the province neutrally and independently." My question is, neutrally and independently of what? What is the end of the sentence?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: To the extent that anyone can produce an opinion independently.

Mr. Sopha: Well, I take it that what was meant—and it was meant to provoke us and we are suitably provoked—was that "we will write the history of the province and we will not give a forward place to the part of the Conservative Party." My reply is that the Liberal Party has played as great a part in the history of this province as has the Tory party.

Mr. Singer: Greater even.

Mr. Chairman: Will the member resume his seat and let us get on with the estimates? Vote 507.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. I would like to get on with the estimates. If, every time the Liberals get up and give something that the government thinks is out of order, the House leader gets up and gives something that is equally out of order, we are just playing games, so let us get on with the business. We have something to deal with when it comes up.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, on 506, I have just sent over to the hon. Minister of Education a pamphlet put out by the Michigan state Legislature. He can see how big an improvement it is over the seating plan that we have in the House here.

Mr. Chairman: I think the member could save that until after the House adjourns. He had his opportunity to speak.

Mr. Singer: Well, if we are on vote 507, why can he not say it now?

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, one of the big difficulties that the youth committee has found in their studies was a lack of an appreciable amount of guidance in the schools. We found that in the secondary schools there is generally a substantial amount, but that the individuals involved in the guidance of the schools were not always the best qualified. One of the suggestions was that guidance—rather than start at the secondary level—start right at the elementary level so that the youngster would have the advantage of instructors who would be well versed with the topic and be able to direct him into the phase of education which he would like to follow once he leaves the elementary school.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, we quite support this, we have an extensive programme now for both summer courses and a regular programme for the elementary teachers, particularly at the grade 8 level.

Mr. S. Lewis: Mr. Chairman, I have something to say on that in another vote, but I am a little disturbed about the hon. Minister's addendum, particularly at the grade 8 level. The need, it seems to me, for an interpretation in its broadest sense, of not merely indicating occupational or vocational patterns, but providing some kind of emotional centre or security for children, appropriately fits at the kindergarten, grade 1, grade 2, grade 3 level. The process of identification is profoundly important there and it seems to me that we have developed an emphasis in this province at the secondary school and grade 8 levels, which is doing very little to reveal the problems that exist at the very early and indispensable stages. I wonder whether it would not be possible to expand that kind of programme downwards?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, I think we were—and it is perhaps my fault—discussing the two aspects of guidance. I was referring primarily to the occupational aspect of it. This whole question of being able to guide or assist children right from kindergarten through grade 13 in the other sense, I think, is obviously needed. It is difficult to bring this about with many teachers with the numbers involved, but I think it is one that gives us all concern. It is related, to a degree, to the subject on which I know the hon. member is going to speak in a few moments.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, my hon. colleague, in his main remarks, made some reference to the upgrading of standards for public school teachers. He advocated, I think, very efficiently and very forcibly, the thought that we should be striving to have public school teachers at least with a BA degree. I listened very carefully to the hon. Minister's reply and I did not hear him deal with that. I wonder—because I know the hon. Minister is most interested in upgrading public school teachers—what progress is being made and what sort of plan the hon. Minister has in advancing along this line, and when he can anticipate that public school teachers throughout the province of Ontario will at least have the qualification of a Bachelor of Arts degree?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, I think the hon. member for Brant also related the fact that we have established a committee for elementary teacher training which has been studying this problem for some months. This year we have, as another step towards this ultimate goal, also made grade 13 the broad general requirement for admission to the teachers' colleges this fall, into the one-year programme, instead of two years from grade 12. This has been the next step. I cannot anticipate when the committee's report will be available; I think it is obvious that they will be headed in this general direction although it may be they will have other suggestions—that have been observed elsewhere—to make at the same time. We have two pilot projects this year as the hon. member for Brant knows. The course we are going to have here in Toronto for BA graduates will be arranged so that they will not be taking the regular programme. In this way we hope to interest more BA people in coming into the elementary field. We also have the pilot project in London which, I think, is a very interesting experiment. The students will actually have related courses at the teachers' college and at the Ontario college of education.

But I think, Mr. Chairman, in fairness, it would be unwise for me to attempt to pre-judge the opinions of the committee that has been established. There is no doubt that we are all in favour of the upgrading of the qualifications for our elementary school teachers.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, I commend the hon. Minister for his approach in this but I wonder why Ontario again, notwithstanding the words of the eminent gentleman on the front benches, seems to be lagging behind in some of the standards achieved in other provinces. The province of British Columbia, as I recollect from some reading that I have done quite recently, seems to have come awfully close to achieving this standard.

I have listened to the hon. Minister's various colleagues. Not only is this the leading province in Canada, it is the leading jurisdiction in North America, if not the western or the entire world, and I wonder how long we are going to take to advance at least to the same level as other jurisdictions in the Dominion of Canada.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, as I said earlier today, I do not really enthuse about comparing provinces. I should point out that BC and Alberta are both following the faculty of education policy that is prevalent, particularly in the state of California. But I should point out that I paid a visit to the faculty of education at the University of Alberta last September. I heard about this institution when I was at the CEA. I went out there to observe, along with Dr. Jackson, and we discovered that on paper they have an excellent programme. But we discovered also that they are faced with the same problem we are faced with here, that is the demand for teachers. There are many youngsters who go into the faculty of education at the end of grade 12, take two years of study and then are granted letters of permission to go out into the elementary field, and interestingly, into the secondary field as well—after two years within the faculty of education. I cannot tell you just how many of them there are. It is done, I think, in rather substantial numbers; and if you calculate this, two years from grade 12 is really not too far from the equivalent of one year from grade 13, as far as this province is concerned.

They carry on their programme in a different environment. There is no question about this and it may be that the committee will recommend a trend in this direction, but I think we have to be careful, because we read or we see something that is happening in some other jurisdiction, to naturally assume that it is all working very smoothly and they do not have their problems as well, because I can assure the hon. members they are all faced with this difficulty.

Mr. Singer: I appreciate the comments of the hon. Minister. He carefully avoided saying what they do in British Columbia. But perhaps the most vulnerable situation in Canada is the one in Alberta; and my hon. friend has many more facilities available to him than I have to obtain, just off the top of his head, the comparable statistics.

The ones that impressed me were the ones that emerged in the province of British Columbia. I cannot help but compare in this department, that is of such great importance to all of us, at least with the ten provinces of Canada. I have heard so often, and all of us have heard so often until we are bored with the statistics, that not only are we the greatest jurisdiction in Canada, we are the greatest in the whole world. But in The Department of Education, where we would hope we would be at least the leader in Canada, we apparently seem to fall far short.

It would seem to me, Mr. Chairman, that the sort of impression that one of the hon. Minister's predecessors conveyed to the province of Ontario, and I talk about Mr. Dunlop, was that we were satisfied with the little red schoolhouse, we were satisfied with just putting bodies behind schoolroom desks. This should have pushed the hon. Minister on. All Mr. Dunlop did in his time was claim that everything was great because all sorts of wonderful people emerged from the little red schoolhouse.

I am very pleased with the hon. Minister's immediate predecessor, the present Prime Minister (Mr. Robarts). He and the hon. Minister himself have long since departed from that sort of talk.

But I would have hoped that here in the province of Ontario we would at least be striving for what we see in British Columbia, what we see in California, what we see in the leading jurisdictions of the United States. We are paying good salaries to our teachers. My friend, the hon. member for Brant has outlined improvements that could and should be made, but today we are encouraging youngsters to come forward into the teaching profession; today we are encouraging, through challenge and through salary, a new invigoration into the science of teaching. I would have hoped that tonight the hon. Minister could have said that within a year or two years or five years we would anticipate that behind every school desk in the province of Ontario we will have a person with at least a university degree.

He has dodged this. He is a careful man and he is an artful man; he is the artful dodger and I think he evaded this issue very carefully. I would think we would have been proud to say that within a few years Ontario will really be the leader, at least in the Dominion of Canada.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to get into a lengthy debate with the hon. member for Downsview, because quite frankly I think he is speaking, to a degree, from a certain lack of knowledge as to what the qualifications are in other jurisdictions. For one thing, Mr. Chairman, many of the teachers in Alberta and British Columbia do not have BA's; they have their Bachelor of Education degrees and there is quite a distinction.

Mr. T. L. Wells (Scarborough North): Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the hon. member for Downsview if he realizes the number of extramural courses that are being taken by our present public school teachers; the number of summer courses, the in-service courses given by boards of education. I do not know of any other group in our society, any other professional group, that is as self-education conscious as this group.

I do not think the question is quite as black and white as the hon. member makes it. In other words, it probably will not for a long time come to the point that they should have a BA when they step into a public school classroom. It is a continuing process of education with teachers. I think this is desirable and I think that it should be said that there are many teachers, many excellent public school teachers who are really teaching our children, who have not BA's and who probably will never have them; but we pay tribute to the job they are doing and we could not get along without them, Mr. Chairman.

These people, a lot of them, form the backbone of our elementary school system. They have taken just as many extra-curricular courses in teaching as possible, but they have never arrived at the state where they can formally get a BA.

Now I think this needs to be said.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Scarborough North is trying to put words into my mouth to the effect that I am criticizing the dedication or the integrity or the zeal for further knowledge of our present teachers. He is barking up the wrong tree. I think we have in our teaching profession in Ontario the most dedicated group of people who are serving the public that we could possibly have. What I am suggesting is that the leadership and the initiative should come from our Minister, from our government—

Several hon. members: It is!

Mr. Singer: No, it is not. It is far short of that.

I am suggesting, Mr. Chairman, that we should be in the position to say that our teachers are going to be better. I am not denigrating for a moment from the dedication, the intelligence and the integrity of our present group of teachers, but I am suggesting that this Minister who clothes himself, and perhaps rightly, in the armour of a bright knight on a new charger, should be the agent to push our teaching profession to higher heights. I am suggesting that he is failing in this because he is prepared to accept the hollow mouthings of our hon. friend from Scarborough North.

Mr. J. R. Knox (Lambton West): Mr. Chairman, I might say that one of the difficulties with the hon. member for Downsview, is that he is talking about something of which he knows very little.

Mr. McKeough: Nothing!

Hon. W. A. Stewart (Minister of Agriculture): He says a lot about nothing.

Mr. Knox: The teachers we have in Ontario are as good as any teachers, if not better, but at least as good as any you will find in this country. Further, I may say that when the hon. member says "Why do they all not have BA's?"; why did he not say MA or PhD, because the letter they have at the end of their name is not the only criterion by which they are capable of educating our children.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, a remark like that cannot go unchallenged. Go across into the state of Michigan; you have to have a BA to teach in an elementary school. What do you need here? You teach in an elementary school with a grade 12. So you cannot compare the two at all.

Mr. Knox: There is not any teacher in the state of Michigan who can walk into our schools and do the job that our teachers are doing.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. MacDonald: We are going from bad to worse.

Mr. A. Carruthers (Durham): Mr. Chairman, I would just like to add a remark or two in this respect. I looked back tonight over some 31 years of teaching in an elementary school and I value my experience much more than a university degree. But I do congratulate the hon. Minister of the department on the steps that are being taken to promote higher qualifications for our teachers.

I myself have had the privilege, practically every summer up to the time I went into the political field, of taking advantage of those summer courses, which are most practical and have been most useful to me in my experience as a teacher. But I do not value my teaching services as I look back on my experience, because of the fact that I gained greater knowledge, greater values from an academic point of view from those courses. I look back at the success of my teaching upon the pupils that I turned out who have come to me years afterwards and said, "We appreciate what you have done for us in giving us the inspiration and the desire to go on and further our education."

Mr. Chairman, teachers are not necessarily produced by university education; teachers are born, in my estimation. You must have the proper attitude, you must have the personal qualification of understanding young people—

Mr. S. Lewis: Heredity?

Mr. Carruthers: A good deal of it is hereditary. In my own family the teaching profession goes back for many years and I think this is one of the attributes.

Mr. MacDonald: That is environment.

Mr. Carruthers: This does not mean that I do not urge that steps be taken to increase the qualifications of teachers. I would say this, Mr. Minister: I think rather than a BA degree, perhaps some special degree should be granted to teachers which would distinguish them from a general BA degree; because a BA degree in my estimation does not necessarily apply to any one profession. I think we should have a distinguishing degree which would mark teachers as a special group to give them prestige and standing in the field of education.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, I cannot let this series of remarks—

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: You cannot sit down.

Mr. McKeough: He cannot shut up.

Mr. Singer: I am modesty incarnate, if I could just get this across without a further comment.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: The hon. member is hardly modest and incarnate.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, I would think I would compare, very simply and very obviously, the remarks made by the hon. member from Durham with the remarks that we used to hear from Mr. Dunlop, who was the one-time Minister of Education. He used to extoll the glories of the little red schoolhouse. I can understand far more readily the remarks of the hon. Minister of Education saying we are striving for this standard, than I can understand the remarks of the hon. member for Durham. I can understand the hon. Minister of Education saying we are not going to achieve it overnight and I would hope that the message we are putting forward to the people of Ontario tonight is that we are trying to raise our standards. When my hon. friend from Durham says that just because you have a BA does not mean you are going to be a teacher, then I would suspect, Mr. Chairman, that we should call in the services of our hon. Minister of Health and have a genetic test. We should have him evolve some sort of test that puts people under a spotlight and determines whether or not they are going to be good teachers.

Our modern science as I understand it, Mr. Chairman, is this, that we project our potential teachers through an educational process, to a series of more difficult tests, which insofar as we are able to determine, evolves some sort of standard of ability. This is the reason why we have BA's or MA's or Ph.D's, and I am very surprised that a member as learned as the hon. member for Durham can get up and make the same sort of speech that we used to hear from the member for Eglington who was the one-time Minister of Education. I can accept the thesis put forward by the present hon. Minister. I can accept the thesis that he is doing his best to raise the standard, but my quarrel, and the reason I raised this in the first place, is the oft-repeated self-praise that we in Ontario are the best in the world. I say we have a long way to go. I commend the hon. Minister in his efforts to raise our standards, but I think we should be humble at a time when we are approaching the estimates of this department, and we should say we are striving for something better. I think that the pats we get from the—

Hon. Mr. Grossman: We are tired of hearing that every other jurisdiction does better than Ontario.

Mr. Singer: The hon. member for Durham harps back to Tory doctrinal approach which says that it is good enough because we do it. I commend the hon. Minister of Education for saying that at least we are trying to improve. I condemn the sentiments put forward by the hon. member for Durham.

Mr. Carruthers: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, I never intimated anything of the sort. I said we should encourage higher standards for teachers with degrees as soon as possible. I do say that we should have a special degree and not necessarily a BA degree. But the hon. member for Downsview is completely wrong; he either does not understand what I said or he misinterprets it.

Mr. Chairman: Is the vote carried?

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Chairman, I believe we have 13 teachers' colleges, is that right, and the hon. Minister announced this afternoon, that there might be a fourteenth? These institutions deal with young people who come out of our high-school system, at present at the grade 13 level, and for some years past at the grade 12 level. I wonder if there was any thought that the rather extensive facilities at the teachers' colleges be expanded to form the nucleus of our community college campuses that have been discussed. So far, the possibility of community colleges being established around the nucleus of vocational schools has been put forward. I would suggest many of these institutions are very handsome and modern; they are often built on rather large plots of ground, and they would have facilities that would work in with a college of applied arts and sciences.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, once again I do not want to prejudge the committee to which I referred, which is studying elementary schoolteacher training. I would only pass the personal observation at this moment that perhaps these institutions may become more closely related to the universities rather than to the colleges of applied arts and technology. This is a personal view, Mr. Chairman. The new college, for instance, in St. Catharines is being located on the Brock University campus; the new college in Sudbury is being located on the Laurentian University campus. As I say, personally I think this may be the relationship which will be developed over a period of time rather than a relationship with the colleges of applied arts and technology.

Mr. Nixon: Would the hon. Minister assume then that the teacher training at the primary level would eventually be associated with university work?

Hon. Mr. Davis: I think there is a greater possibility of this happening, Mr. Chairman, than perhaps becoming related—

Mr. Nixon: I think that is very reasonable. The suggestion that came from one of the hon. members a moment ago that a degree in teaching might be instituted, of course, is a problem for people who have gone to university outside of Ontario and achieved the Bachelor of Education standing often with four university years, as I understand it. This is not accepted as competence, or academic competence, in any way in the province of Ontario and there may be good justification for this. But as time goes on it appears that Ontario is going to be standing alone in this field in Canada. I believe six provinces now, and I could be mistaken, do grant Bachelor of Education degrees and with that background the individual is permitted to go on into teaching at the primary or usually the secondary level. This is not possible in Ontario as I understand it. I know the hon. Minister has had some people apply with this background; they are turned away as a matter of policy. Is there any thought that as the education degree gets more and more acceptance across Canada as it has in the United States, we will perhaps, while not instituting it in our own universities, accept it as a qualification for teaching? I wonder if I might be permitted to suggest this? Perhaps the hon. Minister could answer while remaining seated.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, I do not think I am in a position at this moment to make any observation on this. I really anticipate this will be one of the matters dealt with. Even though it is an elementary teachers' training committee that is reporting, I anticipate the members may touch on this question of Bachelor of Education degrees and the relationship between elementary and secondary training. I do not think I can anticipate a pattern for the hon. member tonight. I am quite familiar with the problem and the development that is taking place in the United States and in other provinces. The one thing that I think we would all accept is that whatever we do, we want to maintain our own standards. It is not a case of lowering our standards to meet other jurisdictional requirements. I think it is a case of trying to fit our own in with others, while at the same time maintaining the integrity of our own courses.

Mr. Nixon: Does the hon. Minister have any information as to the progress of this committee on primary teacher training? I believe it has been sitting for a full year or more now.

Hon. Mr. Davis: I am guessing here, Mr. Chairman, but I think it is about seven or eight months at this point. We have had the two preliminary recommendations: the experimental projects this summer—one for the BA students and one course here in Toronto—and the combined course at OCE and the teachers' college in London.

Mr. Nixon: Were those public reports?

Hon. Mr. Davis: No, these were just two preliminary recommendations; they were not reports, they were just two recommendations to the department to institute these two programmes for this coming season.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, in the various teachers' colleges I notice that the teaching expenses are down substantially. Is that as a result of the elimination of the two-year programme?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Yes, this would be one of the reasons.

Mr. S. Lewis: Mr. Chairman, on vote 508, I was frankly—and I think the hon. Minister knows this—

Mr. Chairman: That is on vote 508.

Mr. S. Lewis: I thought we had moved to 508.

Vote 507 agreed to.

On vote 508:

Mr. S. Lewis: I was going to say, Mr. Chairman, that I was frankly a little self-conscious about making extended remarks on any individual branch, but in view of the amount of time consumed by the Ontario temperance federation and related matters I no longer am reticent.

I was interested that the hon. leader of the Opposition earlier on raised via a question one of the central themes which I would like to deal with at this time. Throughout the session, Mr. Chairman, we in this party have laid a certain emphasis on children with various handicaps. There has been an over-riding concern because of the large numbers involved and we pursued the courses as faithfully as possible. Inevitably, I say to the House, the emphasis has centred on singularly dramatic cases, the Ann Xs and Jamies of this world; and Opposition is often restricted to such cases to communicate the enormity of the problem—a problem that is never grasped, if it is left in purely general terms. Inevitably, too, because The Department of Education estimates have just come before the House, our emphasis has been primarily on institutionalization and the inadequacies of such, the treatment centres, training schools, detention homes, provisions of The Child Welfare Act.

We make no apologies for that, Mr. Chairman, we just like to shift the emphasis at this point because I say to the hon. Minister opposite—and I know he is well apprised in this field—that fundamentally and logically the issue at root is one of education and the answer lies in the educational process. By that I do not suggest that these young children are strewn wreckage from the educational stream but that too many of them, several thousand in fact, are neglected, damaged and even abused by a system that is at once inadequate, insensitive and uncomprehending. It represents a terrifying waste of human resources.

My basic contentions, Mr. Chairman, are therefore these: First, The Department of Education, as it is presently organized, is a vast and enormous complex relating to the normal child. As such, it has failed in its responsibility to thousands of deviants and disturbed children. The school should be the front line of prevention, and I suggest that in the province of Ontario it is not.

My second contention is the following: There are large numbers, I would say thousands, of educable children in the province of Ontario who are not receiving the education to which they are entitled, and the fundamental premise of equality of opportunity is thereby revealed as a cruel jest for countless numbers whose intelligence is equal to or greater than the average, but whose patterns of behaviour and presence of handicaps result in alienation, despair and failure.

Now, let me be fair. The exceptional child, so-called, has been given attention in certain categories by this government. The problem of blind children, of deaf children, of retarded children, of crippled children, have received a major emphasis, special financing, special classes, special attention. The hon. Minister is to be commended.

I am not sure about the gifted child frankly; I suspect that is an area for analysis and exploration. But in three broad fundamental categories our educational system has not yet begun to understand or respond—and I refer to the emotionally disturbed child—to the perceptually handicapped child, and to the culturally disadvantaged child. I admit that the unfortunate labels are a mouthful in themselves, probably enough to clear this Chamber, but I would like to take a moment avoiding as much repetition of what I have said earlier in the session, Mr. Chairman, to advance as seriously as I can, some of the symptoms, the incidence, the successful experiments, and end with a concrete set of proposals.

First, then—and let me put it in summary—the emotionally disturbed child. Now I need not remind this House yet again—although, alas, it will probably arise under Health and Public Welfare in subsequent weeks—I need not remind the House of that spectrum ranging from the extreme disturbance of schizophrenia on the one hand to the more minor and varying degrees on the other. I remind the House that the manifestations are those of aggressive and turbulent acting-out, through to the totally withdrawn and reticent child, through again to what we regard as normal delinquent behaviour. The characteristic common to all these ranges of children is their inability to form normal human relationships.

Now the incidence, Mr. Chairman, is more and more established at three per cent of the school-going population. Dr. Angus Hood who, as the hon. Minister knows, is head of the Toronto mental health clinic, has suggested that six or seven children in every class of 35 in the province of Ontario are sufficiently disturbed to require some kind of extensive treatment or special school atmosphere; and I think it is fair to say that most educational authorities would agree. I need not cite them, they are legion. And at least one per cent of the school-age population would require special classes or special attention within the regular school stream and that is a number which amounts in excess of 20,000 children, adolescents and young adults in the province of Ontario.

I suggest frankly, Mr. Chairman, to the hon. Minister opposite, that the present state of affairs does not begin to approximate the need. First, there are many children in opportunity classes in this province who should not in fact be there, their intelligence quotient is in fact not retarded, it is the functioning which is retarded and they may well be damaged in such classes if not properly organized.

Second, the psychological services of this province are desperately thin. Even in the city of Toronto they serve only one in every 4,500 or 5,000 students, yet UNESCO, the American psychiatric association and similar groups have established that facilities for one in every 1,000 is desirable. The precise guidance services are very thin.

It was mentioned by the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville this evening, that we have virtually nothing at the elementary school level; we have inordinate emphasis on the occupational and vocational aspects at the secondary school level. I do not suggest that every school should have a psychologist or a social worker but they should be available within any given system or board for consultative purposes.

Finally, I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that the capacity of the average teacher to identify emotional disturbance or other handicaps is severely limited. There are no standard courses in child development or abnormal behaviour disorders, as part of the teacher-training programme. I know that the hon. Minister, speaking to the association for emotionally disturbed children on January 18 of this year, talked about special summer courses and auxiliary courses for teachers involved in this area. But I suggest to him with all sincerity that that is perhaps insufficient for the tens of thousands of teachers either past, present or future who will have to deal with the six or seven out of 35.

We also have permissive legislation for special classes, but it is barely operative. There is, in the Metro Toronto area, a class in North York, a class in Etobicoke and a class in Toronto—but take a municipality like my own, Scarborough. They are just contemplating, for the first time, two classes in the fall of this year. They will serve 12 children suffering from emotional disturbance and perceptual handicaps. And the total public school population in the municipality of Scarborough is some 48,000 children. Now, Scarborough claims that a class for 12 will meet the identifiable need, and it would be laughable were it not pitiful. I suggest strongly to the hon. Minister that it reflects again a lack of comprehension, a lack of grasp of the problem that exists. And the very great tragedy, Mr. Chairman, is that wherever we have tried experiments, they have been profoundly successful. Etobicoke is returning children to the regular stream on a regular basis. North York's protective classes are working well; its bulwarking of children in regular classes in the school system is working well and bringing them back into the rehabilitated stream of things.

The Elmont county experiment in New York—to which I referred earlier this session—with volunteer mothers as teacher “mums” coming out of the community, developing a one-to-one relationship with very severely disturbed children—schizophrenic children, autistic children—and gradually through whatever learning process can be adapted to suit that child, plus a tremendous emphasis on affection and love, bringing the child back into the school system.

There is also the League school in Brooklyn, which admits children suffering from schizophrenia. Over the last three years 27 of the school's 50 children, with a prognosis of ineducable, have returned to the main stream of the educational system. I hark back, Mr. Chairman, to the words of the hon. member for Russell at a standing committee of health, education and welfare, earlier this session, when he told of the two schizophrenic children who had come to his attention in the Ottawa environ and for whom absolutely no facilities were available.

Now, Mr. Chairman, that is frankly inexcusable; it is unforgivable in a society of our supposed sophistication and maturity. And because we have experiments that are operative and we have the financial wherewithal and we have, certainly, the initiative, I suggest to the hon. Minister that he prosecute this area vigorously. We are sadly distant from the goal of educating all educable children in the province of Ontario. The vast majority of municipal school boards cannot even grasp that problem, let alone assume the responsibility.

After having hurtled through that, Mr. Chairman, let me move to another area which I think has not been discussed in any depth in this Legislature, and that is the perceptually handicapped child, the child to which I suspect the hon. leader of the Opposition was referring this evening. Now these children have suffered damage to the central nervous system by accident, infection or unknown cause either before, after or at birth—the hon. Minister of Health can correct me here if I am wrong, Mr. Chairman. I cannot refer to them simply as brain-damaged children because they are a sub-grouping of that category; brain-injured children can, of course, include those with severe retardation, cerebral palsy, epilepsy, and so on.

The perceptually handicapped children with whom I am concerned, and I think the hon. Minister and the Legislature are concerned, are those with normal intelligence for whom, again, it is possible to develop programmes to reinstate them in the school system. Admittedly, many of them have multiple handicaps—speech disorders and hearing disorders. Many have emotional disturbance in addition to their perceptual handicap. But they can, in fact, be brought into the regular mainstream of things and they are, as a group, I suggest, primarily categorized by hyperactivity, by distractibility and by lack of motor control.

If I can try to communicate this to this House—and hon. members will forgive me for the necessary breakdown in language to do the job—the perceptually handicapped child does not perceive and interpret the exterior world normally. His sight and hearing may be completely normal—I want to emphasize that—but the messages transmitted to the brain are distorted because of damage to the central nervous system.

As an example, imagine a telephone switchboard that went out of order and all the incoming messages were relayed at once over the same receiver at top volume, six times the normal speed and with every other word left out. The confusion, frustration and panic of the child who lives constantly in this world of loudly distorted images can only, I suggest, be imagined. It is not surprising that he is hyper-distractible, since so many stimuli enter his brain at once, unfiltered and at top volume you might say, that he cannot help but be hyper-active.

This is further complicated in that many of the children have difficulty in controlling their physical actions and reactions. In addition to hyper-activity there can be sudden bouts of laughter, sudden uncontrollable bouts of crying, sudden shifts in mood. They may be clumsy physically, the difficulties in school are enormous. Where another child may see a drawing of a house, the perceptually handicapped child may look at the same picture and perceive only a chimney or a single detail of the door. The ticking of the clock may be as forceful to his ears as the teacher's voice.

Now the diagnostic services in the province of Ontario are hardly overwhelming, as the hon. Minister of Health can attest now and will probably attest during subsequent estimates, but where we have developed a sophisticated diagnosis, and this is particularly true of the postwar period, it has been possible to isolate the perceptually handicapped and to do something about it. The incidence, I suggest to this Legislature, is extremely high. Hon. members may be interested in some authoritative estimates. The Ontario association for children with learning disability presented a brief to the Ontario welfare council in February of this year. They said that it amounted to five per cent of the population, representing the largest incidence of handicapped of exceptionality in the population. Dr. Ralph Rabinowich, of the neuropsychiatric institute of the University of Michigan, said that at least 10 per cent of the children of average intelligence in school in the United States suffer from severe reading disorders originating from disturbances of perception. Dr. Knute Hermann in Denmark, found ten per cent of the population to have specific reading disability. I dare say that there are children of hon. members of this Legislature who have fallen into the area of the perceptually handicapped. Dr. Helmut Nicholas, department of speech and language pathology, Northwestern University, says that 10 per cent to 15 per cent of all children have perceptual problems; and so these statistics go.

It is worth pointing out that not all of these children will, of course, need special classes; just a very small percentage of them, perhaps 0.5 of 1 per cent. But again, in the province of Ontario that amounts to something over 10,000 children of school age. Put that together with the emotionally disturbed and you begin to build a number of young children for whom handicaps of this kind develop an overwhelming significance.

There have been very intelligent ways developed for treating these children and teaching them.

Basically, the classroom eliminates all distraction. There are just six to ten children in a class where there is a severity of disturbance or perceptually handicapped. The room itself will be painted in a uniform colour; all the cupboards are enclosed; the windows are frosted and the floors carpeted. There are no clocks or decorations and as little furniture equipment as possible to avoid distractibility.

In fact, in the major experimental theatre for perceptually handicapped children, Dr.

Cruikshank in Syracuse even regulates the temperature and the humidity of the room so as to remove all the outside evidences of distraction and pressure. The classroom schedule, of course, is tightly ordered. They contrast, in this sense, with emotionally disturbed children for whom all the apparatus and techniques of the modern classroom are often operative and important parts of the therapeutic scheme.

Again I suggest to the hon. Minister that in Ontario the situation is critical and unhappy. In Toronto there is a very successful class, I might say, in North York. There are certain classes in Toronto. I have spoken to the psychologist in Burlington who is setting up a class next fall and I gather that in Scarborough a class will be set up and there is some attention being paid to children in the regular school stream; but on a very minimal basis, and that a rather timid one.

I strongly urge hon. members of the Legislature to reflect upon the fact that there is a lot of tragedy inherent in this; because wherever experiments have been tried, they have had great success.

Let me mention three or four of them. The hon. Minister will probably be familiar with them and will forgive me for putting them on the record. In Glen Rock, New Jersey, between 1960 and 1964, a survey showed that the largest single incidence of handicap amongst children of the population was that of perceptual handicap. Of 30 children in specific schools, 13 have now returned to regular or auxiliary classes. The classroom is in the regular primary school so that the children could move back into the stream easily. The highly structured environment worked well and kindergarten was viewed as the best date of entry, and that is why I earlier emphasized the guidance factor.

In Columbus, Ohio, there is a demonstration project. They have had five classes for four years, and of 33 children 28 have returned to the regular school or the vocational classes. They have all overcome the initial handicaps and frustrations. In this experiment, a teacher aide—akin to the teacher "mum"—worked with these children, and worked very effectively, to demonstrate again the voluntary value that society has not exploited. I also suggest, Mr. Minister, that the expense of these classes, relative to the saving in human terms, has been so minimal as to be microscopical or irrelevant. I will not mention Dr. Cruikshank's famous experiment, the hon. Minister will be familiar with it.

However, I do want to mention London,

Ontario, as some of the hon. members here would probably be more familiar with it than I am. London began a class for perceptually handicapped children in 1960. It now has three classes for emotionally disturbed and the perceptually handicapped. The teachers were initially sent to Syracuse for training because there was no training available in the province of Ontario. Out of a total of 24 children in the classes, 14 have already been returned to regular work and only one was not successful. Normally, Mr. Chairman, these children would have been expelled from the school stream, they would not have been able to fit into the mainstream of affairs. I have a quote from a letter which Mr. Chalmers, the superintendent of special education and assistant superintendent of public schools, wrote to the president of the Ontario association for the emotionally disturbed. He said:

We have been highly encouraged with results to date. The parents of these children are among the most grateful in our school system and I would commend London on the intelligence and maturity it has demonstrated in having this programme operative for four years.

Again I think the hon. Minister can afford to act. I commend him on the forthcoming conference in August and the arrangement for experts from Purdue who are to assure expert guidance for teachers who are interested; I hope that it will lead to concrete programmes and proposals.

With even greater brevity, and I realize that I am compressing enormously complex human factors into terrifyingly generalized statements, I want to deal for a moment with the culturally disadvantaged child because I notice that the hon. Minister made a special point of mentioning that in his estimates. The hon. Minister mentioned the culturally disadvantaged child with reference to Indian children, Eskimo children and certain areas of downtown metropolitan centres, if I recall his lead-off properly.

Again, Mr. Chairman, we are dealing with children of essentially normal intelligence whose degree of cultural and social deprivation makes adjustment to our prevailing middle-class-value school structure very difficult indeed. There is a tremendous gap in comprehension—books, music, language, colour, art—a minimal grasp. The stunted culture of poverty, isolation, and lack of external stimuli or appreciation results in this lack. The children develop only psychological handicaps and a very low sense of self worth.

The hon. Minister will know, of course, of the visit to the Higher Horizons programme in New York by various Toronto teachers. When a couple of them came back they wrote a report on New York programmes for the disadvantaged child. One of them was a member of the staff of Jarvis collegiate institute—I think subsequently with the Toronto board of education—and the other was William Quinn, principal of Alexander Muir public school where some of the most exciting programmes for culturally disadvantaged children are taking place. In the report they had this quote and I think it is a significant and perceptive one:

It is within the family, ideally, that provision is made for physical and emotional well being of children. Given a healthy level of self-understanding and reasonable level of aspiration the school has a natural foundation upon which to develop the child intellectually. However, when there is cultural deprivation so that the education process has to be carried on without the ideal background it becomes complicated.

The middle-class-oriented school programme can conceivably have little relationship to the experience of some children who come from disadvantaged homes. Indeed it is possible that it might serve only to emphasize the sense of insignificance and inadequacy which day-to-day living has already imposed on such a child. Need for money, family insecurity and mobility, and the failure on the part of the school to make meaningful contact with the child lead to drop-outs. The incidences of truancy and emotional disturbance are high in the disadvantaged homes.

Just to follow on that, Mr. Chairman, there was an article in the Toronto Globe and Mail, September 17, 1964, written by, if I may say, a journalist of some perception. Since the hon. Minister of Reform Institutions is not here, that journalist's capacities will not be impugned—I would be surprised if this hon. Minister indulged in such. I want to read a quote from that article, "The Case of the Disadvantaged Child."

The drop-out problem is directly related to cultural deprivation and has its roots in both social background and the earliest years in school.

And then a quote from Mr. Quinn:

The children in overcrowded communities have to play in the streets and learn to cope with insurmountable difficulties. They and their parents are beaten by society. By the time they come to kindergarten they know they are incapable of coping. Educators are beginning to recognize that this sense of defeat, though it has its roots in social background, can actually be aggravated by the schools themselves. The child from a home where the niceties of behaviour from language to a clean handkerchief are ignored, is lost when he is put in an environment where politeness and cleanliness are stressed.

The incidence again, Mr. Chairman, is very, very difficult to determine. Frank Leishman, chairman of a college department of psychology and a pioneer in the area of the culturally disadvantaged child, suggests that one out of every two children in the American school system can be classified in this area. That is probably high. Suffice it to say that there are in the province of Ontario several thousand, and again the special programmes for these children—programmes essentially of enrichment—are left to the creativity and ingenuity and perception of individual high school principals.

I mentioned that Mr. Quinn is the embodiment of that. His school, Alexander Muir, is guidance oriented. It has resulted in a lively and enthusiastic school atmosphere where children of public school age bring their problems to the principal's office and teachers are encouraged to be helpful to the children. The pupils—and this includes all of them—participate in ambitious projects like concerts and writing year books; classes are taken on outings and creative experiments are conducted in the classrooms, all designed to bolster the self-esteem of the individual child, all designed to supplement that sad gap in the child from the culturally disadvantaged home and the middle-class oriented school system.

At Eastdale school the upgraded system has turned out to be of immense benefit with girls who have been frustrated by constant failure within a more rigid school system. All children progress at their own speed and the programme is designed to enrich and encourage the child who has been disadvantaged. I might say that a few schools in the city of Toronto in the low-rental housing developments show they even write their own textbooks so that the words and phrases and situations which are incorporated are relevant to their daily life.

If the hon. Minister will permit a personal reflection I am reminded of my own stint as a teacher in West Africa and the necessity of rewriting textbooks so that all of history was not Tudor and Stuart history but West African history, so that mathematics did not multiply crumpets by English biscuits but multiplied mangoes by bananas, and so that the relevancy of objective factors of their lives were brought into a meaningful school situation. This, of course, is what is required for culturally disadvantaged children.

In Philadelphia and in the Higher Horizons experiments in New York this has been done with great effect. Reading scores increased by 4.3 points in two years; high school completion increased by 39 per cent; the number going on to higher education increased by 250 per cent; verbal IQ scores which normally go down with disadvantaged children rose from a median of 93 in grade 8 to a median of 102 in grade 11. The staff was increased at times twofold in order to come to grips with it and there was a tremendous emphasis on cultural enrichment.

I want to suggest again that there is great room for exciting possibilities of which as yet the province has not seen fit to take advantage. I would end, Mr. Chairman—which the hon. members will doubtless hear with a sigh of relief as will the hon. Minister of Education—with the following sets of concrete recommendations for the province of Ontario in the area of the educationally disturbed, the perceptually handicapped and the culturally disadvantaged. I would say that even at a level of two per cent of the school-age population, that amounts to something over 40,000 children in Ontario. I wish to emphasize that we do not require here purely special classes, that is one fact, but we do require a greater sensitivity in regular classes and a much more judicious and intelligent placement of children in response to their needs.

The first two recommendations are in the nature of a sort of crash programme to fill the immediate gap.

1. That three to six diagnostic teams, each including a child psychiatrist, psychologist, neurologist and social worker, be established to visit Ontario municipalities where diagnostic facilities do not exist. These teams would work within the school system to identify handicapped children and would work with local social agencies in assessing difficult family situations. I can recall, Mr. Chairman, visiting one of the Ontario hospitals not so long ago, in which it was pointed out to me that almost all of eastern Ontario, with the possibility of one of two out-patient centres in Ottawa, has virtually no diagnostic facilities for children whatsoever.

2. That three to six consultative child adjustment teams be established to follow up the diagnoses made by the first team, or indeed, to move into communities where there are diagnostic services available; to advise school boards, principals and teachers on possible solutions, ranging from protective classes to placement of children with sympathetic teachers; to run special seminars in courses for teachers throughout the province in identification and handling of special problems; to assist local school personnel in referral of certain children to facilities in other parts of the province where none are available locally. The consultative team would attempt to bridge the gap in communications between more active centres and other municipalities and would provide imaginative flexible leadership subject to local needs.

3. That the province encourage the establishment of child guidance clinics in school systems throughout Ontario.

4. That consideration be given, if necessary, to mandatory legislation for the establishment of special educational services wherever the diagnostic and consultative teams find these to be necessary. And again I say that they need not be purely special classes, they can suit a variety of educational needs.

5. That teachers' colleges and OCE include as a prerequisite for diploma, courses in early identification and sensitive handling of children with special problems. Such courses could focus on human growth and development and abnormal child behaviour.

6. That accreditation and increments be given to teachers who have taken special courses in training at the Ontario crippled children's centre, social agencies or special summer auxiliary courses provided by the department. I remind the hon. Minister that, for those 100-odd teachers who took courses at the Ontario crippled children's centre last summer to deal with children with perceptual handicaps, no credit or increment was given for the work they do, despite the fact that it is an accredited course at Syracuse.

7. That it be recommended to the department's new research institute that they study enrichment of curriculum and increased flexibility in staffing of schools to help the culturally disadvantaged child.

8. That grants be given to the Ontario association for emotionally disturbed children and the Ontario association for children with learning disabilities, to establish day-nursery and other educational facilities as has been done for the Ontario association for retarded children.

9. That the province pay the cost of education for all children in treatment centres, particularly where such children are attending schools in the community at extra expense to the treatment centre.

10. That the province set as an objective the limiting of the size of our classes to 25 children—a step which is universally acknowledged to be of extreme importance in the identification and proper education of children with special problems, as well as for abnormal children.

Mr. Chairman, I thank the House for its indulgence. Within the confines of this private club atmosphere, we collectively recognize the pressures and the time factor. I raised this again because I think it affects somewhere in very deep particular, 40,000 or 50,000 at minimum in the province of Ontario. And I dare say, perhaps I can be proved wrong, but I dare say that there is not an hon. member in this assembly who has not himself felt a sense of despair and frustration when constituents whose children have immeasurable problems, have arrived requesting some kind of aid, and the facilities of this immensely resourceful society have not been able to provide even a modicum of assistance.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, there is not a great deal that I can add. I can only say to the hon. member that his contribution in this area has been like other contributions in the estimates, of a very helpful nature. We have discussed this unofficially outside the House. As the hon. member knows, we are taking steps this summer as far as summer courses are concerned, and we are also having personnel coming from Syracuse to assist in the discussions and deliberations. I guess I could go on for some length of time to get into the problem in a concrete way.

I think the only thing, Mr. Chairman, that really need be said at this moment is that the hon. member has brought this matter to the attention of the House. I personally have spent some substantial time, not only with the officials in the department by with representatives from the emotionally disturbed, the physically handicapped, and we are very aware of the problem. There is no point saying that it is easily resolved; it is a very complicated, a very difficult situation, and the only thing I think I can usefully add, Mr. Chairman, at this point, is that we are aware of it and we are endeavouring to take steps to meet this very difficult situation.

I should point out that with the perceptually handicapped, it goes beyond the school system itself; we can, I think, become very directly involved with the parents because, as I understand the problem of these, there must be some training or some genuine interest on the part of the parents to have an effective programme for these groups of young people. But I think, Mr. Chairman, it is a problem with which we must be concerned and I can assure you it will receive the attention of this department.

Mr. F. Young (Yorkview): Following this matter on which the hon. member for Scarborough West and the hon. Minister have just spoken, I would like to bring to the attention of the hon. Minister a letter which came to my desk today, from Mrs. Coxon, dated May 28, 1965. And she says in part:

Enclosed is a résumé of our research for treatment for our son. I hope it will be helpful to you in your efforts to make sure that no one is denied medical or educational services because of insufficient money. That has happened to our son and thousands like him.

The description has some body and substance to it but I think it is an important illustration of what has just been discussed.

When Earl was three years old I brought my concerns about the effects that our circumstances were having on him to the attention of our family physician. He understood the situation very well and was able to give me constructive guidance, as well as a careful medical examination, which revealed him—other than tonsils—to be of sound health and normal intelligence. Unfortunately he entered school shortly before he was five years. The teacher considered him abnormal and treated him accordingly.

After a specialist gave him a hearing test, we were referred by the school to the sick children's hospital, who promptly sent us to East York child guidance clinic. It was near the end of the school year before we were accepted by the clinic. I attended for about 12 to 15 visits every other week or so for the following year or year and a half. We were told that the case load was so heavy that this was the best they could do. No direct guidance was given to the teacher and we were left to make suggestions as best we could. While I was happy to receive instructions in good mental hygiene in the home for children, it was never made clear until the end of the clinic that my husband should participate. He would have been quite willing to attend. Their assessment of Earl was that he was pre-psychotic or mildly retarded, one or the other or possibly both. They weren't sure. The clinic definitely helped him.

In the summer after his first year in school, we moved to Scarborough. No report was sent from the clinic. He repeated kindergarten after a brief trial in grade 1 at the new school. During his second year at this school, we requested the clinic psychiatrist to speak to the principal. Unfortunately, neither family, friends or the school agreed on how he should be handled and it set the stage for a great deal of conflict.

When it became evident that he was not going to fit into the regular class, and that it was destructive to him, we decided to move to Toronto where an opportunity class would be more readily available. We moved in June and in the following September—Earl turned 8 years in December—he started in the opportunity class at John Fisher school. The teacher came to us before Christmas and asked us to take Earl back to the sick children's hospital for further diagnosis and assessment, as she felt, based on her long experience with slow learners and retarded children, that he was definitely not retarded, but exceptionally bright and possibly gifted in art, but was suffering from some type of emotional block. It was March or thereabouts before our appointment arrived.

We were given a diagnosis of childhood schizophrenia. The psychiatrist, Dr. Keeler, explained that he could not give us an assessment as his research project did not include treatment, but gave us the feeling that our son was hopeful. The teacher was as amazed as we were that no follow-up guidance would be given to either herself or to us. Our son was quite happy with this very understanding, warm teacher. So were we. Dr. Helen Mitchell of the Toronto child adjustment service offered to support us as parents as often as we would like. It became clear that it was not within the policy of the child adjustment service to provide the intensive kind of programme that our son required, but that would be seen as part of the regular programme of routine visits to the classrooms by the psychiatrist. At the time, we were quite thankful for Dr. Mitchell's generous offer of support.

The following year a new teacher took over the opportunity class. The second year the class became overcrowded, at one point 21 pupils of all kinds and description. The teacher and myself experienced considerable difficulty with a new principal and getting the co-operation and understanding of the rest of the staff. In spite of this, our son made considerable progress and during his third year in opportunity class the teacher recommended a private tutor that we paid for, to give him extra help. By the time he was 11 he had progressed to about a grade 5 standard in reading and come up to about grade 3 and 4 in arithmetic. The child adjustment service felt confident that he would be able to pass through high school, although his emotional illness would prevent him from using his full intelligence, which is above average. Earl was at this time a fairly happy, co-operative child.

When he was 10 or 11 he was screened at the new Thistletown hospital by the then director, Dr. Alderton, at my request. They felt he was definitely progressing favourably and that only one year of treatment would be required if it became necessary to hospitalize him. It was agreed to carry on as we were.

When Earl was 11½, a new baby arrived and my health began to break down. Earl became very difficult under the circumstances. When the child adjustment service tried to get him admitted to Thistletown hospital no bed was available. We were told that since their age limit was 12 and he would soon be 12, that he would shortly be ineligible anyway. Dr. Keeler and Dr. Mitchell of the child adjustment service recommended that we apply for admittance to Smiths Falls, which had a special treatment wing for his type of problem, and that perhaps a short stay there would be helpful.

After visiting them at the end of the six-week waiting period we discovered that since he was over 12 he was not in this special treatment wing. His condition had definitely deteriorated into apathy there. We were told that it would take 18 months to diagnose him all over again before specific treatment would commence.

The conditions at Smiths Falls were completely appalling. They must be kidding. It is all on paper. We took him home.

We managed as best we could during the rest of the winter without any professional help at all, or any help from the schools. During the summer, before he was 13, we heard about a private school through the Ontario association for emotionally disturbed children. We were delighted to have at least a day programme as he was beginning to improve and come around again. During his four-month stay there he became a residential pupil. It became apparent that the woman running the school was not only a fraud but a complete quack. This had disastrous consequences for our son and myself. He became unable to eat properly, read or write or talk coherently.

We went back to Dr. Keeler who was now in private practice and he sent us to the Toronto Psychiatric. We waited from January to August, eight months. By this time Earl would not talk to anyone. The psychiatrist there, after approximately four or five interviews, said he was hopeless, that he could not be reached and to place him in a custodial institution such as Orillia. He definitely described his condition as the same type of schizophrenia present in an adult. It was his theory that it was all biochemical and no psychotherapy was indicated. We refused to accept his prognosis. We still hoped to find professional people who could reach him. He was only 14 past.

It was after this that we first heard of Warrendale and through Mrs. Brown we were able to get some specific guidance in the home. At that time they did not have service to boys. When he was 15 we took him to Dr. Don Anderson at Queen Street.

This doctor felt that a combination of home and hospital would be the best solution and arranged that my husband and myself see him as private patients as often as we could afford to come in order to give us some guidance about Earl. He was quite honest about conditions in the hospital. This went on fairly well for about four months as the staff got to know Earl and were able to devise some programme for him.

Then we were offered the chance to send Earl to Warrendale summer camp. Dr. Anderson was as delighted as we were. At the end of the summer we received the first real and accurate professional assessment we had ever had. They recommended we bring him during the winter to their day school at Oakridges. We had moved to the country and Aurora hospital agreed to give him custodial care as they were about one mile away from the school. We drove down, picked him up at hospital, took him to school, returned daily to hospital and had him home most weekends.

He went to Warrendale the next summer and made enormous progress. He was calm, healthy, co-operative and more receptive and friendly than he had ever been in his life. Still we knew he had a long way to go. The staff at Warrendale had informed us that it would take five years to treat and rehabilitate him and two more years to consolidate the gains. We understood their financial policy and our limited means had run out.

Warrendale also was unable to provide a further programme and we could no longer carry the transportation or school costs anyway. There is no doubt that these people know what they are doing every step of the way and were able to counsel us in a very specific definite way. They certainly reached all of the family.

We had to return to Toronto and Dr. Rice of Aurora recommended that Earl be transferred to a more appropriate hospital. Early in March he was finally sent to New Toronto as this is the closest available.

At the present time he is not on a full programme because of the shortage of staff, which as far as I am concerned results in the excessive use of drugs. He goes from one building to the next Tuesday and Friday for short periods in afternoon for group therapy. Lately he goes on group walks mornings and afternoons when the weather is suitable. Other than that he is idle. We take him out Sunday.

Despite this token treatment, he has maintained the gains made at Warrendale, but is getting more jumpy and restless. Unless some drastic improvements are made in the budget for this hospital, I see little likelihood of our son making anything but marginal improvements over a very long period of time.

Dr. Keeler, Dr. Anderson and Dr. Fischer were definitely against any form of shock treatment for Earl and said tranquillizer palliative was useful in helping him become more receptive to the various forms of psychotherapy. The staff at New Toronto requested we give permission for electric shock treatment in order to "speed things up." We rejected this because of previous professional advice. They are quite agreeable to this at present. The social worker has agreed to see us at regular intervals.

At no time has any doctor ever been interested in having him admitted to a general hospital for his condition.

It is obvious to me that had a properly trained teacher in a small class been available all the way through school, not this hit-or-miss policy to which we have been subjected, he would not now be a patient in this hospital. I am also firmly convinced that if, even as little as five years ago, he could have received active treatment, he would not have deteriorated to the point where he has become a long-term patient.

I realize that much of the preceding is interwoven with my own personal bias and prejudice, but nevertheless it is an honest statement of facts.

I hope that this has not been too tedious a recitation, but will benefit not only our own boy but others as well.

I bring this to the attention of the hon. Minister and to the attention of the House because it arrived today and it illustrates the desperate need in this rich province of Ontario for the kind of treatment which will reach children such as Earl early in their lives and carry through to overcome the emotional handicaps and emotional blocks that occur in a situation such as this and bring a boy like this into full manhood and full citizenship.

Mr. S. Lewis: Mr. Chairman, if I may follow this up. I had not read the letter addressed to my hon. friend; I had not known of its existence. I feel as every hon. member of this House must feel. I feel compelled also to indicate that diagnoses of childhood schizophrenia are now treatable in small classes in municipalities in this province where they are established. In Scarborough, where this child at one point fell, there has been no such class and only one such class is envisaged. The child lived 12 to 16 years of tortured life as the result of the failure to provide child guidance and teaching facilities adequate for the task. Then he even is rejected from Warrendale because under The Department of Public Welfare we cannot pay sufficient per diem, under The Department of Health we will not recognize the medical attention needed and under The Department of Education we will pay for the day school facilities or schooling only in the community where the child is involved. I suggest to you that it is a total failure of government, all branches intertwined. All of us have such cases, and it is now time to act. There is sufficient evidence and sufficient understanding.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to follow on the same topic, if the hon. Minister wishes to reply to some of this. I will intentionally be as brief as possible because of the lateness of the hour. However, I would like to bring to the attention of the hon. Minister the brief presented by the Ontario parents' council for the deaf and hard of hearing. It was given to me by the association in my own community. It recommends or suggests that legislation covering the early education of the handicapped in their hearing. Of their recommendations, I will only bring to attention the four that are most significant.

Number one is that it is proposed the starting age for the education of the hearing handicapped child be lowered to two years of age.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, we have done this.

Mr. Newman: This has been done?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Yes.

Mr. Newman: The other recommendations, have they been followed out?

Hon. Mr. Davis: I would have to go back over them, but I know this is a more significant one and this is in the legislation.

Mr. Newman: Right. The second was that classes be established with a minimum of six pupils per centre, where needed throughout the province for these youngsters.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, the legislation provides for the boards to undertake this at the present time and with the lowering of age they will be able to do that.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, there is no use in me carrying on if the hon. Minister says this has been done so I will report to the association that it has been taken care of.

Mr. Chairman: On vote 508.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Chairman, I had the honour to attend a meeting of the Six Nations Indian council this morning and at that time—and I must say they run their deliberations very well indeed—it was brought to my attention that they had requested some assistance from the community programmes division of The Department of Education to finance a recreation committee that they have established. They were informed by the hon. Minister that although this type of financing is available for municipalities across the province it would not be available to the Indians. I know that the attitude of the government, from my first experience here, has always been to correct these anomalies where they occur. In several departments, Lands and Forests for one, these peculiarities in our legislation have been gradually done away with, and I would suggest that the hon. Minister of Education might very well follow suit, and rather quickly, so that funds for recreation would be made available to the citizens on the reserves. I wonder if he might comment on that.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, I am not aware of this situation. As I understand the regulations and legislation, the grants must be to municipalities. I was not aware of this request; we will have a look and see if anything can be done to assist them.

Mr. Nixon: On this point, for several years now there have been specific instances—parks assistance is one and I can think of several—but in each case the legislation has been that the grants would be available only to municipalities. As it was brought to the attention of various Ministers, they have been able to bring in amendments that would make these grants available to the Indian councils. I wish somebody would go through the legislation carefully to see to it that all of the services of this nature would be made available to the Indians. I feel that they are reticent enough about asking for things like this and when they are rebuffed by a department on this basis, they tend to withdraw even further. It was really more by chance than anything else that I heard about this, this morning, because actually we were discussing highways. I hope that the hon. Minister will see to it that it is corrected.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, every now and then I am acquainted with a case of a person who seeks a permit for accreditation to teach in the province of Ontario. I get the impression that there is an excessive inflexibility in providing the right to teach in this province, when there appears to be adequate training standards.

For example, there is one case that I would like to draw to the attention of the hon. Minister privately of a person who has a degree from the University of Alberta which would entitle this person to teach in either elementary or secondary schools in Alberta. She sought the right to get accreditation here so she could teach in schools in Ottawa for art alone, and what she was faced with was the prospect that the abstract of her degree from Alberta did not include all of the academic requirements, therefore she could not get certification here. She then sought a "letter of standing" to be able to teach and this was turned down. She simply had to go back and upgrade her degree and then take the OCE course, too.

At a time when we are moving into community colleges and where there is going to be a desperate demand for people at the secondary school level, here is a person who was reported in Ottawa to have more qualifications than the person who was teaching the subject at that particular time. Apparently the board was willing to hire her. It seems to me that this is an excessive inflexibility. I am wondering if the hon. Minister has a comment on the general proposition. I will give him the specific case later for his review of what has happened through the registrar.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, this is an area that causes the Minister great complication, of course. We get many requests for certification from outside jurisdictions, and our difficulty is in equating standards beyond Ontario with our own. We are attempting to maintain the existing standards, we think, particularly in the secondary field where this occurs perhaps with greater regularity, but I think there is a greater degree of flexibility than there has been in the past and we are making an effort to equate surrounding jurisdictions. But it is a very difficult problem. I think the hon. members would agree that we want to maintain standards, and yet I appreciate the problem of the person who graduates with his degree from, say, the University of Alberta. It is pretty difficult for him to accept the fact that for some purposes in this province it is not given the same stature, shall we say.

Mr. MacDonald: It is not a foreign land after all.

Hon. Mr. Davis: No, it is not that far away and it is a problem that concerns the department, Mr. Chairman. It is one for which there is no easy or obvious solution, but it is one that is receiving consideration.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, I would like to carry that one step further. There are also teachers who would teach in private schools, degree teachers who have not attended OCE or who have no teacher qualifications whatsoever but have been inspected by the inspector and found to be extremely satisfactory. If these people have proved their ability, why is it necessary for them to attend teacher training school?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, it is once again the same argument. There are some in the private schools perhaps who are not quite as competent as they should be. No standard has been set for them, no qualifications, and I think really that while we want to be flexible we want to interest as many people as we can; at the same time I think we do want to maintain as high standards as we can.

Mr. Newman: The prime interest is the ability to teach and if the person has already proved that ability, what more is wanted? All he is going to do when he attends the teachers' college is learn or expect to learn something that he already knows. However, may I ask the hon. Minister to take into consideration our graduates who have sacrificed one or two years of their lives to go into the undeveloped countries and have engaged in the art of teaching. They return to our own province and are required to start right at the bottom attending OCE and teachers' college. I think some consideration should be given to their experience in these other countries, provided it is substantial enough, when it comes to teaching certificates.

Mr. Chairman: The member for Yorkview.

Mr. Young: Mr. Chairman, I do not know just what the hon. Prime Minister plans for the House tonight. I have some rather extended remarks with regard to library services; is there still time to go ahead?

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Carry on. Do you have another letter to read?

Mr. Young: Mr. Chairman, there is in this vote an extremely important matter dealing with the library service in Ontario. I know that the hon. Minister is very concerned with this, has been conscious of the need and has been working toward some solution of it, but it would seem that that work which has been done is not yet adequate and that much more is needed. I have before me a survey of the needs for staff which was published in May, 1964, in the Canadian Library, written by Bertha Bassin, the former director of the Toronto library school. The hon. Minister is familiar with this survey.

In the library field we have three classifications of people: those who are professionally trained and who have gone through the post-graduate studies in this regard, those who have been trained in the summer courses and who get a partial training there, and others who are working in our libraries across the province but who have had little or no training. The last are people who have been hired and have picked up their knowledge of books and of libraries as they worked, and while many of them are dedicated and fairly efficient people, they do not have the professional knowledge that one would hope to see in the library field.

During this survey of need—which I understand was undertaken by Miss Bassin at the request of the registrar of the University of Toronto for the university presidents' committee, in order to assess the needs over the next period of time—she called in various groups and called in various experts to get advice. I will not go into those steps at this moment. She looked into the academic field and the need there, the need in the school field, the need for a special library for industry and business, and into the public library needs. The survey revealed that by 1971 we would need in Canada more than 3,000 new librarians; 3,086 was the figure given. The Ontario figure is not given here, but they do give in the academic field, the figures, which are about 40 per cent of the total Canadian needs. I presume from that we would need in Ontario more than 1,200 new librarians by 1971.

As far as the Canadian library situation is concerned, we have the three accredited schools, McGill University, British Columbia and Toronto. Perhaps the hon. Minister could inform us later as to whether Ottawa and the University of Montreal might be accredited within the near future, because they are graduating some librarians and they are, I understand, getting fairly good courses. Perhaps we could get some information about these schools.

As far as McGill is concerned, this year 88 librarians were graduated, but they are now adopting a two-year course and so next year will graduate only about 45. In the University of British Columbia, 55 graduated and they expect to have about 70 graduates next year. The University of Toronto just this week graduated 94. They expect to have 150 next year and they are planning for something like 400 ultimately; how long that will take, perhaps the hon. Minister can tell us. I understand right now that the school is being detached and is being brought under The Department of University Affairs. We hope this will make for a more efficient administration.

But the other problem that is now being faced—and the hon. Minister again can give us advice as to where this school is going to be located, and what facilities it will have and what staff might be available.

In addition, of course, to the people who are needed for libraries—and it would almost seem from these figures that the gap is not being closed as rapidly as we would hope, that the staff needs for these schools and for expanded schools will add to the numbers that we must have. Then, of course, many are thinking now in terms of their master's courses. They are going forward to their master's degree in the library service, and this will take some time. We do need research in this field and this will mean more people.

So I would say at the present time that there are perhaps five basic needs in this field. First of all, Montreal and Ottawa should be accredited and expanded; we are waiting to hear what the word is here. I know the University of Ottawa bill is just in process and when that is finished perhaps it will be in line for being accredited.

In the second place it seems that the facilities must be expanded in the present schools. There has been some talk of new library schools being established. This might be wise if they are properly located. But the feeling seems to be among the people and the experts in this field that if the present schools were enlarged, it might serve the purpose as well or perhaps better. If the University of Toronto school is properly located and has adequate facilities and adequate staff, it might find itself serving a far greater student body. As a matter of fact, while the school plans to take 150 students this year, we are told that about 300 have already applied for admission. Some of these 300, of course, may not have proper qualifications, some I understand have some language difficulties, so perhaps the 300 may be too large a number for us to think of in realistic terms. But there has been some word in this House about the need to interest more students in the library field. Evidently there is more interest and there are facilities available. I do not know whether this is true of other schools across the country, in British Columbia and in Montreal; but certainly here in Toronto far more people want to take the library course than we have facilities for, and so there is desperate need to expand those facilities and to expand them very, very rapidly.

One of the suggestions that has been made by experts in the field is that the BLS should be offered in summer courses, that summer courses which now train the teacher librarians might be expanded, and over a period of years the BLS might be given and that the courses might be designed in the summer to speed up this process. The present course, I understand, runs around 90 hours a year for three years, which gives a total of 270 hours. These are the people who go into our schools largely, I understand, Mr. Chairman, and look after the work there, whereas the Toronto school itself offers 550 class hours, so we can hardly compare the one with the other—to say that one gets as adequate a training as the other group.

The fourth thing that seems to be needed today is refresher courses for graduates of some years standing, people who have been working in libraries, who have been isolated in libraries by themselves or with small staffs, who are not up to date in present library techniques, and who should come back for refresher courses. There are also many librarians, married women perhaps, who have now raised their families and who might come back into the service if the refresher courses were available to them.

So I urge upon the hon. Minister that this be considered very carefully, as no doubt he has been considering it, and that activity in this field might be speeded up. And fifth, there is the matter of scholarships for library schools. As I understand it, unless I am very mistaken, the present fellowship for graduate studies excludes librarians. A graduate can go to OCE and can become a teacher of history and can qualify for a scholarship in this field, but if he wants to qualify as a librarian then he is excluded as far as fellowships are concerned. It seems to me that fellowships for librarians are needed and the fellowship programme in this field should not only be inaugurated but should be made a very significant part of the battle to get more librarians in the field.

The next great problem that I would like to call to the attention of the House is that of the total reorganization of our library system. In this regard I would like to bring to the attention of the House, Mr. Chairman, a brief which was submitted, or a survey which was undertaken, by Miss Louise Schryver, the regional director for south-western Ontario regional library co-operative; she undertook this a year or so ago and the report she brings is a significant report not only for that area but a report, which I suspect, depicts the situation in many, many parts of this province.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to interrupt the hon. member but I wondered if he would like me to bring him up to date on what is happening in this area, not as a direct result of Miss Schryver's report, but what we are doing with the Ontario library association, because it does relate to this. I might—

Mr. Young: Well, if the hon. Minister wishes to do this at this point—

Hon. Mr. Davis: It might save the hon. member some time. I will deal first with the question of librarian supply. We went into it at very substantial length during the estimates of The Department of University Affairs and it was announced that we would have the new library school at Western and the OCE library school was to be transferred to the University of Toronto and was to be tied in with their new library at the corner of Hoskin and St. George. We cannot deal with the question of the University of Montreal, Mr. Chairman; it is not within our jurisdiction and of course the Ottawa library school in connection with the University of Ottawa will become of current interest when the University of Ottawa bill is processed through the House.

As I recall the discussions in The Department of University Affairs, the statistics that were related by the hon. member were discussed then. I think generally speaking we felt that roughly by 1970 or 1971 we would come very close to meeting the approximately 1,500 to 2,000 I believe it was, that would be required within our own province. The final figure was not stipulated.

Dealing with the organization of libraries itself, some years ago we authorized a grant to the Ontario libraries association to do a preliminary survey of the structure of libraries in Ontario. Miss Schryver made her own survey in the Chatham area as well, she is a member of this group and she was with the group when they were in my office, some three or four months ago.

As a result of this, their recommendation came to the government to have the OLA do an extensive survey of organization. They recommended a Mr. St. John—I should point out that he is no relation to Mr. Bascom St. John—and Mr. St. John was retained by the OLA but his fee was paid by the government. He is presently in the process of conducting a complete survey of the library situation in the province of Ontario. He has been doing this now for the past six or seven weeks and he envisages having his report completed some time around the end of July.

It was agreed with the executive of the OLA at the time that we would not treat libraries in the legislative session until the report from Mr. St. John was complete. Mr. St. John has done an evaluation in two or three American jurisdictions. I believe in the state of Kansas—I am not sure of this—and in Pennsylvania. He is associated with, I believe, the Brooklyn library—I am not positive of this—and he is doing his study, a very exhaustive study, for us and this will be, I am sure, the subject of discussion of some substance here at the next session. I thought, Mr. Chairman, if I brought the hon. member up to date on what has transpired it would cover to a great extent the issue that he is raising.

Mr. Young: Mr. Chairman, I thank the hon. Minister for the information and I would hope that action can take place very quickly. Mr. St. John is now making a survey, as we know, but I think the situation in the province is one of great seriousness. Again it comes back, I think, to the matter that we have discussed time after time in this House, that of regional government. If we are going to find any solution to the library problem, just as with so many other problems, then I think we have to look at libraries as regional matters.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Of course this is the basis of the legislation which was passed last year, Mr. Chairman. We support this principle, but we get back to the problem, that is not dissimilar to the school sections that we faced a year ago. It was felt by the OLA that we should await Mr. St. John's evaluation before we took any more legislative steps.

Mr. Young: Yes, I think this certainly may be true, but at the same time I think we should face the fact that the situation that Miss Schryver found and outlined in her area, as I said, does exist and will be found by Mr. St. John in many other areas. It is one of very great seriousness because she indicates in this report that:

I am convinced, for example, that some of these libraries should not be permitted to continue to exist as they are now run. Their continuation is a perpetuation of something that is worse than nothing. Some of these should be reorganized as deposit stations, for all their books are supplied by county or regional headquarters.

She has some very severe things to say about many of these libraries, although she also points out that many of the town and city libraries are in very good shape and are doing a very significant job. I think that this situation is one we should face; and certainly the survey will help us to understand something of its nature.

It just seems to me that we must come to the place where we face up to the necessity of regional government, and part of the function of that regional government is a library service which will be financed by the region as a whole, with a headquarters library, with the smaller libraries as part and parcel of a central library. The central organization will give guidance and direction and in-service training and will give advice on the purchase of books; if indeed all the books may not be purchased centrally, as I think they must be eventually, and sent out to the various areas, with the school libraries and the public libraries tied in to the one system.

Now, I certainly do not think we can bring the libraries in industry into this sort of pattern. But when we come to the other libraries in the universities and the new community colleges, we are facing another problem which will not be tied into the regional government problem. There is another fact which is very, very important here: we are going to find need for more librarians than we are anticipating at the present time.

The city of Toronto, for example, right now is asking for librarians to put into its elementary schools. If they are serious about this, it means that all of this year's graduates from the Toronto school can be absorbed in the city of Toronto itself; and as industrial libraries expand, as the community colleges expand, then we may find ourselves facing a very serious situation as regards to manpower. With the emergence of regional government and with, I would hope, more money for this whole field, then again I would hope to see staff expanded and standards upgraded.

Now, on this we cannot wait until the whole regional government pattern is set up and so I would hope that out of the report of Mr. St. John will come recommendations which will establish our libraries at least on a county basis so that the counties themselves will go ahead. I am not trying to anticipate his recommendation, but I do feel that it is desperately important that we overcome some of the difficulties outlined by Miss Schryver in her report. The day must come when we face up to this in a realistic way, which we have not up to this time been doing.

There is just one further matter; the whole grant structure must, I think, face revamping. With the new grant structure, of course, must come better salaries in this whole field. As we get increased standards and better training higher salaries will be demanded and I would hope that this government will provide the kind of money which should be available to bring libraries into the 20th century in the province of Ontario.

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Chairman, I would like to go back, if I could, to the question of special schools. I am thinking again of the remarks of the hon. member for Scarborough West and I wonder if he could tell us of some of the facilities that are available for the emotionally disturbed child in the school. Perhaps I could ask him a series of questions.

In the training of teachers for public schools, are they taught any appreciation of the signs of emotional disturbance? I say this because I remember a previous debate in the House when we were talking about the fact that at school level you could detect certain signs of emotional disturbance and the teachers were aware of this themselves.

I remember meeting a doctor from Saskatoon, a public health doctor, who had been doing a series of studies, which apparently he sent over to Britain, because he thought that certain physical ailments were indicative of certain emotional disturbances which developed later. I do not know whether his findings proved anything or not. He referred to such "social ailments," as he called them, as an appendix in a young child. He meant it was an indication that we should be looking further at the child's emotional background.

Interjection by Hon. Mr. Roberts.

Mr. Thompson: That explains a lot to me, Mr. Chairman.

He was suggesting, and I certainly would not do that, that this must be the reason for certain emotional disturbance, coupled with other things. To ease the hon. Prime Minister's worry about having emotional disturbance, it was linked with a number of other areas.

That was my first question, the training of the teachers going out into public schools.

The second thing is about guidance teachers themselves, whether at the public school level or at the secondary school level.

The third thing is not on preventive aspects, but I know that there are many hon. members in this House—I was outside and I do not want to identify the hon. member, but I was talking to him about this problem. He has a relative who has a child in a situation like this. I am sure that we are all extremely sympathetic to this problem of the emotionally disturbed child, and yet we are also aware of the enormity of the problem in many ways. But this does not stop us from at least trying to tackle it. Several years ago in my own riding, a Dovercourt club was organized for the emotionally disturbed child. This was done through The Department of Public Welfare. I have also gone up to the children's village in Ottawa and I must say, as I think of some of the cases—we could all meet cases that are very heartbreaking. When I went into that institution, I met a young girl who had slashed her wrists is a suicide attempt, and I think she was under 12 years of age.

We are aware of these things, but I am wondering if there are special teachers who would move into an institution. We have talked of Jamie and the problem there, and this has been raised in the House. Could I ask about institutions as well after a failure on the part of, perhaps, the school? I do not think that it is just a question of having a small school and a teacher who can handle schizophrenia, although there may be proof, on examination, that this is an enormous help, but I think that the family itself has to accept responsibility in this. I am wondering, if a teacher finds that there is a child who is seriously disturbed, what steps does the teacher take from there? Is there a visit to a psychiatric clinic and are there enough available institutions to deal with these emotionally disturbed children? When I ask, "Are there enough?", I know there are not enough but are we working on this problem and is this connected with the schools?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, I guess I could go into this at some length. I would say that there are really two areas here. One, of course, is the difficulty of identification. The teachers in the teachers' colleges now are having worked into the curriculum the question of being able to identify these youngsters before the problem begins. This, I think, is a very encouraging sign. The in-service training programme is helping these teachers to identify the youngsters so that they can be grouped into special areas, if the legislation permits. Many of the boards have established special classes for this. The Etobicoke area, I think, is an excellent example where they have been able to accomplish something of this nature—

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Chairman, could I interrupt the hon. Minister to ask what kind of teaching is provided to the prospective teacher in connection with this? Could the hon. Minister give us some background on that?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, I cannot give the hon. member any detailed background. The material generally is related to the identification of the emotionally disturbed youngster. We are also having this year, a summer course as part of the special education summer school and education for emotionally disturbed youngsters. This is an option that is being offered this particular summer. We are having people here from Syracuse. The hon. leader of the Opposition is familiar, I am sure, with the work that has been going on in that area and we are going to participate in this course so that we can train teachers.

There is a lot of work to be done in this area, Mr. Chairman, and a lot of it relates, of course, to boards that have been too small over the years to provide the type of service that is becoming necessary, apparently, for these youngsters. It is not absolutely certain, but we think we can handle most of them within the regular school system, and perhaps it would be more appropriate for others to remark on whether some specific type of institution beyond the school should be provided. I am not qualified to do this, but within the school system itself, we think we can—given the proper training to the teachers and the opportunity to identify the youngsters—we can handle them, and this is being proved by several boards in the province that have classes for the emotionally disturbed.

It is true, Mr. Chairman, in almost every other jurisdiction, while the problem itself is not new, its emergence is relatively new and it is coming to the fore now, and is one that we are attempting to resolve. You could say that almost every other jurisdiction is attempting to resolve at this time. We have had people outside our own province attempting to assess what might be done. We have had some excellent experience elsewhere and we think these will be of assistance to us here in this province.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, earlier in the evening I mentioned to the hon. Minister about the community school—community programme type—and I would like to bring to his attention that back in 1961, one of the recommendations of the physical fitness committee was that a pilot project be set up on this. The recommendation specifically is that a community school project be undertaken in one elementary school in several municipalities on an experimental basis.

Now, in Flint, all schools have been renovated for community use. New schools are designed and built as community schools and the cost to operate the additional evening programme is only 6.2 per cent. Will the hon. Minister explain why the department has not undertaken some type of pilot project?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, we have not discouraged this type of pilot project at all. In fact, the board from the town of Brampton with which I am rather familiar, was over at Flint roughly two or three weeks ago, doing an evaluation of the school there. They have their own views on it and I do not think it is appropriate for me to comment. We do not discourage the study of this. It may be that it will have application here but we think it should emanate, as it did in Flint, from the interests of the board, because it has to be related to the community—the shared facility of park accommodation, recreational accommodation. While, I think, from the department's standpoint, we have not had a specific proposal, if such a proposal were made, I think we would be very interested in it.

Mr. Newman: Would the hon. Minister consider increasing the grant in my own community 6.2 per cent so that it could undertake a pilot project?

Hon. Mr. Davis: We would have to see the proposal first, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Newman: May I inform the hon. Minister then, that the select committee on youth met with the original members of the group that studied physical fitness back in 1961, and they informed us that Flint, before this programme was undertaken, had one of the highest delinquency rates in the United States and today it is one of the lowest. So surely from that aspect alone the institution of a community programme or community school programme would be most worthwhile.

THE EMERGENCY MEASURES ACT, 1962-1963

Hon. A. A. Wishart (Attorney General) moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to amend The Emergency Measures Act, 1962-1963.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Hon. A. A. Wishart (Attorney General): Mr. Speaker, the Act is a very brief one containing short amendments. The first three sections are designed to carry out some changes in departmental organization. The fourth section provides for the supplementing of the municipal plans in the event of an emergency and for the co-ordination of such plans.

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): I wonder, Mr. Speaker, if I might ask the hon. Attorney General a question. Does this mean that his department is going to take an active and vital role now in the control of emergency measures?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I would think this is very definitely part of the intention of the bill.

Hon. W. A. Stewart (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day, I regret to state that present indications are that there is a strong possibility that last year's drought conditions may recur this year.

Meteorologists' predictions, based on a long-term forecast, indicate that precipitation may again this year be short of normal in some areas of the province. The situation is further aggravated in eastern Ontario by reason of the fact that there is no carry-over of moisture from last year. Reports reaching our department indicate that germination has been slow and that pastures are well behind the normal stage.

In an endeavour to lessen the impact of drought conditions on the farm operator in the provision of fodder for livestock feed, the soils and crop branch is suggesting strongly that farmers in the drought area endeavour to meet the situation, in some degree, by the planting of alternative crops. The replacement of unproductive meadows and pastures is the first consideration.

It is suggested that, in meadows and pastures seriously depleted of alfalfa and other legumes, if the remaining sward consists of such grasses as brome, orchard, and timothy, nitrogen at rates of 50-75 pound actual N per acre will give substantial yield increases, provided, of course, that sufficient moisture is present to make the nitrogen available. This can be applied either before cutting or immediately after to stimulate regrowth.

Of course, it is not at all hopeless, as supplementary forage crops still have considerable promise for increased feed tonnage. The relatively new sudan-sorghum hybrids should be given first consideration. This heat-loving, drought-resistant crop, once established, is capable of producing 20-30 tons per acre of green forage. It can be seeded up to June 25. However, early June seeding offers best chances for success and is highly recommended.

Corn, as an ensilage crop, consistently out-yields the sudan-sorghum hybrids. Corn seeded at Guelph on June 23 last year yielded between six and seven tons dry matter, chopped, on September 23. Except where the crop is to be pastured, corn should be given preference over the sudan sorghums. While early hybrids are preferred, lack of seed of early varieties should not deter a farmer from using corn.

Later hybrids, while they will not have the grain content, will produce a good tonnage of green feed. Even the corn from last year's crop, in the crib or bin, will do for this purpose, so long as the germination is 60 per cent or better. If using this seed, it is necessary to adjust seeding rate to allow for possible lower germination.

Some farmers are of the opinion that oats has been underrated as a forage crop. If well established and grazed rotationally, oats has good regrowth capabilities and provides a worthwhile volume of feed. Two bushels of oats plus 20 pounds of sudan grass makes a satisfactory mixture. Oats alone for pasture should be seeded at three to 3.5 bushels per acre.

Without rainfall, seeding delays can only result in seeding into drier ground, with consequently poorer establishment. Moisture is essential for the germination of any seed and, with soil moisture at a very low level, it seems advisable to have some acreage of emergency crop planted to be ready to take advantage of the first showers.

I would advise the House that some discussions have been held by officials of our department with The Department of Agriculture at Ottawa on the subject of agrometeorology, with emphasis on long-term weather forecasts. Current plans are to appoint a special agrometeorological committee to give specific thought to the subject, with the view of determining what developments can be made in the field of weather forecasts designed specifically for the guidance of the farm people of the province.

In view of the situation as I have outlined it, the department is continuing to urge farmers to practise all possible forms of water conservation. That there is a growing awareness of the necessity of conservation measures is evident from the number of farm ponds that have been, or are being, constructed throughout the province.

It may be of interest to the House that, during the past fiscal year, 508 farm ponds were constructed in the province and that, during the year, more than 1,000 calls were made at the engineering offices of our department in connection with the design and specifications of all types of ponds. At the present moment, there are 374 pond applications on file. It is significant that, during the year, the number of calls made by engineers of The Department of Agriculture was seven times as great as during the previous year. It is anticipated that the demand and interest will continue in view of the lack of adequate precipitation. I am pleased with the acceptance of this programme which holds so much promise for the present and the future.

May I say, Mr. Speaker, that I have asked the extension branch of our department in the areas concerned to give every assistance to rural people in providing advice on how to meet the situation.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Clerk of the House: The seventeenth order; House in committee of supply. Mr. W. G. Noden in the chair.

On vote 509:

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): Mr. Chairman, most of us received in the mail this morning a document suggesting that there may be, and I quote, "a shocking sensational textbook scandal." Under the circumstances and in order to clear the air, Mr. Chairman, I think the hon. Minister of Education (Mr. Davis) should now be prepared to state finally, conclusively and without equivocation whether or not a baseball curves when pitched by a skilled pitcher.

Hon. W. G. Davis (Minister of Education): Mr. Chairman, I must confess I have not seen this letter this morning.

Mr. Bryden: I will send it to you.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Good idea.

Mr. J. Renwick (Riverdale): Mr. Chairman, I would like to speak on vote 509—technological and trades training branch. I do so to take issue with the hon. Minister on what appears to me to be the ambivalence in his attitude toward the basic question in education in Ontario, namely, the relationship between what has been variously described as the contrast of education with training, which was a phrase used throughout the statement made by the hon. Minister when he introduced the bill on the community colleges. It has been variously described as "a contrast between cultural aspects of education and vocational aspects." In economic terms it is sometimes referred to as "the consumer aspect contrasted with the investment aspect of education," or in the phraseology that the hon. Minister himself used in introducing his estimates, "the contrast between skills and facts and attitudes and ideas."

It would appear to me that if we stand back and take a look at what has happened in the educational structure in the province, we would recognize historically in the province that the whole ambit of secondary education has been conditioned to a very high degree by the very narrow funnel at the top, of admission to universities for higher education. I think that a study of the educational system in Ontario discloses that that very narrow funnel at the top has had a back pressure throughout the secondary school system—and indeed, back into the primary system—in conditioning the curriculum of both the primary and the secondary schools in terms of leading to a higher education only through the universities. I think this pressure and this rigidity within the system has inhibited the use of the tremendous potential which is certainly now available, and, I think has been available in the past among secondary school students because of their lack of higher training in branches other than the recognized university courses.

I think this restricting influence of the universities—and it is understandable in a sense—but it is an extremely conservative attitude of the universities which has led to a limiting and a raising of the entrance requirements into the universities and has, I repeat, produced a rigidity in the secondary school systems which has not as yet been alleviated.

Now, it is perfectly true that the streaming plan or the Roberts plan was an effort to take some of the explosive back pressure out of the educational system by providing other avenues for students at the secondary level. To a degree it has been a pressure valve on the educational system, but has now, in my view, served its purpose and must give way to what is in fact the trend in education, certainly throughout the western world. I do not think this government can afford to ignore it. It is not a question of introducing something which is foreign to our system, it is a question of recognizing that throughout the whole of the western world—indeed elsewhere in the world—certain trends in education are developing, which are quite contrary to the Roberts plan or to the streaming plan.

The trend is very definitely toward a common-stem approach to education with emphasis on general education, carrying through to a point somewhere half way up the scale of the secondary educational system.

Now, another aspect of this very same problem is that we all recognize and know that we are moving into a society where there is going to be a high premium placed on manpower skills, and that the emphasis in our educational system is going to be toward highly skilled people within our economy so that the economy and the productivity of the economy can continue to increase, because it is on that productivity that the whole of our society depends to a very great extent.

But the constant and continuous emphasis which is being placed on skilful training as distinct from the general type of education is likely to lead to an overbalance in the educational system in favour of specific skills for individual students, whereas what we do in fact need in our educational system at the present time is a general education. This is gradually being proved to mean that people can, throughout their lifetimes, move more readily from one skill to another skill, if they have a proper basic grounding in the fundamentals of a general education, which, of course, is also the consumption aspect of education or the cultural aspect of education, just as much as it is an education for earning their livelihood or making their contribution in what is becoming a highly skilled society.

It seemed to me in all the discussions, whether it had to do with the university affairs or whether it had to do with community colleges or whether it had to do with The Department of Education itself, that the government has not clearly stated in any way its position on the contrast between the cultural and the vocational, and the contrast between education and training, and the contrast between skills and attitudes. It would appear that the government simply feels, and the hon. Minister simply feels, that these two parallel courses are going to continue in some way in our communities without any very definite plans being made to recognize the basic fact that they are not separate trends in our society at all, but that the curriculum, the programme and the training throughout our whole educational system must be to intertwine inextricably both aspects of education so that there is no one entering our society who is simply a skilled craftsman without having a basic general education. And similarly, that the people having a general education are also going to have the skills and abilities which come from specialization.

Earlier in the estimates the hon. Minister dismissed the suggestion made by the hon. leader of our party (Mr. MacDonald) about the programme which is taking place in Sweden, on the basis that that was foreign to Ontario and that we must preserve whatever there is of uniqueness in our own society, in our own educational system. We would be the first to agree with that but I do not think that the hon. Minister, in the light of the studies which have been made, can continue to take the viewpoint that the streaming system, the Robarts plan, as it is at the present time, is adequate or bears any relevance to current trends in education throughout the world. Simply for the record and in order to reflect what I have been trying to say, and to try to put on the record the trends throughout the world in education, I would refer to two rather brief paragraphs in the study group, "Economic aspects of higher education," published by the organization for economic co-operation and development, last year in Paris. One of the articles deals with preliminary findings of the international study of university admissions. This study was undertaken to investigate present conditions of access to higher education throughout the world. It was established jointly by UNESCO and the international association of universities.

Its principal task was to explore the causes underlying the existing problems of admission to higher education. After discussing various problems that arose within that field, it made some very pertinent remarks about the studies which have been carried on in this field, to which I have been referring in these remarks. What it has said is:

There have been many changes in the secondary school systems of the world. According to the World Survey of Education, a UNESCO publication based entirely upon statements submitted throughout government channels, half of the 95 countries which have complete educational systems, in the sense that they offer programmes at all three levels, had in 1950, secondary systems which offered three parallel lines to the student. One line led directly to higher education via the familiar channels of the gymnasium, the college or other well established programme of general secondary education. One line prepared for primary school teaching and one line prepared for technical and vocation work. These lines separated after the end of primary school. Most of the remaining countries had in 1950 two parallel lines of general secondary education, one is already described, leading directly to higher education, the other presenting a common first cycle followed by a split cycle in which the student chose either teacher training or technical education. A few countries had other systems which might be described in broad terms as a single line of education either branching out in the second cycle into separate programmes or a single line operating through comprehensive schools which included technical and teacher training programmes. However, by 1959 the number of countries retaining and apparently planning to retain the three-parallel-line system had dropped by almost 50 per cent to fewer than 30, with the majority changing or planning changes to the common stem type of secondary programme dividing only for the second part. Of the countries following the two line system in 1950 numbering about 40, at least one-third had also moved or were planning to move to the common stem programme.

In other words, the general trend of movement in secondary education has been toward a common programme and for a first cycle followed by a division at the upper level, thus extending general education for all to a point about midway in the secondary school. A change of this nature on such a wide scale is obviously made in response to a pressing situation, and in turn presages other changes in the direction of further extension of general secondary education which will probably become noticeable in the latter part of this decade. It is not at all beyond the bounds of reasonable prophecy to suggest that a similar series of changes in higher education may take place during the next decade.

I believe that those two paragraphs illustrate the world-wide nature of the trend which is developing in secondary education and how much out of step the present educational policy in the province of Ontario is when compared with that comprehensive and definitive study which was made of the secondary school systems.

It would appear to me that the hon. Minister should now, in these estimates, state his viewpoint as to what his intentions are to depart from the stream system into what is referred to as the common stem approach to secondary education. He should also state very clearly that the intention, so far as the secondary school system, so far as the community colleges are concerned, is to provide within the framework of those levels of education this inextricable intertwining of the two aspects of education which are going to be so very important both to the economy of the province of Ontario and the general well-being, the general educational level, in the province of Ontario.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, I will just comment on this very briefly. I really thought I had dealt with this before. It is very difficult to answer this with respect to the proposed colleges of applied arts and technology. If you were to check carefully, for instance, the curriculum existing at Ryerson or the other institutes of technology, you would find that a relatively high degree of academic work is required. This, of course, I think, will become general as far as the colleges of applied arts and technology are concerned.

I did relate to the House, and I made the observation, it is not that we ignore what is going on in these other jurisdictions, but you have to assess individual needs within the jurisdictions. I think one could say there has been a slightly different traditional approach to education in many western European countries through the gymnasias up into university, but the percentage of students retained in the secondary—if you could call it secondary—system is lower, and has been lower, in many of the European countries, particularly in the United Kingdom.

I would perhaps take issue with the theory that most jurisdictions are moving towards—as the hon. member refers to it—the common stem approach. I think, quite frankly, it could be traditional in Europe that there has been a much sharper division between the academic and the technical vocational. I think there will be a tendency—and it is very difficult to predict this—in some American states towards the type of programme that we have instituted here in Ontario. I think you will find some of the other provinces of Canada will be moving more rapidly than they have in the past into what we call the programme one situation.

We agree, Mr. Chairman, there is no question about this, that the secondary school students should have as broad a basis as possible in their entire approach to education. I think I mentioned this when I was replying to the hon. member for York South (Mr. MacDonald).

As I pointed out, the common year is grade 9 except, quite frankly, for the occupational courses. I think even at the UNESCO meeting there was unanimous agreement that for this group of students at least you related a different type of programme to their needs.

But taking students generally, whether they be in the four or five year programme—and once again you are discussing in many jurisdictions just a four year programme not five years at the secondary level—forty per cent of the time is spent in the shop work or the vocational work in the four year technological programmes and 50 per cent is spent on academic. The academic work in many areas relates to the same work you would be getting in the five year stream. We think we are maintaining a very excellent balance to give the students sufficient flexibility so that they can adapt to change.

We are not—and I make this very clear, Mr. Chairman—we are not giving students specific skilled training. We are trying to interest them in a wide area, whether it be in electronics or technician courses at the high school so that they can move, if five years hence they need to, into other areas of skilled work. We are maintaining a very high percentage of broad academic content. I think you will find that the curriculum here, if it is studied carefully and the situation assessed, is not such a great departure from what they are contemplating in the report to which the hon. member referred. I say, I think you will find a trend in this general direction in many other jurisdictions.

They have found, as I stated on the community college bill debate, with the straight academic approach, it has been the experience in most American states to grade 12 and on into the junior college or community college that there is perhaps—hon. members who were on the tour with the youth committee will recall from discussions where the principals or the leaders of the community colleges took part—an interest in having at least some introductory work in the technological area at the secondary level. They are establishing the system with no training or no interest in this area at the present time.

We have no hesitation, as far as the hon. member is concerned, as to just what position we take. We are very much in support of taking a broad academic approach to all three streams, but at the same time we think that having certain of these subjects available to our students has been the main reason why they are remaining within the school system for a longer period of time. We think they will be able to adjust economically and socially, to the very much changed conditions that we will face.

As I say, I think that the trend that is established here is not out of keeping with what is happening in other jurisdictions. They started from a different base. They started, I think, from a much more rigid approach to education than we have had here. I hope we are achieving something here that is close to the happy medium. We are, of course, keeping an eye on this and interesting ourselves in what is happening in other jurisdictions, but our reaction to date is that we are moving in the right direction in this province.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Mr. Chairman, I have a number of specific questions I would like to raise with the hon.

Minister, but let me come back and add a footnote to the extended comments I made in my introductory statement on this point.

I was talking a bit at cross-purposes, and the hon. Minister has made it clear now that he believes people are moving in our direction, rather than in the direction—as my hon. colleague from Riverdale pointed out—suggested in an overall, comprehensive survey of secondary and post-secondary education in the world carried out by UNESCO.

The basic point is this: It seems to me that we agree that we need skills in the kind of technological aids we have available, but the significant point is that you cannot give these skills by starting an early streaming, because the student has not adequate general education as a base.

Hon. Mr. Davis: We agree with that.

Mr. MacDonald: You agree with it in principle—and I think this is rather significant. If I might just emphasize the point before I go ahead and cope with your alleged agreement and show that I think there is some area of disagreement here that we have to take a look at—it is rather significant that about 1959, to quote the actual date in the quotation that my hon. friend from Riverdale has put on record, there emerged this new trend which has resulted in half of the country moving back toward what he called the “common stem” approach. Under it you make absolutely certain that the student gets a basic general education, in the belief that skills can be acquired later. Indeed, if you do not have your basic education, you will not have the adaptability assured by a basic education to change your skills throughout life, as you may have to do, two or three times.

Let me try to make my point this way. I was rather interested to receive a letter from a person who is very familiar with post-secondary education in the province of Ontario at the technical and technological level. His comment was this. He said that he had had a fair bit of experience with people in the four-year commercial courses and that he was convinced that for most of them it is pointless to talk about higher education, because they lack the necessary base in maths and English. He went on to say:

I am equally convinced that most of these students can acquire that base, but surely the place to acquire it is in high school.

In other words, the hon. Minister says, “We recognize what is needed, so we are building community colleges.” The community college is going to pick up after grade 12, but here is somebody who is fairly familiar with coping with students from the grade 12 level, and his conclusion is that it is idle to talk about higher education for many of these because they simply have not got the basic education in mathematics and English.

This emphasizes the fact that there is no point in talking about community colleges that will carry on beyond grade 12 because in the lower streams—if I may describe them as such—we have not provided those who are going to grade 12 and are not going on to university with the adequate educational base to enable them to acquire the skills that are needed in modern society. Here is the point that I think we have to focus attention on.

In my introductory statement I said that I was one of those who supported the Robarts plan and the introduction of the Robarts plan; I pleaded for years after I got into this Legislature, prior to its introduction. But it is rather significant and, I think, confirms my suggestion, that because we were so late in introducing it, it was out of date almost as quickly as we started to introduce it. We started to introduce it about 1959 or 1960, the thought and the discussion on it—no, the actual date was about 1961, as a matter of fact—it was right in the middle of another convention, the leadership convention.

Actually, two or three years before we got around to establishing this, other countries that had had it for years were recognizing the inadequacies of it in terms of giving a broad enough basic education to be able to acquire the necessary skills at a later stage.

What adaptation can be made of this, I do not profess to be enough of a technician to know, but I submit the view of this person who has a lot of contact with students at the post-secondary level from grade 12 and who says it is idle to talk about higher education because they do not have the basis to acquire higher education. This is the point we have to take a look at, and this is what you are going to do in your community colleges.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, I think, too, that we should clear up this problem. This gentleman who is referring to this, of course, has not had any four-year graduates yet from the reorganized programme, because they do not come out until a year from now. I think he is referring to the commercial students who, over a period of years, perhaps were put into the commercial course at the high school under the plans that then existed, and they were not too complete—I think we have to be very frank about this. The students were not getting the same treatment they are getting under the reorganized programme. I do not think that we can really assess this yet, because we have had no four-year commercial graduates; we will not have them until a year from this June. There are no graduates.

Mr. MacDonald: Are you suggesting that there is a broader education up to grade 12 provided by the new commercial courses?

Hon. Mr. Davis: I have no doubt that the four-year and even the five-year commercial or business and commerce stream, as it has been established now, has a much broader base academically than has been the case in the past, and, as I say, when you try to relate this to European jurisdictions—and I am not that familiar with it—I think you will find they had a much more rigid approach to their technical or vocational training. It was far more specialized than what we are attempting to do here in our school system, and I think one would have to look at and make a very thorough study of the systems in Europe before one could draw a valid comparison. It all depends on the starting point as to where you are going and what you are achieving.

When hon. members suggest that they are moving in an opposite direction from ours, I think they have to evaluate very carefully where they are starting from and it may be that we are not too far apart at this present time.

There is a high academic content; we insist on this, we are very concerned with this, even in the occupational courses. We are trying to give these youngsters—who are, quite frankly, learning how to be service-station attendants—courses in English and mathematics in order to give them as broad an experience as we possibly can. There is no question, Mr. Chairman, that this type of approach has been instrumental in retaining many of these youngsters in the school system and this is why I think we and you have to go jurisdiction by jurisdiction. We have a higher percentage of the young people in our secondary system compared to the United Kingdom.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, I will leave the matter there for this year. In the fullness of another year—

Hon. Mr. Davis: We will have a better idea then.

Mr. MacDonald: There is an assortment of questions on which I would like to have some elaboration from the hon. Minister.

I was interested in a number of the courses that were under consideration in the technological and trades training branch, as revealed in the testimony of the former superintendent, Mr. Johnston. What, for example, has been the record and the assessment of the new technicians' course worked out in conjunction with the construction industry? Second, I was extremely interested in the spelling out of courses made available for small businessmen.

Mr. Chairman, my colleague, the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Freeman), expounded our views on the problems of the small businessmen surviving in the rough and tumble of our competitive system today, and he pointed out that one of the great difficulties is a lack of know-how on the part of an individual operator who increasingly had to cope with a very complex kind of economy. Indeed, I think it is accurate to say that those who have been directing the destinies of the Ontario development agency have discovered that one of the greatest needs on the part of industry, in some instances, is not credit, not money, but just more know-how. They simply do not know how to operate their businesses in an efficient, modern way.

Therefore, it would seem to me that courses which are going to be providing an opportunity for small businessmen to become more efficient as managers are extremely useful and perhaps as great a contribution as anything else to helping small businessmen to survive. I wonder if the hon. Minister might report on what experience there has been on that and what likelihood of expansion there is, if any.

Third in this category of questions, I was most interested in the suggestion that there was in the offing a possibility of duplicating the Leaside in-plant study in three parts of the province: one in eastern Ontario, one in northwestern Ontario, and one in southwestern Ontario. This was just prospective last September. Has anything developed on this prospect?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, taking them in order, it is too early to determine yet the effectiveness of the construction technicians' course, as it has been in its first year only. These people will be going into industry for the summer months and we are very enthused to date by the response. We think it has been a very excellent course. The students apparently are more than content with it and once again, we will have to see on graduation just how effective it has been.

We have also had discussions with the plastics industry and with the Royal college of dental surgeons, the lumbering association, the association of land surveyors, the optical and photographic industries, even the Ontario association of architects—to try to establish technician courses—and you might call them, once again, paraprofessional courses—to relate to their specific situations, and we anticipate that we will develop courses from these discussions, along similar patterns to the construction technicians' course.

With respect to small business management, I have attended two or three of their graduations. I think that this course is an area that is being very helpful to small businessmen. We have had more than 135 courses in this province. They are sponsored usually by the local chamber of commerce or the board of trade. The enrolment has been excellent. The chamber of commerce has been very kind in its attitude and remarks about the course. It felt the course has been most helpful in the areas across the province where it has been offered.

Mr. MacDonald: What is the aggregate enrolment?

Hon. Mr. Davis: I would say, Mr. Chairman, the enrolment would average, and this is just a guess, somewhere around 30 or so, perhaps 30 to 40 per course.

Mr. MacDonald: About 1,000 altogether then?

Hon. Mr. Davis: There would be roughly 1,000, about 1,100, I think, maybe slightly more than that to date. As the communities or the chambers of commerce show interest, we intend to expand this facility to the extent that the need is shown. We think we have some very good personnel and we have, we believe, very good courses.

With respect to the Leaside project experiment, we are involved now in Peterborough, Kitchener and Sault Ste. Marie, and we have discussions under way with one or two other centres to continue this programme, which I would agree, Mr. Chairman, we should be doing more of. It is a unique type of programme, and as I said to the House the other day, we have had inquiries from all over the United States and Europe as to this approach to upgrading or retraining on the job and we look forward to an extension of this. Although it does take substantial interest on the part of industry, we cannot do this type of programme alone. But these are the three centres where this project is now being extended.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, I assume from what the hon. Minister says, that he is considering it, it is not actually established?

Hon. Mr. Davis: No, it is in the process of being established.

Mr. MacDonald: Dealing with this latter point, Mr. Chairman, this is the distressing thing and I am not laying the blame wholly on the government—

Hon. Mr. Davis: It is established in those other three centres. It is operating.

Mr. MacDonald: It is established?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Yes.

Mr. MacDonald: Oh, that undercuts the comment I was going to make. The basic problem until now has been the limited interest on the part of industry and therefore the difficulty of getting an acceptance of this kind of programme. If the hon. Minister was going to tell me at the end of the academic year the same thing he told me at the beginning of the academic year, that this was still under study, it would have underlined our basic problem pretty seriously. However, perhaps with these four experiments, we will have enough of an incentive for others to move into the picture.

Hon. Mr. Davis: I think we have moved beyond the experimental stage. I think we have been able to establish the validity of this approach.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, the final point in this connection. Let me come back to what I think is the basic requirement. I tried to underline it in my concluding remarks during my introduction in quotations from the testimony of the select committee—what is being done by way of research in this branch in terms of assessing the new areas in which it might set up classes. The proposition that there is only one man engaged in research, I think as I said earlier, is a little short of ludicrous. I know that it might be argued that The Department of Education may not be the place to do it—it may be The Department of Labour, it may be in Ottawa—but let us forget the relative merits of where it should be done, because surely The Department of Education, where you are going to be instituting these classes, is good, and perhaps better, than any other area.

I would like to suggest to the hon. Minister—and to seek his comments—that it would be a good expenditure of money to develop a corps of even 12 or 15 people, perhaps even more, who would be combing this province, sitting down, with the various agencies in industries, pursuing in detail the development of an interest in this kind of course and then back to the development of the course itself so that it could be instituted. If there is not this kind of leadership given at the centre we are not going to have the kind of development, or the proportions of the development, that we need across the province. Even worse, Mr. Chairman, in some instances we are going to have developments that will be obsolete before they get established because it will be a well-meaning intention on the part of local people who have access to the funds, to build buildings. They will go ahead and build them and institute courses that will be based on obsolete skills.

I wonder if the hon. Minister can give us some assurance that there is going to be a pretty serious expansion of the research aspects of this programme.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Well, Mr. Chairman, I think the hon. member's point really is well taken. This is—and I am not making apologies—a relatively new programme, it has kept us busy actually working out the many courses we have to date and we think we have been really fairly successful in this area. The question of research, whether research, as we know it, should be done by, say, The Department of Education, The Department of Labour, particularly the federal Department of Labour that has been giving us some very good guidance in this area—I think is immaterial. The fact remains that in some way or other it must be done. We have two professors from the University of Western Ontario presently doing research on the validity of programme 5, tracing case histories, seeing how effective the courses are and whether there should be something further done in this area. The Department of Labour is doing a survey now, I think it is in the Cornwall area, in conjunction with our branch to determine the type of courses and the effectiveness of the training within that particular situation and through our own discussions—and whether you can call this research such as we had with the construction industry and are presently engaged in with these other aspects of industry—really this is a form, I guess, of research in order to establish these courses.

It is difficult—and I am not making excuses for industry either—it is, I think, difficult for industry even, to predict accurately their manpower skill requirements for, say, 10 years hence. This is a problem, I would think, for them as well. And this is why we get back to the discussions we had before, that no matter what types of courses are developed, we have to give them as broad a base educationally as we can so that as new skills develop, new techniques develop. They can adapt to them, and this is, of course, what we are hoping to build into the entire system so that no matter what retraining or upgrading course is given—as you will know at these programme 5 centres we are trying to give them English, maths, and some general subjects so that they can, if necessary, adapt some time in the future.

To be specific, Mr. Chairman, on the question of research, just how or what will evolve and whether you refer to it as specifically research or a question of co-operation with our branch and The Department of Labour and industry, I can assure the hon. members that we think we can evolve some pattern that will do this effectively. I do not know whether the term "research" is the proper one. It may be. But whatever it is, I can assure the hon. member we are aware of the problem and we intend to work something out that will be satisfactory.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, there is a final area that I would like to explore with the hon. Minister. Let me set the context by a brief quotation from a study of the university presidents on community colleges. They say:

At the present time 70 per cent of the population of the province live within 25 miles of a university. With the proposed extensions of university work through off-campus colleges that percentage may well be increased to over 90.

And I may interject here, I find that a little difficult—

Hon. Mr. Davis: From our impression I think it is a shade high.

Mr. MacDonald: Yes. Well, I am glad to have my suspicions confirmed.

Hon. Mr. Davis: I have not actually analyzed this, we are in the process of doing it.

Mr. MacDonald: The study continues:

It would never reach 100 because of the vast areas of the sparsely settled north, but we understand that consideration is being given to providing boarding allowances for students from the isolated points in order to give them equal opportunity for higher education. Residential accommodation for a proportion of the students is an intrinsic part of the planning of all Ontario universities.

Now, my comment is with reference not only to universities but to the whole range of post-secondary development that we now have in the envisaged community colleges. Is the hon. Minister in a position to indicate whether the government has made up its mind on the proposition of boarding allowances, which presumably would make it possible for students to come and live in existing accommodation; and secondly, is the hon. Minister in a position also to give us a clear picture of how far the government might go in terms of providing residential accommodation for students, not only in any of these developments that take place in the north, but again, as has been drawn to my attention, in some of our technological institutes in the south? For example, take the Eastern Ontario institute of technology in Ottawa. Here you have students drawn from across the 11 counties of eastern Ontario. They simply cannot go home, they have to be in Ottawa, they might as well be 500 miles from home as the 50, 60, 70 or up to 100 miles that they may be away. I am told that until there is more extensive development of student co-operative facilities or some other kind of facility at the student level, this poses a very serious hardship on those who happen to come from outside the city of Ottawa itself, beyond commuting distance. So my questions are really: What is the government policy on boarding allowances? What is its policy on assistance for construction of residences in the new post-secondary development, not only in northern Ontario but some sections of the south?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Well, Mr. Chairman, as a matter of policy at the moment, and as I stated in my statement on the colleges of applied arts and technology, we envisage them as being commuter-type institutions. While I think the figure that is mentioned in the presidents' brief is high, actually, if you were to encircle the existing university, say, with a radius of 40 miles—which is I think within commuting distance, certainly secondary students are travelling this far for their classes—you would cover a very major portion of the population here in southern Ontario. There is no question about this. I would think, as the colleges of applied arts and technology are established, that in southern Ontario we would like to do it without establishing residential facilities.

At the Lethbridge junior college, for instance, they are commuting 40 miles even to this post-secondary institution, in order to attend school.

Mr. MacDonald: Do they supply buses?

Hon. Mr. Davis: No, they have to do this on their own.

Mr. MacDonald: This is a pretty major factor.

Hon. Mr. Davis: That is right. Now, in dealing with the question in Northern Ontario we are in the process of actually entering into a scheme at Kirkland Lake to have residential facilities perhaps available there for the students and I would anticipate this might extend as far as other establishments in the remote sections of the province. The question of Ottawa has not been raised with us, quite frankly, as to whether more students might attend if there were residential accommodation. This we would have to assess, but I think the hon. member will appreciate that it is a very expensive programme to get into—providing facilities—if it is at all possible for the students to commute. We would like to encourage this type of development, and place the colleges where they can attend.

As to the possibility that the present rates of allowances for students be raised, I think they were anticipating something that maybe was not in the last federal budget. I do not know. I am not familiar with it. There is certainly no plan here at this stage because we do have the assistance in the form of bursary scholarships and perhaps the Canada student loans really would be adequate for many of the students who are moving into the urban centres. As I say, I am not familiar with what they were thinking about.

Mr. MacDonald: While I examined it carefully, it gives no indication from where they are expected.

Hon. Mr. Davis: From where they are expected? I do not know either.

Mr. R. F. Nixon (Brant): Mr. Chairman, the responsibility of the hon. Minister's department to keep the courses in our technological and trade training schools right up to date, is, of course, very great. I can remember hearing discussion in this House some time ago as to the fact that some of the old trades such as woodworking would no longer be emphasized and that trades training right up to date would be the goal. In this connection I would like to draw to the attention of the House the report of a speech made by the chairman of the Canadian furniture manufacturers' association at a convention recently held in Toronto. I will not read very much of it but he states specifically that 400 trained people are required now in Ontario alone and more will be by the end of the year. This deals with the requirements of the woodworking trade itself, particularly in the furniture construction business. His claim is that the industry is being retarded by the lack of adequately trained people who will work in these factories.

The furniture construction business is of some special importance in Ontario. It uses one of our native products, wood, and not only that but it is not a type that can be automated on a grand style. It provides small industries that are readily set up in parts of this province outside of the Metropolitan Toronto area. His comment along these lines indicates that in his view the lack of planning is a disgrace and I quote him on this. In his advice to the educational authorities, he says, and I quote: "Stop yakking and get going."

Although a great deal of research has been undertaken as far as the hon. Minister is concerned, perhaps the direct channels of communication between the industries of the province and those who set up the curriculum are something less than clear and the hon. Minister should take steps to see that the provisions required by our own industries are met. Woodworking is one, the needle trades are apparently another. There has been some considerable discussion about importing labour to fill these needs. I wonder just what the clear channels of direct contact are. We are delighted to hear the hon. Minister say considerable research is being undertaken by his department and The Department of Labour, but naturally even ahead of that come the direct and immediate requirements.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, there are programmes going on in the needle trade. Dealing with the furniture programme, there have been sessions with the furniture manufacturers' association and they have suggested to us that we establish shops within our high schools in the Kitchener area, where the high school students would be asked to specialize in specific skills. This departs, quite frankly, from the basic principle we are attempting to maintain and the one that we have been discussing here this morning of keeping the programme in high schools as broad as we can.

We have suggested that we establish the technicians' course for the woodworking people within the institutes of technology at a vocational centre, because, as I gather it, furniture-making today is becoming a fairly technical operation and it is the technician who is required. I would envisage that this type of course would be developed.

We do hesitate to introduce into the high school in this one specific area a specific highly specialized course. While we are very sympathetic to the needs of the industry, perhaps this would be more adequately done, say, in night school accommodation or in some other approach. But we hesitate to do this as part of the regular school programme. This might perhaps be unwise.

Mr. Nixon: I would not for a moment suggest that anything be done to take away from a basic education that is as broad as possible, particularly in our high schools. One of the main criticisms that we have of the proposed colleges of applied arts and technology is that we do not feel the hon. Minister has taken proper cognizance of the importance of this broad education but, it seems to me that with the number of special programmes that are available it is not unreasonable to expect that the needs of this particular industry could be met and could be met rather readily. We know the drawbacks of the operation of programme 5 in many areas, but there does not seem to be a suitable programme that will give them good jobs when they graduate and this accounts for the large percentage of drop-outs from the programme 5 area. While I am in this area, I wonder if the hon. Minister could give us again specific statistics relating to the drop-out rate in programme 5 effort.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Yes, as of the month of March, the completions, or at least the discontinued, were roughly 753; there were 3,062 additions; initially there were 8,149 in the course. This would mean that the drop-out rate would be roughly about 20 per cent—20 or 25—and what we hope to determine in the surveys that are being conducted now with the assistance of The Department of Labour is specifically why they are dropping out.

We think from the information we have had to date they are finding jobs. This is really why they are leaving the course. I would say close to 75 per cent—perhaps 70 per cent—of the trainees do complete the course, and, as I said yesterday, in the neighbourhood of 90 per cent—85 to 90—have been finding jobs when they have completed their training.

We are anxious to find out exactly why they are leaving the course, whether it is too difficult, whether they just lose interest; we think it is primarily because they have found some suitable employment.

Mr. Nixon: I would agree with the hon. Minister, Mr. Chairman, that it is an outstandingly important project that we know precisely why they do leave the programme 5 courses.

Hon. Mr. Davis: That is what we are trying to find out.

Mr. Nixon: Certainly the amendment of these courses should be fairly easy. The hon. Minister has said time and time again that they should be kept flexible, that they can provide immediate training as needs come up, and this of course would be impossible unless we knew the reason we were losing such a large number of the people concerned.

Before we leave this vote, Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the hon. Minister if the federal government accepts any responsibility other than the financial responsibility with the research and the general overseeing of the courses.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Yes, they assume, of course, 50 per cent of the cost, and I would be very frank, Mr. Chairman, and say they have been very helpful as far as advice is concerned with regard to requirements for courses. We have had very excellent co-operation with the federal authorities. There is no question about this, whatsoever.

Mr. Nixon: And the present programme is going to extend indefinitely, as far as the federal contributions are concerned, both in this area and in the development of vocational schools across the province?

Hon. Mr. Davis: No, Mr. Chairman, we are not sure about this. We had a meeting of the Ministers of Education a week ago Tuesday here in Toronto, and this is one subject that we asked be discussed. We have unanimously agreed to request the federal government to give some indication as to whether the agreement would be extended beyond March 31, 1967. We have no indications of this at the moment, and, of course, for our own planning we think it is important that we know very shortly.

Mr. Nixon: And they, of course, up to that time, will pay 50 per cent of the cost of all construction associated with this and the equipping of the schools?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Yes.

Mr. Nixon: What responsibilities are taken for maintenance? Is there any federal responsibility there?

Hon. Mr. Davis: There is a current operating grant of 50 per cent at the post-secondary level for the high schools. Our grant is on a per-capita basis and I think last year it amounted to some $800,000 or $900,000. I made representations—I thought that they were fairly strong representations—that the federal government should assume in this programme 1, 50 per cent of the excess. Now the resolution from the Ministers just said all the excess—I suggested 50 per cent of the excess of the cost of vocational over academic training, which might have cost, roughly, $100 per student. To date, we have had no reaction to this request.

Mr. Nixon: I will not pursue this much farther, but I would say that if the arrangement is definite into 1967, this is not an unreasonable planning date.

Hon. Mr. Davis: It is really very short, Mr. Chairman, when you realize that by the time you initiate a programme, plans and construction—we are talking now of less than two years so it is still really a relatively short period of time. I think we have to have an indication from Ottawa fairly soon, in order to do our planning intelligently for 1967 and 1968. You see, we could be caught in the middle of a building situation.

Mr. Nixon: It is almost like what the universities had to put up with here.

Hon. Mr. Davis: No, they had guarantees of minimum.

Mr. B. Newman (Windsor-Walkerville): Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the hon. Minister the status of the new Western Ontario institute of technology in the Windsor area. I would like to know if tenders have been let, when construction can be expected to start and when the completion and the actual use of the school can be expected.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, I cannot answer the last two questions. I can tell the hon. member that the property has been acquired and the architect has been retained and is currently preparing to get the plans. The moment we have these we will be very pleased to communicate the information to the hon. member, but it has proceeded this far and we think we are making very substantial progress.

Mr. Newman: What is the progress that has been made to date? Can we expect the institution to be in full operation by September of 1966?

Hon. Mr. Davis: No, I would think, Mr. Chairman, being very practical about it, that no matter how rapidly the architect and the contractor were to move, we should consider September, 1967, as the date for occupancy. This was our target date for it and whether this can be accomplished, I do not know, but it will not be by September, 1966. This is going to be a fairly large building.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, that is putting it off another year; we understood it would be ready for occupancy by September, 1966. We will probably find next year when we come in this House, it will be put off another year after that.

Hon. Mr. Davis: I do not think so, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Newman: I would like at this time to commend the hon. Minister's department on one thing, and that is programme 5 in my own community. One year ago I asked that courses be set up for sewing because of the new General Motors plant that was coming in. They immediately set up a programme for sewing and it has been extremely successful. The General Motors plan is not yet in operation but they anticipated the need and they have fairly well met the need.

Likewise, there was a great demand for home care, and home care courses have been set up and are in operation and the individuals taking the course will have no difficulty in obtaining employment.

Vote 509 agreed to.

On vote 510:

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Chairman, with reference to the youth branch, I feel that the hon. Minister should give us some fuller explanation of what this branch is doing. It may be that they are waiting for the full report of the youth committee, but specifically I would like him to give his views on the possibility of some sort of employment service that might be set up in this branch that would co-ordinate the efforts of the government of Ontario to provide jobs for our young students and at the same time, give them an opportunity to accept some responsibility for community services.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, I made very careful note of the hon. member's suggestion during The Department of University Affairs debate and I think, quite frankly, that this would be a very difficult problem to solve at the secondary level. We are presently exploring whether we might do something, say, at the university level for this group of students. It is a pretty complex and complicated situation and for secondary students, it may be impossible, but we are giving the matter some study.

I want to make it very clear, Mr. Chairman, that while we are interested—and I think the report of the youth committee will be very helpful to the youth branch, nonetheless, we are proceeding as I outlined in my introductory remarks. Mr. Thomas has now been appointed the director. We are seeking specialists in the fields of sociology, economics and education. Dr. F. A. Nizami has been employed as a research officer in the field of education. We have 15 or so applicants for the other two positions; they have now been screened to five and Mr. Thomas is now interviewing these people. This, as the hon. members know, is primarily a broad general research section for the problems of these young people who left the school system at too early an age. We have had, I think, very excellent results from Dr. Koerber's initial year's work. I think that he has established certain ground rules that will be very helpful to this new branch and I would be in a position, I would hope, next session, to be more explicit as to their accomplishments.

They have instituted a number of studies; there are no results from these yet. The only thing I can observe from my own observation, is that the more you dig into the problem of young people in this area, the more complicated and complex it becomes. I could go on with this subject for some time, because I think it is going to become one of the major concerns. Whether it is the responsibility of The Department of Education, I am not prepared to assess, but I think it is someone's responsibility and this is why we have entered the field.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Chairman, the hon. Minister mentioned in his introductory remarks—which I thought were amazingly brief on this important topic—the fact that the branch has been set up 18 months now and has been in operation about a year. The operation has been somewhat disappointing. It may be that there has been nothing said about it, but here is a branch dealing with youth specifically. I do not know what they are doing except hiring three more research people. Nothing has been said, for example, about the 9,000 young people who drop out of our school system before the legal leaving age, and I think that is quite a significant statistic, that the youth committee brought to our attention, that this many people leave the system before they become 16. I do not know what the youth branch is doing. We are offering them only $75,000—perhaps it should be more—the branch does not seem to warrant its inclusion at this high level, at this time, unless there are some results.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, the branch has been in operation for a year. I have looked at what is happening in most other jurisdictions and this is not being done, as we understand it, by departments of education elsewhere. It is a programme that we are establishing here because we are very concerned that we do not have the answers. Obviously, if we had the answers, we would have the programme.

This is primarily research in an effort to relate the activities of many voluntary agencies that are presently in the field. There are many groups doing quite commendable work at the present time and we are hoping to relate their activities so that there will be no useless duplication. We have had meetings with the social planning council here in Toronto—their committee on unreached youth—and I think that out of this will come, I hope some form of programme of policy, but I do emphasize, Mr. Chairman, that it is a very broad area. It is one that is extremely difficult to come to grips with and there is no point in my minimizing it.

Mr. Nixon: What about the drop-outs under age 16? How do they get out of school in such large numbers?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, some of them leave to go to employment; some of them are in the rural areas and as the hon. member knows, they leave on letters of permission to go to work on the farm and I cannot tell you specifically why they all leave. This is really what we are attempting to find out.

Mr. Nixon: So this is specifically something we should know.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Oh, yes, this is one of the areas that we are attempting to delineate, as every other jurisdiction is attempting to delineate it at the present time. Why do young people leave? Obviously if they are having difficulty academically, this is one reason; but we think that there are social problems involved that go beyond the academic difficulties.

Mr. Nixon: We will look for a full report of the branch next year.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Yes.

Vote 510 agreed to.

On vote 511:

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, this is the vote where the province should be co-operating with the federal authorities in setting up a little more of its fitness programme than they have in the past. In the 1962-63 budget as set out by the federal authorities, Ontario's allocation was $38,898, and in that year Ontario spent only $12,510. In the following year, 1963-64, Ontario's allocation was $233,000, yet Ontario took advantage of only $86,000 of this. I would like to ask the hon. Minister, why has Ontario been so backward in taking advantage of the funds allocated to it by the federal authorities? It certainly should have been able to use them to some advantage, and I will suggest to the hon. Minister several advantages to which they could be put. Just yesterday the original group that composed the Ontario physical fitness study committee met with the select committee on youth and one of the recommendations that they did make to promote closer liaison with the national advisory council on fitness and amateur sport was that Ontario set up a similar advisory body to take full advantage of the federal moneys available. Were this done, I assume that a lot of the organizations that are asking for grants under miscellaneous grants probably could have received these grants by this authority rather than from vote 515.

I would like at the same time to suggest to the hon. Minister that under this fitness programme that he promote a provincial type of Olympic competition, just as we would have national championships. He could promote a sort of provincial Olympic competition, a full-scale one, so that the youngsters in our schools and beyond school age would have the advantage of knowing what big-time competition is like, and likewise, under this, provide funds for provincial coaching clinics.

I know the hon. Minister will say he does have certain types of clinics, but last year I had to press the case most vigorously to convince him that the clinic as conducted in the city of Windsor was one that was worthy of financial assistance. I think one like that should have been able to come under this vote, and the hon. Minister, looking into it, would have had no hesitancy at all in giving these clinics some type of financial aid.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to go into this at great length. Actually, while the federal government may set aside certain funds, they pay 60 per cent of what we spend. In other words, we have to make the expenditure. It is not quite as generous as one might think. It is not a case of the federal government saying, "We have $100,000 for you, you spend it." We have to spend a certain percentage before we are reimbursed, and our approach has been—and I think it is a valid approach, Mr. Chairman—that we want to spend the money in order to develop a situation of participation in a broad way as far as fitness is concerned rather than in specialized athletes. There are some who will argue, and I had difficulty accepting this myself, whether we should be using funds just to develop Olympic athletes. I think we should be using funds to develop a community programme for recreation, and, of course, we are using these funds now to help finance the courses at Guelph for recreation instructors.

This is part of the funds that we are using, and as the hon. member knows, we have been using funds for coaches' clinics that relate to the broad aspect of a sport, rather than for particular individual situations to assist individual athletes. There may be some debate as to this approach but I think if we are interested in the general physical fitness of the population, not in specific individuals who wish to perform, say, in the Olympics or in the Pan-Am games, or what have you, that this is the proper approach. Maybe there should be some provision.

I notice that on occasion the Minister of National Health and Welfare has indicated that maybe we should be taking some interest as a nation in Olympic participation, and I do not think it would be proper for me to comment on whether this is wise or unwise. But I think as a province, where our concern must be for the great bulk of the people, that the approach we are taking is perhaps a sound one. One might argue that we should be doing more of it, Mr. Chairman, there is no question about this, but I do hesitate on a question of providing funds for specific individuals who might become, as I say, Olympic or Pan-Am performers.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to promote any type of individual sport, but I think the higher the pinnacle you have, the greater the base you will have of athletes interested in eventually reaching that pinnacle.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, I have an item that conceivably should have come under another estimate, but it has some association with physical fitness. There is in Ontario an organization called the Ontario arenas association that was founded in 1947. In 1962 it presented a brief to the hon. Minister and since the select committee on municipal affairs was in operation this was used once again by the government as an excuse for not coming to grips with the representations.

In brief, what the association is seeking is an upgrading of the standards and of the skills of its personnel. Indeed, rather briefly, again in 1963 it presented something to this department in which it listed its requests as fourfold: (1) That the training programme carried on for arena personnel in the field at Ontario agricultural college be recognized by The Department of Education; (2) That the existing OAC certificate be approved by the department; (3) That the present programme be carried on for a time to be agreed upon, and the training kept up to date until the present personnel had had a proper opportunity to qualify; (4) That a grant system, similar in operation to that used for municipal recreation committees be set up for the community centres, boards, or arena commissions, properly set up by councils or municipalities.

The last time this association was in touch with the hon. Minister was in September, 1964, when once again the hon. Minister said that this was under consideration by the select committee and that he was awaiting its report. He now has its report. Can the hon. Minister give us some idea of when the department might be able to come to grips with these proposals, because they seem to me to be worthy ones?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, I want to assure the hon. member that while the last official representation was made in September, the president of this association happens to be a constituent of mine so that I have it brought to my attention rather regularly. We hope to have some resolution through this that will be, we think, satisfactory or close to it, some time during the summer or the early fall.

Vote 511 agreed to.

Vote 512 agreed to.

On vote 513:

Mr. E. W. Sopha (Sudbury): Mr. Chairman, I should like to make a comment about scholarship and scholarships and what I have to say does not even call for an answer from the hon. Minister. I am not going to ask him any questions, I am going to express my own opinions on the state of scholarship and scholarships in this country.

I might say en passant that it is pleasurable to watch these estimates and see some of the significant differences in the presentation of these estimates from others. One marks especially the total absence of the device, the well-known and well-used device, that when the Minister of a department gets into trouble all he has to do is say, "We are acting for all of the people of Ontario," and everybody bangs their desks and that bails him out. One notes an absence of this in the presentation of these estimates.

What I have to say, as I said, will not call for an answer from the hon. Minister, but I have the comfort of knowing that he will be one of the very few people on the Treasury benches who will appreciate the significance of what I have to say in this regard.

My point of departure is the announcement by the hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Robarts) of the appointment of the members of the Ontario advisory council.

I think, sir, there were some ten or a dozen people appointed to that very august body and in respect of two of them he informed the House that they were Rhodes scholars. Of course, one notes that that announcement was intended to impress; we were supposed to be impressed by the standard of achievement of Rhodes scholarship of two of these people and the prestige that surrounded that attainment. I was one of the few people who were not impressed by that. I would have been equally impressed had the hon. Prime Minister said that each of the two individuals was president of the local numismatic society or that they were chairmen of the United Appeal fund. I object to the prestige given to Rhodes scholarships and the absence of a similar prestige for purely Canadian scholarship on two grounds.

One, and perhaps the more important, is that a Rhodes scholarship in my view is not to be any longer surrounded by prestige, because of the fact that it is not Canadian. It is foreign. I would much prefer to see some evidence in this department that the administrators of The Department of Education were willing to proclaim to all Canadians and indeed to all the world that we have established through blood, sweat and tears, the high standard of scholarship within our own country, and indeed within our own province.

The second ground, and I am going to develop that a little later—each of them—the second ground on which I object to the giving of high prestige, and really it is the highest prestige given to any type of scholar, is that the Rhodes scholarship is associated with an age that has passed. It is true of every age in the history of mankind that it leaves legacies that other ages strive, during the lifetimes of the individuals that live in any particular interstice between the two eternities, to erase.

That is true of the age of Cecil Rhodes. Cecil Rhodes was an empire builder, and as such, in the days when empires are either passed or are passing, Cecil Rhodes and his legacy is no longer identified with the current thoughts of mankind. Indeed, Cecil Rhodes as an empire builder in Africa left a trail of misery; the establishment of an empire in Africa left a trail of misery that those at present living are striving very likely to erase and to correct.

I would rather that, in accordance with the current opinions of mankind, we associated scholastic achievement and intellectual intelligence with those people that the hon. Minister of Education himself calls the agents of progress. That is his phrase: the agents of progress. And in our own history one seldom hears much about the great men in many fields who very aptly and very roundly suit that phrase—the agents of progress.

For example, one does not hear of scholarships in Canada that are associated with Sir William Osler. There may be scholarships associated with his name but if a man were to win a scholarship named after Sir William Osler, and commemorative of the great legacy that he left to mankind, it would not receive the prestige that was inherent in the Prime Minister's words when he announced that two of his advisory council were Rhodes scholars.

One does not hear in the field of medicine of any scholarships associated with the famous Sir Alexander Fleming. There may be scholarships associated with Sir Frederick Banting, and with Best. Certainly we commemorate them, but we Canadians are always inclined to denigrate and to play down the achievements that we have reached in this country.

I know that our standards of education are very high—how do I know it? All I have to do is to look south of the border in order to see the willingness with which our American friends, many of whom are from Missouri, accept the graduates of our institutions; they take them with open arms. So our standards of education in this country must be very high if the Americans do not require a special passport to admit people of intellectual achievement and who have accumulated a great store of knowledge.

One has only to think of some of the names of people who have found their mark in American life, the long-time president of Stamford University was a Canadian. The long-time dean of Yale theological seminary was a Canadian. In more contemporary terms, when several hundred engineers were laid off at the Avro plant in the Minister of Education's own riding, they got ready acceptance in the state of California. They did not have to pass any special examination in order to be welcomed into plants in California.

In that way we Canadians, of course, have been subsidizing American education for maybe a decade. Our taxes go to pay for the education of people in the arts, the crafts, the sciences, in the realm of technology, in order to be swept into the giant American economy.

In the same sense the most important product or citizen of London in the bush is not John Parmenter Roberts. He has not yet, attained, though he may some day attain, the achievement of contribution to society that the other citizen Charles Edward Saunders has achieved.

Now there may be some—the odd one or two—that would ask who is Charles Edward Saunders? Well, Charles Edward Saunders grew up in London in the bush and went on to become a very excellent agronomist and the hon. Minister of Education knows he was the inventor, the creator or the developer of the Marquis wheat which—in its rust-free characteristic—enabled our prairie to become one of the greatest bread baskets of the world.

So my complaint is that we have a government here that never seems to have any tendency to stimulate our people along the way of putting aside some of their inferiority complex, so that we Canadians may become a little more extrovert; so that we are willing to stand up on occasion and exclaim about our achievements and we do not have to fortify ourselves with C₂H₅OH before standing up and bragging a bit about some of the things that we have created in this country.

Having set up that, hastily I go on to say that I am not postulating a straw man because I have the contrast of the activity of the government in establishing a trust to preserve the grave of Sir John Graves Simcoe. I looked at that statute, maybe it is a worthy project, but it made me laugh for two reasons. The people who are the initiators of that, and it has educational features, it seems to me are directed toward the preservation of old bones and dry guts, rather than a healthy and salutary development that more nearly reflects the current opinion of our people and particularly our young people.

Again I say in passing, with respect to Sir John Graves Simcoe, I wonder how many will vote for the bill if they happen to own William Renwick Riddell's "Life of Sir John Graves Simcoe" and not owning it, how many have read it? There may be some that would not even know what century he lived in.

But that is my complaint and in saying those things in respect of our educational achievements there is an opportunity for me to express opinions on the floor of this Legislature that are in accordance with the trend of popular thought. It just does not get expressed, or does not get expressed enough.

I would like to see the creation of the very epitome of intellectual effort in the form of a Canada scholar. That is a good term: a Canada scholar, whereby we would offer to people from other provinces the opportunity to study in some of the fields of human thought and research in which we in Ontario are the leaders.

What are some of the things in which we are the leaders? Well, I was surveying the resources from my own memory in respect to that, but I am told that we are the leaders in the development of the electron microscope. Indeed the developer of that aid to scientific research, is from the home town of my hon. friend from Brantford (Mr. Gordon).

We have here, not too far away, down the street, what I am told is one of the leading hospitals in the world for pediatrics. I am told that people come from all over the world to the Toronto hospital for sick children, to study the methods that we have developed in the treatment of diseases of children.

I would like to see some scholarships established for people from other provinces, and for some of our own people in Ontario; indeed scholarships for people from other lands, to come and make use of some of the benefits of our own creation. That again is in the sense of declaiming those things which are Canadian.

I am told that at the University of Toronto, next door to us, that we are among the leaders of research among the nations of the world in the field of sub-zero physics. Certainly in the field of cardiovascular surgery, one hears that the techniques that have been developed in this very city are among the most progressive yet achieved by the medical profession. Dr. Selye down in Montreal, has done original work on the effects of stress and strain on the cardiovascular system.

Not only in the field of medicine, but in other fields we find achievements of things Canadian. Recently we have seen emerge a very fine coterie of scholarly historians. Until the last 10 or 15 years we did not have a historian in this country really worthy of note. We had historians who were writing textbooks suitable for the elementary schools and perhaps the secondary schools, but in the last 10 or 15 years a band of historians have emerged who are unparalleled in their excellence, writing about things Canadian, about Canadian history.

An hon. member: What are their names?

Mr. Sopha: Careless and Creighton, of the University of Toronto, Morton of the University of Manitoba, Thompson of the University of British Columbia. And yet, in spite of all those achievements, and the availability of men of learning to teach our young people, we have the hon. Prime Minister of the province get up and as one of the visas to win the acceptance of people on the Ontario advisory council, he still goes to a foreign land. He says "These people are Rhodes scholars." I am not impressed any longer. That might have been suitable for the last years of the 19th century—

Interjection by an hon. member.

Mr. Sopha: I contend that this is completely in accordance with vote 513 and I do not particularly enjoy the Chairman looking at me as if I am out of order.

Mr. Chairman: Wait a minute now, I want to say a word. We have allowed a great deal of latitude this morning and I think the member is going far afield as far as this particular vote is concerned.

Mr. Sopha: It just seems to me that lately I am accused of going far afield. This vote is concerned with scholarships and bursaries and we are voting $2,300,000 for scholarships. My point is that it is high time in this country that we gave some scholarships to our own people for study in this country, in order to proclaim the achievements that we have made in the field of human knowledge.

I have lost my train of thought but I had a book that I wanted to refer to, Mr. Chairman, in respect of the—and I will leave this point of the Rhodes scholarship, the prestige of which I object to. I hope that it will soon disappear just as the memory of Rhodes himself has receded into antiquity. It is interesting to note that one of the last great trouble spots of Africa, Southern Rhodesia, is the state established by Cecil Rhodes. He left there a legacy which the British government, indeed all mankind, is very anxiously trying to correct.

But let me put in the record in respect of the colonials—you see how much that is out of date, when the hon. Prime Minister says "So-and-so is a Rhodes scholar"—in respect of the colonials, here were the stipulations of Cecil Rhodes:

I consider that the education of young colonists—

I suppose that is us:

—at one of the universities in the United Kingdom—

Mr. MacDonald: Do not be so self-conscious.

Mr. Sopha: Yes. Let me start it again:

I consider that the education of young colonists at one of the universities in the United Kingdom is of great advantage to them for giving breadth to their views, for their instruction in life and manners and for instilling into their minds the advantage to the colonies as well as to the United Kingdom of the retention of the unity of the Empire.

Now, could anything be more out of joint in 1965 than that concept, when indeed, the Empire itself has disappeared and has been replaced by an association of equal nations which joined together on principles of dignity and honour?

In my view and in accordance with my plea for the establishment of scholarship and intellectual achievement in connection with things we have established and created here in Canada, those things purely Canadian in the field of intellectual endeavour, I say that the only legitimate aristocracy, the only really legitimate aristocracy is the aristocracy of intellect. I am sure the hon. Minister of Education would agree with that, it is the only worthy one, based purely upon ability and intellectual achievement. The Rhodes scholarship, I show, by way of contrast, provides an aristocracy in virtue of the fact of having won it.

When a person has won a Rhodes scholarship, as long as the hon. Prime Minister comes in here and blandly announces it in the way he did, it provides a false aristocracy that is something far short of proof of achievement in the field of intellect.

So this Friday morning, Mr. Chairman, I will not be too prolix in my remarks, I would like to see The Department of Education in this—

Mr. E. A. Dunlop (Forest Hills): I said it is a frosty Friday.

Mr. Sopha: Oh. Well, I always enjoy the interpolations of the hon. member for Forest Hill, they are usually intelligent and he is a man worth listening to, if his comments are helpful.

My plea in short to the hon. Minister of Education—and I say again he does not even have to reply—is that I would like to see some development in this department for the granting of marks of achievement to Canadians in respect of things Canadian, where we in some respects are ahead of the rest of mankind. In doing that we do a great deal toward the development of a national consciousness, which is particularly important as we approach this our centennial year.

Let me say in closing, that one of the most significant things about our Centennial year will be in this realm—I hope in that year of national orgy of celebration, 1967, I hope that it is not just a case of a landscape being filled with politicians, who will be proclaiming the glories of the past and the expectation of future greatness of this country, but that we Canadians during that year, whether through our exposition or otherwise, will be demonstrating to the world those things in which we are different. I do not think that can be emphasized too much. It ought to be a year when we put aside some of this national inferiority complex and stand up and dig our heels into the rug and look the rest of mankind, and particularly our friends in the United States, in the eye, and we say to them, "In the 100 years of our nationhood these are some of the things that we have done in the northern half of this continent. Here are some of the things that we have achieved. Here are some of the reasons that we ought to be allowed to join the great company of mankind that may properly, in the words of the Minister of Education, be described as being agents of progress."

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, I am constantly fascinated with the capacity of some Liberal spokesmen to fight the battles that have been won and to miss the battles that need to be fought. I am not impressed with the fact that the hon. member for Sudbury is not impressed with the Rhodes scholarship.

Mr. Sopha: Well, who cares?

Mr. MacDonald: I agree, I agree.

Mr. Sopha: Am I supposed to hide in a corner because the hon. member is not impressed?

Mr. MacDonald: I invite the hon. member to engage in a crusade to free this nation of all Guggenheim fellowships, all contributions from the Rockefeller fund, all contributions from the Carnegie fund, because undoubtedly they are symbols attached to the bygone age.

However, let us get down to the graduate scholarships of today.

I have a question I would like to put to the hon. Minister. This is a new and a very commendable move that the government made and it was designed primarily to cope with the desperate need for teachers at the university level. It has been represented to me by people who are involved in this post-graduate work that the limits that have been fixed are going to work crippling effects on those who are seeking to complete their work in the short time that the hon. Minister had in mind, so that we may find the proper university teachers required in our current expansion programme.

For example, the limits are $1,500 during the year and $500 for the summer period; a maximum of $4,500 during the three-year period. Now if you expect the person to spend all his time in this post-graduate work—which is really what happens, because in the summertime they have to pursue courses and theses and sometimes field work and in the winter time their teaching load is restricted to three hours a week because this has been laid down by the school of graduate studies in order that they must focus their attention almost completely on their studies—there is very little opportunity to earn any other money. So in effect, the hon. Minister is demanding that they have resources beyond this amount. It results in heavy borrowing, and things of that nature.

I wonder if the hon. Minister might comment on whether or not, in the operation of the scholarships, insofar as he has been able to assess it at this point, this ceiling is working the kind of difficulty that has been at least put to me.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, this was discussed very briefly; it comes under The Department of University Affairs. This does not include the graduate fellowships that comes under university; but I would reply in any event, because it is an area in which we are interested.

I think it is too early to tell. There is some concern that it may work some hardship. At the same time, Mr. Chairman, we are concerned about getting students with their MA so that they can move into the university teaching community as rapidly as possible. We have had some discussions with the dean of the graduate school at the University of Toronto some three or four months ago to arrange an evaluation to see just whether this will impose any real hardship. It may be, particularly in the area of the PhD work, that we may have some difficulty; we are going to be having further discussions with the universities on this subject over the summer.

We think the programme has been very effective from a number of standpoints to date, but as I explained during The Department of University Affairs estimates, we cannot tell yet what percentage of the students will remain at the universities. That is, of course, the prime purpose of the exercise and we do not know at this point whether we will accomplish this or not, but we are keeping an eye on this problem, Mr. Chairman.

As I say, it really relates to The Department of University Affairs, but I thought the hon. member would be interested in this information.

Mr. Sopha: Mr. Chairman, if one recovers from the curmudgeonly attitude of the hon. member for York South, based upon the articulated major premise that only what he says is important, may I ask the hon. Minister—

Mr. Bryden: You are working hard to prove that premise right now.

Mr. Sopha: No; having brawled with your hon. leader, I do not want to get into an argument with the juniors.

May I ask the hon. Minister, in respect of the letter I wrote him a year or so ago about the boy, the young man, who had achieved a remarkable standing, especially in the sciences, and had been granted an Ontario scholarship. The department deducted from the bursaries he got from the universities, the amount over $1,000? Is the hon. Minister—

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, this is the policy. It is one that is of course under review at all times, but I have to be very frank that we think there should be a limitation on the amount of money that one student receives from the provincial or the federal-provincial bursaries and scholarships. This limitation has been a policy. It does not take away from his academic achievements, it just means that the funds are spread, we hope, over perhaps a broader base.

Mr. Sopha: If the hon. Minister will permit me as I delineate a little more clearly, the boy was—

Hon. Mr. Davis: I would say this, Mr. Chairman, I would want to add this: I believe we raised the limit, I am not sure if it is $100 or $200, so that they can go up to, I believe it is, $1,200 now instead of $1,000. I am not sure of this figure, but it has been raised.

Mr. Sopha: Well, this boy, I am happy to say a resident of my own community, had achieved amazingly high standards, particularly in the sciences in his grade 13 examinations. If my memory serves me correctly, I think he had got an average of 87 per cent in nine papers, and accordingly he was automatically an Ontario scholar.

He came from a very poor family, in fact his mother was a charwoman. She worked very hard to provide the necessities for the family and keep this boy in school. He received offers from three or four universities to come and study with them, three or four universities in Ontario. I did not know this before but apparently universities, and I do not see why they should not, want to attract people of exceptional abilities so that at some later time they will be able to say that so-and-so graduated from our university.

I think the rule was at that time, and I thought it was very oppressive, that any grants over $1,000 that he got from the university which he selected, which was eventually Queen's, would be deducted. Any amount in excess of $1,000 would be deducted from the $500 that he was to get.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Yes.

Mr. Sopha: Now the hon. Minister tells me it has been raised to $700 or $800?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Yes. I cannot tell the hon. member whether it was $700, but it has been raised.

Mr. Sopha: I am happy to hear that but I think—

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the hon. Minister a question concerning the control that the province has over the availability of federal backing for student loans.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, just very briefly, we are the agents for the federal government with respect to the Canada student loans.

Mr. Nixon: Would the hon. Minister like me to ask the question first?

Hon. Mr. Davis: I am sorry; yes.

Mr. Nixon: Specifically, are these available only when the student is attending university or government-sponsored trade schools, or would they perhaps be available to a student who wanted to go to a privately owned institution that had a full year course? Specifically, some of the business schools, privately owned business schools, have brought this to the hon. Minister's attention and to our attention. I was wondering if it would be possible to have a programme that would permit these people to borrow or to get a loan backed by the government for this purpose.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, I think this matter has been resolved and I think the private schools can anticipate the loans will be extended. It causes us problems, quite frankly, in that we do not really inspect or supervise these private trade schools to any substantial degree. But the Canada student loans—and I expect we will be announcing this fairly shortly, it is just in the final stages of negotiation—will probably be extended to the private trade schools.

Mr. Nixon: It is interesting that the hon. Minister mentioned that the province does not inspect these schools. I understand that when one of the trade schools under the direction of the hon. Minister wanted a secretary for their office they phoned up the Shaw school and asked them if they had anybody available.

Hon. Mr. Davis: They operate a very good school.

Vote 513 agreed to.

On vote 514:

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, I do not know that it is necessary to agree to this one immediately since it involves about $350 million.

I am not going to talk at any great length about it. I will say that I have for some substantial time been puzzling over the foundation tax plan. I think I even understand it, and if that is true I think I probably qualify now to take a crack at Einstein's theory. It also appears to me to be a good plan. There obviously has been an extremely good effort to apply principles of equity to an extremely complex situation.

There is, however, one phase on which I would like to seek a little further information and that relates to the corporation tax adjustment grant. Now essentially, as I understand it, that is a piece of symbolism. It does not, for most school boards, make any significant difference in the amount of money they get, because if there were not the corporation tax adjustment grant they would get the money through the foundation plan anyway.

I think that is essentially true, but as far as I can see it is not entirely true. It is not true if the corporation tax adjustment grant is larger than what a board would, in any case, have got under the equalization grant in the absence of the corporation tax adjustment grant. If that is so, it seems to me that this creates an element of—I was going to say discrimination, but I will put it this way: It favours the wealthier boards and I am wondering what analysis shows on this.

For example, the Metropolitan Toronto separate school board: How does it come off under the total programme as compared to some of the other school boards? I have heard it said that although it did not used to be considered to be in a preferred position, it is getting to be, relatively speaking, one of the wealthy school boards, especially as compared with other separate school boards in the province. Now, I am not suggesting that any school board grant should be reduced. I think that all boards can all make good use of any money they get, but on the other hand, I think it would be unfortunate if, through a piece of symbolism, the government, in fact, was giving a larger benefit to those who needed it least. It is my impression that that may be an effect of this corporation tax adjustment grant. I do not know if the hon. Minister has any comments to make on that.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, I can assure the hon. member that there is no intent, of course, to do this, and we doubt that this is, in fact, happening. There may be some areas where there is a high percentage of corporation tax, where they are benefiting from this facet of the grant plan and in the lower assessed areas they get these grants under the regular foundation scheme. I think one could say, generally, that the urban separate school boards have received a higher percentage increase in grants than the rural separate school boards, but, as the hon. member I am sure realizes, the rural separate school boards were not having the same difficulty under the prior grant situation as the urban boards were experiencing.

Now we cannot give you specific evaluations yet. We may be able to in the next three or four months, but we think, generally speaking, it has been an equitable way of distributing the money to both the public and separate school systems. I do not think that symbolism—as the hon. member calls it—really is giving more than it should to the urban boards and we do not think that these rural separate school boards, which really were not in bad shape prior to the plan, have been adversely affected in any way. This is the reaction we have had to date. We were concerned about this aspect and I would be very pleased to have the hon. member discuss this as length with Mr. Rideout or Dr. Jackson who were very helpful in the development of this plan, but I think the figures will show this to be the case.

Mr. Bryden: There is one thing I want to make clear, Mr. Chairman. I certainly am not implying that any board is getting more than it should. But I am concerned that some boards may not be getting as much as they should.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Chairman, does the hon. Minister expect to take any action on the recommendations in the auditor's report this year, on page 19, calling for a special study of simplification of the grant system?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, with great respect to the auditor, we would like to simplify—and I think he was referring, perhaps, to internal procedures which we are always anxious to simplify. After discussions with Dr. Jackson and his officials, we questioned just how we can accommodate the auditor. It is not easy to simplify the grant situation.

Mr. MacDonald: Why does he not challenge him to it?

Hon. Mr. Davis: I was going to suggest this, but I do not think he will.

Mr. Nixon: I do not know whether it is just the internal business of the department or not, but is the object of such a study to determine, if possible, a more simplified grant system so as to permit a ready comprehension by school boards and other interested persons like the provincial auditor of the procedures and calculations involved?

Hon. Mr. Davis: It would be highly desirable, but very hard to achieve.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, I have a couple of items related to boards that I assume might be dealt with through grants and, indeed, I do not know how one is going to cope with this situation if the government does not use its control of grants to correct the situation in the municipalities.

The first one is with respect to a situation that I have raised with the hon. Minister privately. I received a memo from his office today. This concerns the local difficulties with regard to the proposed new senior public school in Kenora. I am not going into the details; what I would like to ask the hon. Minister is this: Is the department absolutely helpless in influencing a local board when there appears to be conclusive evidence of widespread local opposition to what they are going to do? In this instance, I continue to get letters from different people—it may be an organized campaign, I do not know; but they are not objecting to senior public schools—

Hon. Mr. Davis: They are objecting to locations.

Mr. MacDonald: They are objecting to the location—a school that is being put on the outskirts of the city. They make a case, that I find it difficult to assess, emphasizing added transportation costs; they raise the question that if you are going to build a new school, why do you not tear down the 1897 central school in the centre of the city and build one that would be big enough to meet both of these purposes and would be most centrally located, and all of this seems to me to have validity, and my question is this: Even though it is true—as the note I have from the hon. Minister's department is that the decision regarding school boundaries and school construction are matters to be determined by the local school board. Presumably you are taking refuge here in the old local autonomy argument. Is your control over grants not sufficient, and is it not a legitimate exercise of that control over grants, to come to some conclusion as to what are the merits of the two sides of the case? I have had it argued in one letter that a significant number of people on the board are not planning to run again, and they are really "lame duck" members of the board of education. If they do run again they are all going to be beaten. Now this may be wrong, but they have had petitions with 971 names signed to them in a town the size of Kenora—which looks like pretty widespread opposition. Can the government not do something? Have you assessed the merits of the case?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, just speaking generally—without getting into too much detail as far as Kenora itself is concerned—legally the boards have the right to go ahead and build a school. We have never withheld grants and it is doubtful whether we could withhold grants. We have never done so; it is not in our policy, because we feel that the assessment of the actual physical location of the school plant within a community is one of the prime functions and responsibilities of the local board. I could say that there may be two sides to the Kenora story, but not dealing with that specifically, I would say that, generally, I think it is a principle that we should be very careful not to abandon; and that is, having the local school boards with the responsibility to accept where these buildings should be. I think this is really the debate in Kenora. They are not debating—as I understand their correspondence—the principle of the senior public school. They feel it should be in x location and the board feels it should be in y .

As far as the department is concerned, we support the idea of the senior public school. We feel that the board has been elected in a democratic way to handle the decision as to where the school should be located and our inspectors—I have to say this—have approved the site that has been recommended by the board.

Mr. MacDonald: Well, do I unfairly conclude that when the hon. Minister says there may be two sides to the issue in Kenora, he is not certain his inspectors are right?

Hon. Mr. Davis: No, no, I am just saying that it is the people who are upset—perhaps the board's position should be assessed as well.

Mr. MacDonald: Well, I will leave it. I hope some time soon to be in Kenora and I will have a first-hand view of it. In the same category, again without getting into details, Mr. Chairman, last January a parent and ratepayer in Beckwith township, RR2 Carleton Place, Mrs. N. Manzon, wrote a letter to the Carleton Place Canadian with regard to conditions in Tennyson School S.S. No. 5. From the letter that I received recently, apparently representations have been made to all and sundry, including local members in that area, and the department, with regard to conditions in this school.

Now, what puzzles me is that it is alleged in this letter—and I would judge without going into all the detail of it that it is really a very old-fashioned little red school house with temperatures last winter in December 4 to 16, inclusive, in the school days there, ranging 54, 50, 70, 60, 50, 57, 52, 56 and 48 degrees in the school for the morning. Then by afternoon it got so hot—this reminds me of the little red school house in my first year of teaching.

Hon. A. Grossman (Minister of Reform Institutions): Like my office.

Mr. MacDonald: Like your office, is it? Then the physical conditions, the toilet facilities and things of that nature, are out of date. Now it is alleged that over the past year medical office inspectors have requested certain improvements but to date nothing has been done. My question to the hon. Minister is, either through grants or through other directives, surely the department has the power—if medical officers and inspectors request improvements in a school that is obviously out of date, and with conditions as indefensible as are spelled out in that letter, and I assume they are correct—to do something to make certain that the recommendations are followed through?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, this situation in Beckwith received some publicity a month or so ago. It is related to a desire, I think, on the part of this person and several others in the township to establish a central school because of the provision now for one board in the township. As far as the department is concerned we support the idea of establishing a central school. I think we have to look in these instances to the local MOH if they do not conform to health regulations. Of course, the MOH, as I understand the law, is in a position to do something of a concrete nature.

Our problem is, do we withhold grants and in this way perhaps prejudice the education of the children because of the physical nature of the building, or do you hope that reason is going to prevail and they will move either to rectify the situation or perhaps to move into a central situation?

This has come about, I think, primarily because of the change in legislation and it is a problem we hope will see itself resolved over the next few months. But we are faced with this view to withhold grants and perhaps put the board in the position where it says, "We will no longer maintain the school situation." We have not done this. We have on occasion held up grants until certain improvements were made. As far as this situation is concerned we are going to look at it in the fall and see whether they are moving into a central situation, or if they are not, what improvements have to be made if they are going to continue.

Mr. MacDonald: Just let us pursue this briefly, Mr. Chairman. As far as the local MOH is concerned, if there is action under the law that they may take, the hon. Minister, I think, may be on sound ground in saying, "Let him take the action," or "Let the local authorities insist that he should take the action." But I understand that recommendations have come from your inspectors. Presumably you have some sort of power, in withholding grants. Is there any other legal power beyond the withholding of grants or the delaying of grants, in order to make certain that recommendations are lived up to?

Hon. Mr. Davis: No, this would be our only power. It is a subtle sort of power, to withhold grants until the changes were made.

Mr. MacDonald: And you might be considering that this fall if things do not—

Hon. Mr. Davis: If things do not improve.

Mr. MacDonald: If things do not improve. After four months of struggle and no action, that might be a ray of hope to those who are carrying on the battle.

Mr. Chairman, I wonder if I could just briefly speak on a point that may not be raised again in this estimate with the hon. Minister. Father Francis-Xavier Johnson, of the Jesuit Order, from Regis college, Willowdale, had a letter in the paper recently with regard to a new physics school text. This is a text which has been worked out by a group of university and secondary school teachers. He is not objecting to the fact that this was obviously originally an American text, which clearly it was, but since it was printed in Canada, he raises the question, which strikes me as being very valid, as to why you could not, particularly in a physics text, at least remove those symbolismisms which are clearly American.

For example, in his letter to the Globe and Mail of March 24, he draws attention to page 23 to, "The founding fathers of our own American republic very much steeped in the climate of opinion," etc. On page 248, for instance, we notice an American flag as it ripples in the breeze from the top of a flagpole. On page 376 is, "Think of the 4th of July rocket which explodes while moving along through the air." In other words, if you are adopting an American text, which in physics would seem to me to be a defensible proposition when it has been examined as being the best by an Ontario committee, is it not possible at least to have the Canadian flag rippling in the breeze and to have Canada Day rather than the 4th of July rockets?

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. MacDonald: I think I have made my point.

Hon. Mr. Davis: I have no lengthy comment, Mr. Chairman. I am not familiar with the text. I think I know what happened. We are moving into the new physics course this September and I assume it is for the grade 13 programme. The text is obviously of American origin because they have had this programme in their schools for the last two years. I gather that there may be a copyright situation involved here. I will look into it, but I would think this is probably the problem that exists.

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): No, Mr. Chairman, I do not think we could let this vote go by without my addressing a few remarks to the hon. Minister in connection with libraries. We did have a fair discussion about libraries at the time of the estimates of The Department of University Affairs.

Hon. Mr. Davis: We had a very fair discussion last night after the hon. member left.

Mr. Singer: I understand that and I was advised that the hon. Minister told the hon. member for Yorkview (Mr. Young) that he did not really understand what was going on.

Hon. Mr. Davis: No, I did not tell the hon. member for Yorkview any such thing. Mr. Chairman, I endeavoured to bring the hon. member for Yorkview up to date on what had happened. I think that is the sum and substance of my remarks.

Mr. Singer: I think I indicated to the hon. Minister at the time that he brought in his estimates under The Department of University Affairs that I was not as enthused as he was with his proposed plans for improving the library system.

Hon. Mr. Davis: The supply of librarians was discussed; it had nothing to do with the system. The system is what we discussed last night, the supply of librarians is what we discussed under University Affairs.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, I repeat again the same criticism that I have addressed over several years. I do not think that we have a proper appreciation or understanding of a library system in this province, and as the hon. Minister has moved ahead in many fields I should think that he would have paid much more attention to improving our system of libraries and in addition the training of librarians.

It seems to me that the complaints that are made annually by the association of librarians insofar as their pay is concerned still apply and there is no adequate answer. It seems to me again that the system of grants insofar as libraries are concerned is still inadequate. I note that the vote in these estimates is some $400,000 over what it was last year, but you are still nibbling away. I do not know whether you still do this formula business, where you give a percentage of what you set out in your programme, and each year determine differently what percentage of 100 per cent of the amount accepted for grants is going to be given. This is a system that I could never understand at all, but it has been carried on almost since we first started to pay grants. I cannot see why grants for libraries should not be on the same sort of basis that grants are made for schools.

I think another thing that the hon. Minister should pay some very substantial attention to, which has perhaps not been discussed at any great length, is an effort of co-ordinating school libraries and public libraries. I know that boards of education are going to rise in great anger and concern about this sort of suggestion, but it seems to me that as we build each one of our new schools we set aside an awful lot of valuable space for a school library. These schools, after all, are public buildings and it would seem to me that there could and should be a fairly simple method of making libraries available in the schools and outside the schools—making school libraries available to the public and public libraries available to greater extent to the schools. There is naturally a very substantial overlapping, Mr. Chairman.

It seems to me that no one dares step over somebody else's authoritative boundary. But I would think the library system needs the same sort of care and attention that the hon. Minister tells us he is bringing to various other phases of our education system. My remarks are going to be no more involved than this, Mr. Chairman. I went through the hon. Minister's speech carefully and I have not heard any really ambitious programme for the improvement of our library system and I am very disappointed.

Hon. Mr. Davis: I obviously do not want to take too much time on this myself. I would point out to the hon. member I do not often refer to my riding, but I participated at an opening some three weeks ago of a new library facility that was built jointly by the Toronto township board of education and the Toronto township library board, where they have just the type of facility that has been mentioned by the hon. member. This is, I think, a situation that will increase across the province.

I traced one point with the hon. member for Yorkview last night. As I say, I hope it was informative; it was intended to be. This comes from the library association itself. We had a meeting in my office, the members brought in their initial recommendation, they asked for this further study; Mr. St. John, who is from the Brooklyn library system in New York, I believe, is presently engaged in a very thorough evaluation and is to make a report to the association and then to me. He is here in Toronto at the present time. We hope to have the report in July. There are many problems; we want to see them solved as much, I am sure, as the hon. member for Downsview.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, I just cannot let this opportunity go by. We get so many studies, so many new investigations going on—I think the government reached a new height yesterday when one of the deputy Ministers said he was studying plans to commence a study. I think that the government should get around now to doing something instead of studying plans to commence studies or starting studies that are eventually going to result in reports. Let us have a little action for a change.

Hon. Mr. Davis: This is at the suggestion of the association.

Vote 514 agreed to.

On vote 515:

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, may I ask the hon. Minister just one question on this?

Mr. A. B. R. Lawrence (Russell): Mr. Chairman, I will certainly be very brief this morning. I am referring to item 515. It seems to me that this item in the estimates, with the inclusion of the Ontario council for the arts, and including a large item called "miscellaneous," might be a place for a particular grant for which I would like to propose to find a home.

What I propose, Mr. Chairman, is that a research grant be provided by the province of Ontario to support the preparation and publication of a history of the province of Ontario covering the years since 1867. I suggest that specifically a sum in the neighbourhood of $15,000 a year be provided in each of the next two and a half years to such person or persons as may be selected by an appropriate committee on the basis of competitive proposals for the execution of this undertaking.

Mr. Chairman, I further suggest that the primary object of the undertaking would be the early publication of a political history of Ontario, of that readable, colourful and entertaining style, as has already been mentioned this morning, that we have been able to develop in Canada amongst a number of our historians. A secondary object of the undertaking could well, sir, be the gathering of material for a full and complete general history of Ontario of a much wider scope, a history in depth, to be published over a longer period of time and more academic in nature than the political history that I speak of.

The task I believe, sir, could in fact be completed within the two and a half years remaining before the end of our Confederation centennial year without requiring undue haste or in any way jeopardizing the quality of the project. A special concentration on politics would be most appropriate because although the whole of Canada and Ontario have accomplished great things since 1867, Confederation itself was a political event—a great political achievement by partisan party politicians of this and the other three provinces who joined.

Briefly, my reasons are these, Mr. Chairman, for putting forward this proposal: First, sir, in the same way in which the practice of politics tends to increase one's interest in the other people, so I have found, and I am sure most hon. members of this House have found, that the practice of Ontario politics and membership in this Legislature tremendously increase a person's interest in what I have proposed, the field of the history of politics itself. And I believe that not only is the interest here but as more and more over the years our activities both in government, and in this House, impinge upon the people, the citizens of our province themselves will find a deeper interest in provincial politics resulting.

The second reason for this proposal is that the project would fill what appears to me to be an absolute void, an almost complete vacuum which presently exists. Where can anyone with any degree of ease find out today which leaders of which parties stood for which policies or effected which particular achievements when? On which issues have what elections been fought and who won and why? What were the truly important and exciting debates? What were the great scandals? What part did the press play?

By way of example, a few days ago, I heard the hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Thompson) sternly caution the hon. Minister of Highways (Mr. MacNaughton) against building too many roads, when, as he suggested, the future may well lie in attention being paid to other forms of transportation. Dimly at that time I recalled that some time in the 20s the Conservatives, while in Opposition, had furiously attacked the Drury government for its good roads policy. The Conservatives were then dedicated to electric trains, and I believe streetcars running to Barrie and all over the province.

Mr. Nixon: Radial.

Mr. A. B. R. Lawrence: Radial electrical transportation, I believe is what the Conservatives were pressing for, and attacking the Drury government for not introducing. But where could anyone—and certainly where could I—check the accuracy of that rather foggy memory? And again, how was it that the Tory Party were the first to nationalize an industry when we nationalized, in a provincial sense, Hydro, in 1906? And where can one quickly find out why Ontario has achieved and held world leadership in the field of workmen's compensation?

Finally, sir, my third reason for raising this proposal for this grant is that in this very House it is my feeling that the stuff of history can be found among many of the hon. members themselves and among those who serve in this building indeed, as well: the hon. member for Grey South (Mr. Oliver), the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Downer), Mr. Malcolm McIntyre, Mr. Rodger Lewis, Mr. L. R. MacTavish, and also material to be obtained from handed-down memories of others in this Legislature and from ex-Premiers and ex-members, still very much alive, such as E. C. Drury, Mr. George Drew, Mr. Leslie Frost, the hon. Earl Rowe, Senator Arthur Roebuck, Senator David Croll and Colonel T. Ashmore Kidd.

The last Liberal regime deserves a book of its own and I say this kindly, sir, and I mean it in an academic and non-partisan sense. Who of my generation—and there are many of this generation in the House—can resist the Story of Mitch Hepburn or on the other side, the stories about Mitch Hepburn? And again, taking an earlier time, what kind of a "bird" in fact was Oliver Mowat?

A good political history, sir, I think, will interest itself in our politicians as persons, because, Mr. Chairman, I believe that democratic politics might well be defined as the cult of the personalities. Our democracy in Ontario has been vigorous during the past 100 years and I believe our politicians and personalities have been interesting and colourful. This story should be told and told without delay.

I would ask the hon. Minister to allocate a small portion of the funds being requested in this particular vote, for setting this project under way.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Chairman, just for a moment I would like to go on record as supporting the suggestion that has just been put to the House. I feel it is really a better one than has been put previously, for simply a continuation of official history. The way the hon. member has described it, I would look forward very much to an amendment, perhaps, to these very estimates that would include the $15,000 that he feels would be required.

Vote 515 agreed to.

Vote 516 agreed to.

Vote 517 agreed to.

On vote 518:

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Chairman, in vote 518, there is a considerable departure with which I feel the hon. Minister should deal at some length. I realize that we do not have too much time available, but it appears that the actuarial difficulties of the superannuation fund for teachers is going to be dramatically improved by the voting of practically $15 million to the fund. I would assume that the fund itself would probably take this money and reinvest it in this great province, but nevertheless the fact that the government sees fit to allocate this large sum of money to support the teachers' superannuation fund draws to our attention once again the very serious difficulties that are being experienced by the superannuated women teachers.

It is not necessary to recount the story in full again. It is enough to say that this group of people who have served the community well through two world wars and a depression have been living now for many years on full superannuation of $600 a year, $50 a month. It is their plea to the government that $1 million be found outside the regular fund to give them a pension that would allow them to live out their days in dignity and some comfort. I feel that the arguments in support of this are very strong indeed. There have been resolutions by the education committee put to the government and it has been discussed fully. As all hon. members know, time is taking its toll of those who would be assisted by the money that might be made available, and I would beseech the government and the hon. Minister once again to make some provision for this dwindling group of people in recognition of their need and of their great service to the community.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Brant was trying, I think, to be as brief as possible in view of the time situation in dealing with the item that he raised, but I do not really see any justification for passing over this quickly. He said he was not going to recount the previous history of the matter and I do not think it is necessary to recount the whole of it in great detail, but I think it should be recounted to a certain degree.

As a matter of fact, there are two groups of people whom we might consider here. There is first the group to whom the hon. member for Brant referred, certain elderly women teachers who still find themselves caught in a completely antiquated phase of the superannuation plan with pension of $600 a year. At the time they were paying in that was considered to be quite an adequate pension, but there have been all sorts of adjustments in the plan since then to keep it up to date with modern conditions, adjustments which result in some people getting pensions of $7,000, $8,000, $9,000 a year. I am not objecting to those pensions. I think that if we want people of the type that we consider desirable to make teaching a career, we are going to have to be prepared to pay them attractive pensions at the end of their periods of service; but let us not forget the people who were under the plan in the old days, who made their contributions and are now left with totally inadequate pensions. That is one group.

The other group, which is even smaller, is a certain group of widows of retired teachers. I am not quite sure what their current situation is, but the last I heard of it, which was a few years ago, they were getting $25 a month. That seems to me to be about as low a pension as one could get and still say it is a pension.

Now this matter, as the hon. member for Brant said and as we all know, was before committees of this House on several occasions. On every occasion, the committee unanimously recommended, including Conservative, Liberal, CCF or NDP members, that something should be done about these people.

As a matter of fact I have a few notes from a meeting, I think it was held in 1961 or 1962, and on that occasion the committee reiterated a position it had previously taken that the government should do something about these people whose pensions are obviously totally inadequate. A further motion was passed at that time—I moved it and the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Reilly) seconded it—I am sorry he does not happen to be here this morning—by which we requested the then Minister of Education, who is the present hon. Prime Minister, to look into this matter. We requested further a meeting of the Minister with the committee before the estimates of The Department of Education came down. That meeting was never held. I even have a suspicion that the current Minister was the chairman of that committee, I am not sure.

Hon. Mr. Davis: No, he was not.

Mr. Bryden: Well, anyway, he was well aware of what was going on. The committee felt that the government should get down to business and not just keep saying that it agreed in principle but could not do anything. The committee asked for this meeting, it never was held, unfortunately.

There never has been an adequate explanation of why the very modest requests of these people cannot be met. As far as the superannuated teachers affected are concerned, meeting the total of their demands back in 1961 and 1962 would have cost $1 million a year. Now, I am sure, it will cost less, because some of them undoubtedly have dropped off since then. They were quite an elderly group.

I do not know how much it would have cost to have met the requirements of the teachers' widows, but let us say it was another $500,000 at that time. The whole sum is probably down to something like $1.25 million now. It is a sum that will decline year by year until ultimately there will be no obligation.

Mr. Chairman, in a budget of nearly $1.5 billion, surely we can afford an expenditure of somewhere between $1 million and $1.5 million per year for a few years, declining year by year, and only for a few years, to meet a serious human need.

All that these ladies have ever been asking for is that all pensions below $1,000 a year—a miserable $1,000 a year—should be raised to $1,200 a year; and that those whose pensions are between $1,000 and $3,000 a year should receive an increase of $200 a year.

I am amazed, as a matter of fact, at the modesty of their proposal. A minimum pension of $1,200 a year surely is something that we can readily recognize, and we certainly should not contemplate anything less than that.

I have never really heard any explanation that amounted to anything from the government as to why this cannot be done. The most I heard consisted of some dark references to the fact that if we did this for these superannuated teachers and widows, then there are other people living in similar poverty for whom something should be done. The other people have never been specified, but if there are other people dependent on pensions directly or indirectly from this government who are living in similar circumstances, then I say we should look after them. I do not know how much it would cost to do so, but I say that if there are people here getting pensions of less than $1,200 a year we should do something about them even if it costs another million or two per year.

I would like to call to the attention of the hon. Minister of Education the fact that earlier in this session the hon. Minister of Labour (Mr. Rowntree), after years of inaction, brought in legislation to rectify to some degree out-of-date pensions under The Workmen's Compensation Act.

For years and years, Mr. Chairman, it was alleged that we could not do this because there was no way of collecting the money. Finally, after many years of pressure, the hon. Minister of Labour brought in a recommendation that will bring up to some sort of minimum the completely antiquated pensions that until now were being paid to a small group of people under The Workmen's Compensation Act.

If we were ready to give justice to those people, and I am sure everybody in the House was, why are we not ready to give justice to these superannuated teachers and to any other small groups that may be in a similar situation? I think that we are entitled to a much more adequate explanation from the government than we have had to date. I hate to think we are now coming to the closing phase of another session of the Legislature with no indication at all from the government that it is going to do something about these people. I think that this is a disgraceful situation.

All of us should be ashamed. Here we are in a position to give at least a modicum of justice to people who gave fine service to this province, yet now have to live on a pension of $600 a year, plus, admittedly, the federal old-age security. We are asking them to live under those penurious circumstances and yet we are not contemplating doing something to change the situation. This matter has been before this House about every year for the last ten years, I think. Surely the government can act this year on the subject, and not slough it off until another year with some vague suggestion that there are other people being shabbily treated to whom we also have to provide justice if we provide justice to this group.

I ask the hon. Minister and the hon. Prime Minister to look at this matter urgently and do something about it. If it requires action by the Legislature, then for heaven's sake, let us have action before this session of the Legislature terminates. I really think, Mr. Chairman, that the government ought to be prepared to say something instead of just sitting and looking at us.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, just to bring the hon. member up to date, a Cabinet committee was appointed to look into this and we had a meeting with both groups, roughly a week or ten days ago. I cannot report any more to the House at this time, but this is the state of the situation at the moment.

Vote 518 agreed to.

Vote 519 agreed to.

Mr. Chairman: This concludes the estimates of The Department of Education.

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee of supply rise and report that it has come to certain resolutions and ask for leave to sit again.

Motion agreed to.

The House resumed; Mr. Speaker in the chair.

Mr. Chairman: Mr. Speaker, the committee of supply begs to report certain resolutions and asks for leave to sit again.

Report agreed to.

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, on Monday we will sit at 2 o'clock and have a night session on Monday night. I would like to go to second reading of government bills on the order paper. Then there are certain bills I would like to deal with in the committee stage and following that the estimates of The Department of Health. I will make the motion on Monday that we will sit at 10.30 a.m. on Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday and Friday of next week. There will be night sessions on Tuesday and Thursday nights, as well as on Monday night.

Hon. Mr. Robarts moves the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to.

The House adjourned at 1.10 o'clock, p.m.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

MONDAY, JUNE 7, 1965

The House met at 2 o'clock, p.m.

Prayers.

Mr. Speaker: We are always pleased to have visitors to the Legislature and today we welcome as guests, in the west gallery, members of the Woodstock-Oxford Circle, Woodstock; and in the east gallery, students from St. Peter's elementary school, Peterborough.

Hon. J. W. Spooner (Minister of Municipal Affairs): Mr. Speaker, before the next order of business, I would ask your indulgence, sir, if I may have the opportunity of presenting to you and to the House a very important visitor to our province in the person of the secretary-general of the Canadian council of Resource Ministers, Mr. Christian De Laet, who is sitting at your left.

Mr. Speaker: Petitions.

Presenting reports by committees.

Motions.

Introduction of bills.

Orders of the day.

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister) moves that in addition to the present hours of sitting this House will sit from 10.30 a.m. to 12.30 p.m. on Tuesdays, Wednesdays and Thursdays for the balance of the present session.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Mr. Speaker, before the motion carries, I would like to make a brief comment. I think this government has made considerable progress this year in terms of handling the business of the province in the fashion that will make it possible for both those of us in this House and outside to do justice to that business. I am very sorry that in the final stages of the session we are reverting to that old familiar pattern of working on a basis on which it is not possible to do justice to the business of the province.

Mr. Speaker, I think the main reason for this is something that we have raised many times in this House and we do not seem to be able to make the degree of progress to which I think the Legislature is entitled; and that is that the main load of government business should be brought down something other than in the final week of the Legislature. We are now faced with the prospect of clearing, in a week or, conceivably two weeks or perhaps ten days, the estimates of three departments and a very significant load of the government business which was brought down as late as the past week or two.

I for one have said, and I repeat it here, the proposition of starting sessions at two o'clock in the afternoon earlier in the session to give us the extra hours would remove the necessity of this war of attrition in the final days. This is something that I think we should entertain. It has not been done this year, and it has not been done because the government caucus was meeting up until a very short time ago to deal with business which I submit, in any planned approach to legislation, could have come down many months ago, at least many weeks ago.

I regret once again, I want to say on behalf of our group, that we have once again fallen into this familiar pattern. It is going to be impossible, not only for us but for a lot of people who are intensely interested in some legislation that has been brought down only in the last few days, to even have a chance to get the bill and to study it, let alone to have an opportunity to make representations to the standing committee or to members of the Legislature.

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): I feel that I should make a comment following the hon. member. Mind you, Mr. Speaker, we have gone through this argument once a year for the 14 years that I have been in the House, but it does seem to me that in the natural development of business, when the mornings are no longer needed for committee work, to be only proper and natural that the time could be used, particularly when a great deal of work on the order paper has reached the committee stage of the whole House.

In other words, the debates have been held on second readings where the principles have been debated and so on; I feel a very broad and a very complete effort has been given for a thorough examination of this business. Frankly, it is a problem for many of the hon. members, particularly those from out of town, at this stage of the session when the committees are not meeting in the morning. What are they to do? Just sit around all morning and do nothing? The alternative is to come in here and deal with matters which are on the order paper, as I say in the committee stage. They will receive thorough scrutiny and there will be opportunity for all this work on the order paper to receive full attention, as it has in the past.

Mr. A. E. Thompson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would say that from our side we do not have any objection to a morning sitting when committees are not meeting; but one of our concerns, and I am making the judgment before this actually takes place, one of our concerns would be that if we had late night sittings, then we would feel that really this is trying to press things too steadily. We have had situations where we have gone on until twelve or so, and I think, sir, that we have all seen that on the whole the debate deteriorates. We are all human and we get somewhat tired at the late hours. I would hope that the hon. Prime Minister will see to it that we do not have long night sittings plus morning sittings.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: I would say in this regard that we would not exceed the night sittings we have had. Sometimes we have continued later than 11.30 till 12.00—I believe after that on one occasion. But in each case it has been in order to complete one debate that was taking place. It is not my intent to add to it, because some of us have to do a certain amount of administration as well as being in the House to deal with just this aspect of government work. It is not my intent that we should start sitting hours that are going to make it very difficult for all of us to do the task that we are here to do.

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to participate in this discussion, if I may call it that rather than a debate. I certainly cannot let pass without comment, the question—I think that is the way he put it—of the hon. Prime Minister as to whether or not the hon. members will just sit around every morning when there are no committees meeting and when the House is not in session.

The hon. Prime Minister no doubt can speak for his own supporters, but I can assure the House, Mr. Speaker, that as far as people over here are concerned, we do not sit around in the mornings merely because there are no meetings of either the House or committees. With the amount of important legislation that has been piled on us in the last couple of weeks, along with major estimates—three of the most important departments still to be dealt with—I submit that one does not have to be clairvoyant to understand what Opposition members will be doing in the morning. They want to study this legislation.

But the government's arrangement makes it practically impossible to give it the study that is merited. Under the regime that is now proposed, we will start at 10.30 in the morning; we will presumably not complete our sessions until 10.30 in the evening, and perhaps even later in some cases. What time does that leave for mature consideration of the highly important legislation that is now before us, with only limited notice?

Mr. Speaker, I submit that the business of the House should be so ordered that all members—those on the Opposition side as well as on the government side—have adequate opportunity to consider important matters placed before us.

In fact, I would say that it is in many ways more important that the needs of the members of the Opposition should be considered in this connection. The function of the Opposition is to scrutinize the proposals the government places before the House. Those proposals have already been before government members in caucus. We will still scrutinize; the hon. members of the government do not need to think that we are going to fail to do our job just because work has been piled on us in this inhuman way, but I believe, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. W. D. McKeough (Kent West): Question!

Mr. Bryden: This is it! These people always want to cut off discussion. They want nothing dealt with on its merits. They want to railroad measures through.

Mr. Speaker: Order, order!

Mr. MacDonald: You have had weeks of argument on the liquor legislation in your own caucus.

Mr. Bryden: One of the reasons—

Mr. Speaker: Will the member please complete his remarks and never mind the interjections. I will look after the interjectionists.

Mr. Bryden: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

One of the reasons why we did not start at 2 o'clock much earlier in the session was that the government was still having its legislation considered in Cabinet and caucus up till about a week ago; five months after the start of this session. This is the difficulty we are up against. The government does not plan its programme so that it can bring in legislation reasonably early.

There was no need for this liquor legislation to wait until the last minute; it could have been before the House in February. But no, it is in now and this fact is used, among other things, as an excuse for now meeting at 10.30 in the morning. I, like every member in this House, do not enjoy meeting in this House in the summer-time, but I believe that we should meet here if it is necessary for deliberate consideration of the business.

I would also point out, Mr. Speaker, that if we do not start our sessions until the winter is half over, then we can regard it as inevitable that we are going to have to meet in the summer. If we started a bit earlier perhaps we could avoid meeting well into the month of June.

We have no option but to accept this decree that the government is now putting before us; but I would hope, once again, Mr. Speaker, that in future the government will plan its programme of activity for a session in such a way that it is not necessary for the House to be in session for 12 and more hours per day.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the motion carry?

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): Mr. Speaker, I think there is a word or two yet to add. In this speeding up of the proceedings we are going to lose the opportunity to discuss in committee several important bills that are still before the standing committee of the House. Such bills as the Medicare bill, I would think, should have been an important part of the legislative process; that bill would have been introduced to the standing committee on health, presented there and the public given an opportunity to present their arguments to that committee.

The same thing should apply insofar as the educational research bill is concerned. There are all sorts of persons in this province who would have been interested in appearing before the standing committee on education; had it been sitting. There is the community colleges bill, which has been a topic of very substantial discussion among leading educators in this province, but the public has been denied the opportunity to discuss this before the standing committee on education.

My friend, the hon. member for York South, mentioned the liquor legislation. There are all sorts of groups and institutions and organizations that would have been interested in coming before the committee on legal bills to discuss those matters in a public way, as has been their right and has been an established procedure in this House.

There is the OMERS bill, which was introduced just at the end of last week. I have had several inquiries over the weekend from persons who are interested in the changes that are being introduced into the Ontario municipal system, and they are concerned as to how it is going to affect them. All I could tell them—as I had these inquiries over the weekend—was: "I do not know how you are going to present any objections that you might have, I do not even know how you are going to see a copy of the bill before it becomes law because it looks, with the speed-up that we are going to have, that we are going to be out of here by Friday. If you find something in that bill that you do not like, it is just tough luck."

The same sort of things prevails insofar as the EMO bill is concerned. Then, Mr. Speaker, I deplore very seriously the fact that only in the last few days of the sitting are we going to be given—and at irregular times and without any pattern—an opportunity to discuss private members' public bills; for instance, the bill standing in my name on the ombudsman, on which we got ten minutes of debate on Thursday afternoon. It will come back sometime soon again, but nobody is quite sure when or, at least, nobody has been able to tell me.

There is the resolution of the hon. member for Wellington South (Mr. Worton) on divorce—a matter that has aroused great public interest here. We do not know when it is going to be called or how much time will be allowed for debate on it, and that sort of thing. There are a dozen different private members' bills standing on the order paper and a dozen different resolutions, and they are all going to be jammed into a hodge-podge at the end of the session because the government's business is not properly organized.

It seems, Mr. Speaker, that we must object very strenuously to the way the government carries on the business of this House.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Clerk of the House: The second order. Committee of the whole House.

Mr. S. Lewis (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, I have put on the order paper notice of motion of the following to be given as instruction to the committee; namely, that it has power to consider and make recommendations to amend Bill 136 as stipulated in the notice of motion that I provided, and I should wish to speak to that now.

Mr. Speaker: I would ask the member to put his motion.

Mr. S. Lewis moves that:

Upon the calling of the order for committee of the whole House, that the following instruction be given to the committee, namely, that it has power to consider and make recommendations to amend Bill 136 to provide:

1. That a fund be established into which shall be paid all money necessary to provide fully comprehensive medical insurance contracts to persons designated in sections 6 and 7 of the bill and in this motion, and that the said contracts be issued and the said fund administered by the hospital services commission of Ontario.

2. That government support according to an appropriate sliding scale be made available to provide comprehensive contracts to those whose taxable income does not exceed $3,000 per year.

3. That all residents of the province, whether or not referred to in paragraph 2, be entitled to receive comprehensive contracts from the commission upon voluntary payment by them into the fund of appropriate contributions as determined by the commission, and that issuance of such contracts and payment of such contributions be required in respect of those for whom coverage is mandatory under The Hospital Services Commission Act and regulations.

4. That provision be made to cover prescribed drugs at least for pensioners, persons for whom continuing drug therapy is required after discharge from hospital, and persons for whom long-term drug therapy is necessary.

Mr. Speaker: I wish to inform the member for Scarborough West that I have taken note of the notice of motion of this instruction to the committee of the whole House, which he has just moved.

I wish to advise the member, and the House, that in reading page 536 and the following pages in May's 17th edition respecting procedure for instructions to a committee, including the committee of the whole House, I have no doubt that such a procedure, though rare, is a recognized procedure of Parliament.

However, agreeing with the procedure, I find that the precedents make it quite clear that the proposed instruction is out of order.

Under the heading, "Inadmissible instructions," at pages 539 and 540 of May, it states that such an instruction is out of order, and I quote:

—if its objects are inconsistent with the decision of the House taken on second reading, or seek to traverse that decision by an alternative scheme or postponement.

Cases in support of this principle are cited on page 540.

From the debate on second reading, it is my understanding that one of the main principles of Bill 136 is its voluntary feature, and I have no doubt in my mind that the provision in the proposed instruction, that contracts and payments of contribution, be required in respect of those for whom coverage is mandatory under The Hospital Services Commission Act and regulations, is in direct conflict with the decision of the House taken on second reading.

In fact, it appears obvious to me that the whole purport of the proposed instruction is to propose an alternative scheme which is expressly out of order.

I therefore must declare the proposed instruction out of order.

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): Mr. Speaker, this—

Mr. Speaker: I would advise the member that the Speaker's ruling is not debatable, but if the member for Scarborough West wishes to appeal my ruling, he is at liberty to do so.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Speaker, I would suggest to you that we went to great trouble to provide you with a memo on this. I would have thought—

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry, will the member please be seated. There is no point of order. I have rendered a decision and taken note of the notice of instruction, and the member for York South (Mr. MacDonald) read it to the House at the time that it was made. The notice of instruction has been moved today and read again with the motion of the member for Scarborough West; I have read it in the meantime and I have made a decision, and the Speaker's decision—if we are going to abide by the rules of the House—is not debatable. Therefore the member is out of order. The member for Scarborough West has the liberty to appeal my decision if he wishes.

Mr. S. Lewis: Can I have liberty, Mr. Speaker, to comment on the decision for a moment on the basis of the motion?

Mr. Speaker: No, you are not at liberty to comment on the Speaker's decision.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Well, Mr. Speaker, we have no alternative but to appeal your ruling, and I want to give you my reasons. The government has gone to very great pains to state that it was establishing, in this plan, a plan duplicating the successful principles of hospital insurance.

Mr. L. M. Reilly (Eglinton): We did nothing of the sort.

Mr. Speaker: The member—

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, I will be brief—

Mr. Speaker: Pardon me, I am sorry. The member can appeal my ruling but, in doing so, he is not at liberty to go into a long dissertation of the reasons why he is appealing my ruling.

Mr. MacDonald: Do you mean one cannot give the reasons as to why?

Mr. Speaker: No.

Mr. MacDonald: It would not take long; not more than two or three minutes.

Mr. Speaker: I would say that you simply have to appeal the ruling I made without going into a speech as to why you are appealing it.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, on a second point of order. This surely is extraordinary, that one is denied the opportunity to explain why he is appealing the Speaker's ruling?

Mr. Speaker: I must say that I have never seen the practice except on one occasion when I allowed the member to do so.

Mr. MacDonald: Well, Mr. Speaker, I just want to say this: We supplied you with all the reasons why this was done; we did it as a courtesy, but we did not get in return the courtesy of an explanation from you until now. Secondly, if I had the opportunity I would explain that this is precisely in the terms of the plan that the government professes to be duplicating. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, your explanation that it does not conform with the decision in second reading is, in our view, simply not valid. We have drawn this up so that it is exclusively within the framework of the second reading that has been adopted by this House. We accept the will of the House and therefore we have no alternative but to appeal your ruling.

Mr. Speaker: All those in favour of the Speaker's ruling, will please say "aye." All those opposed, please say "nay." In my opinion, the "ayes" have it.

Call in the members.

POWERS OF EXPROPRIATION GRANTED TO UNIVERSITIES

House in committee on Bill No. 44, An Act to make uniform the powers of expropriation granted to universities.

On section 1:

Hon. A. A. Wishart (Attorney General) moves that subsection 1 of section 1 be amended by striking out the word “and” at the end of clause m, by relettering clause n and clause t and by adding thereto the following clauses:

- (n) University of Ottawa;
- (o) Waterloo Lutheran University.

Hon. A. A. Wishart (Attorney General): The effect, Mr. Chairman, is to add to the list of universities under section 1, two other universities, the University of Ottawa and Waterloo Lutheran University.

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): Mr. Chairman, as I understand it, with these amendments all the universities in Ontario are now covered. Am I correct in that assumption?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: All universities which receive public funds. I believe these are all, actually.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, the concern of many of us, about this section as originally worded, was that it did not cover all universities. This amendment brings in the two that are covered. Would it not be simpler if clause 1, subsection 1 of section 1, said “all Ontario universities which are in receipt of public funds” so that there could be no doubt that the intention of the government is not to discriminate between any future universities? Would not that seem much more logical rather than listing them?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: As amended, the section will include those named in the section, with the addition of Ottawa University and Waterloo Lutheran University. The last clause of the section provides such other universities designated by the Lieutenant-Governor in Council. There are some universities that possibly are not receiving full public funds and do not qualify. The Act would enable those universities to be added as they qualify.

Mr. Singer: But, Mr. Chairman, the very thing that gives us cause to consider this very carefully is the fact that in the first draft two important universities were left out. It would seem to me that if the government wants this type of legislation to apply—and the legislation in principle is good—it should make it abundantly clear that it applies without fear or favour to all universities. I am just wondering why—because we had a warning signal that apparently it was intended to discriminate as the bill was originally drafted—why subsection 1 of section 1 does not say “all Ontario universities,” or “all Ontario universities that are in receipt of money from the province of Ontario.”

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, there is no intention to discriminate at all. There were certain qualifications to be met by universities to be in receipt of public funds. My hon. friend knows that if any universities are left out I would be glad to hear him state one.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, I suppose that by nature I am suspicious. The hon. Attorney General says there is no intention to discriminate and I just cannot think of any other explanation in the bill as it was originally drafted, but that there was a deliberate intention to discriminate because the University of Ottawa and Waterloo Lutheran University were definitely left out. I am saying that if there is now no intention to discriminate—and I carefully draw the distinction because there was then an intention to discriminate—why not say in simple language “all Ontario universities”?

Section 1, as amended, agreed to.

On section 2:

Hon. Mr. Wishart moves that subsection 1 of section 2 be amended by striking out the words "real property" in the fifth line and inserting in lieu thereof the words "land as defined in The Expropriation Procedures Act, 1962 and 1963"; and that subsections 2 and 3 be amended by striking out the words "real property" in the second line of each subsection and inserting in lieu thereof in each case the word "land."

Hon. Mr. Wishart: The effect of the proposed amendment, Mr. Chairman, is simply to give the definition of land as it now is in The Expropriation Procedures Act.

On section 34:

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, on section 34, I wonder if the hon. Attorney General would consider putting another sub-clause in there, governing the use of firearms, or the carrying of firearms; or does he feel that it is dealt with adequately enough by the criminal code? That is the regulation section.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: There are provisions in the criminal code for the registration, use and control of firearms and we carry out those certain things under our registration through our police force. I do not think there is any urgency indicated in this.

Mr. Singer: Does the hon. Attorney General think, Mr. Chairman, that where an investigation agency or security agency believes it looks impressive to have open-holstered revolvers, it is a good thing? The hon. Attorney General takes on himself in this amendment the power to issue regulations to govern uniform badges and insignia; should he not take upon himself as well, the power to issue regulations governing the carrying of firearms? It seems to me to make sense and in keeping with the amendment that the committee inserted—amendment "h" in the regulations.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I think I would rely upon the last subsection (k) if that appeared to be necessary.

(a) Where,

(i) the number of trustees is fewer than five or more than nine or,

(ii) the municipality or part thereof in a county school area is entitled under subsection 1 or 2 of subsection 55 to one half or fewer of the trustees of the county school area, and the assessment for public school purposes in the municipality or part as adjusted by the application of the latest equalization factor provided by The Department of Municipal Affairs is more than three-quarters of the total assessment for public school purposes in the county school area is adjusted by the application of the latest equalization factors provided by such department, the council of a county may as recommended by the computative committee request the Minister to determine the number of trustees to be elected to the board. The municipality or municipalities to be represented by each trustee and their term of office.

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): The purpose of the amendment is to authorize the Minister, when requested by a county council as recommended by computative committee, to determine the number of trustees on the board of a county school area in circumstances where one municipality that has three-quarters of the assessment in the county school area is entitled to only one-half or fewer of the trustees under the normal procedure for determining representation.

Mr. Singer: Which is simpler, the amendment or the explanation?

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Well, it is simply to provide, where it is three-quarters of the assessment, the Minister—under certain circumstances—with power to give that municipality more representation on the board.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, I move that section 1 be struck out and that the following sections be renumbered accordingly.

By way of explanation, Mr. Chairman, I would say that the provision in section 1 is something which may very well be done by the shareholders of the companies themselves. There has been considerable representation as to limiting the age of a director for appointment or election, and since it is something the companies may well do themselves, we have decided to leave it out of the legislation.

Mr. Singer: Will the hon. Attorney General tell us why it was there in the first place?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I might say that there was considerable representation to put it in. There were certain people wishing that the Legislature would take this task on for them.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Is the hon. Attorney General certain that these are his sober second thoughts?

This is just a change in the year end.

THE OPHTHALMIC DISPENSERS ACT, 1960-1961

House in committee on Bill No. 107, An Act to amend The Ophthalmic Dispensers Act, 1960-1961.

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): I was just trying to dig out my copy of this bill.

There are one or two matters to which I would like to call the attention of the hon. Minister of Health (Mr. Dymond) with regard to it. Actually, the whole of the bill, for all practical purposes, is incorporated in section 1. When the hon. Minister brought the bill before the House for first and second readings he indicated, as seemed reasonable, that all the proposed amendments would make the disciplinary powers of the council under The Ophthalmic Dispensers Act the same as that in other professional Acts. This seemed perfectly reasonable, but since the bill received second reading there have been a number of other matters that have come to light, Mr. Chairman. I think they throw a somewhat different complexion on the whole question, and I raise these matters now to put them before the hon. Minister for his comments, and perhaps, if he was not already aware of them, for his consideration.

I am sorry, Mr. Chairman, it is the next Act I am talking about.

Sections 1 to 4, inclusive, agreed to.

Bill No. 107 reported.

THE PHARMACY ACT

House in committee on Bill No. 108, An Act to amend The Pharmacy Act.

Mr. Bryden: My hon. friend from Wentworth East (Mr. Gisbourn) was trying valiantly to let me know that I was one bill ahead when I started my previous remarks. I had been working on something else and had not noticed that we had not yet come to The Pharmacy Act. However, it is better to be one bill early than one bill late.

As I was saying, the proposed amendment gives the council powers that are more or less in line with those given to councils of other professional associations under other Acts. However, it is to be noted, I think, Mr. Chairman, that recently the council of the college of pharmacy has been considering certain matters, which, I would say, come very nearly into the realm of price-fixing. I admit that they are very careful about it because they know that if they openly attempt price-fixing practices they will be in trouble with the restrictive trade practices commission in Ottawa. However, they have had a special committee on the subject of advertising and professional fees. This committee reported to the council of the college in February and March of this year. On April 22 the council circularized members of the college of pharmacy in regard to the report of the special committee on advertising and professional fees. A copy of this circular came to my attention some time after that date.

I will not go through the whole of the report of the special committee, but there are one or two sections of it that I would like to call to the attention of the hon. Minister.

At the second meeting, after very full discussion of advertising and also of the professional fees concept it was decided to recommend to council—that is the council of the college of pharmacy:

—that any reference to these services in any media be confined to: Age, name and identification, name and degree, pharmaceutical chemist, pharmacist, pharmacy drugs, druggist, drug store, apothecary.

(b) In the store, descriptive information to be confined to certain narrow limitations.

(c) Telephone listings to be restricted to standard or bold-face type and no display advertising permitted.

(d) Professional advertising in newspapers, circulars, letters, cards, and so on, shall not appear as part of an advertisement of merchandise, or on the same page as an advertisement of merchandise. Radio, television and other media shall be similarly restricted.

And then the next item in this report:

That this council do hereby go on record as publicly and immediately renouncing any and all methods of estimating professional dispensing fees and/or pricing guides, which it may have previously caused to be published, and that, effective June 1, 1965—the date has already passed:

—the professional-fee method of pricing prescriptions be the only method approved by this council.

And that the suggested minimum for professional services be $2 for each prescription dispensed, it being understood that there is no compulsion on any member of the profession to adopt this exact fee—and so on. That last clause is put in for the benefit of the restricted trade practices commission, that no member of the college of pharmacy is required to accept the precise dispensing fee of $2—but this is the one that is recommended.

Now, if one takes all that together, Mr. Chairman, what it adds up to is this: that, under the report of the special committee which has been approved by the council, it will be considered unethical conduct for a pharmacist to advertise the prices of products that he sells, or at any rate to advertise and associate his name with the advertisement. What the college is trying to accomplish here is that there will be no advertising and that there will be a so-called fee for professional service in pricing plus the cost of the goods. I have no objection to fees for professional service but I would point out to the hon. Minister that what is involved here is only partly and to a minor degree, a fee for professional service.

There is also a commodity being sold, namely, a drug prescribed by a doctor. We know that the college of pharmacy is unhappy because certain pharmacists are selling prescription drugs at reduced prices and are advertising the fact they are doing so. There is very little point in having price competition if one cannot let the world know that one is competing on prices.

The college of pharmacy for some substantial time has been after certain pharmaceutical enterprises—notably the pharmacy connected with Honest Ed's and the Vanguard pharmacy in Toronto; and no doubt some others, there are several of them—which have been trying to introduce a certain degree of price competition into this highly monopolistic industry.

As a matter of fact, having served for two years on the select committee on the price of drugs, I am quite satisfied that about the only place where there is any real competition in this industry is at the retail level. The big fellows have pretty well knocked it out, by a variety of means that we do not have to go into here, at the manufacturers' level. The one place where there is a chance of price competition is at the retail level. Certain pharmacists, either by specializing in volume or sometimes by specializing in certain types of service—for example, Vanguard pharmacy specializes in providing drugs in quantity to those afflicted by long-term illness who need them in quantity—by doing this sort of thing a number of pharmacists have been able to cut the price and still make a profit.

The college of pharmacy does not like that. It does not like the operation of the free enterprise principle in the so-called free enterprise system. It has been pushing away and trying in various ways to stop these people from doing that. Now it has come up with a further idea; it is going to have a professional fee method it says, and this is the only method it will recognize.

Then in addition, and what is critical, it will regard as unethical any attempt by a pharmacist to indicate, not that he is providing his professional services at a reduced price, but that he is selling goods at a reduced price. If they have their way, he will not be permitted to advertise that fact.

So the net effect, if they can make this stick, will be to eliminate such price competition as continues to exist in this industry.

It has always been a fact that businessmen believe in competition for the other guys but never for themselves. This is human nature, and nobody would criticize them for it. But we, the public representatives, should make sure they do not use public statutes to protect themselves against price competition. When one takes the amendment now before us in Bill 108 in the context of the circular that has gone out from the college of pharmacy, I think there is a danger, Mr. Chairman, that the real purpose of the amendment will be to serve as a weapon to reduce price competition.

You see, if a pharmacist should make it known that he is selling certain products at a certain price, he will be accused of unethical conduct by the college of pharmacy. They will be able to badger him with this much stricter and tougher section 29(a), and say to him, in effect: "Now look, fellow, you are getting out of line; you stop this nefarious practice of advertising the prices at which you are willing to sell goods or we are going to bring section 29(a) down on you like a ton of bricks; we can haul you up before the college of pharmacy, force you to give evidence," and so on, "We can put the blocks to you."

It may be that they could not get away with it. It may be that a court would not uphold what is clearly the attempt of the college of pharmacy to provide that the advertising of goods is unethical conduct, I do not know. But the point is that with this much tougher enforcement section it is quite possible that the college of pharmacy could simply intimidate people into accepting their attempt to restrict a normal and legitimate business practice, and indeed one that I would say is absolutely essential in the interests of the public; a practice whereby people who are willing to sell goods at less than the going price are able to advise the public that they are doing that.

I think, Mr. Chairman, that we should take another look at this bill in the light of this recent development, a development which took place after the hon. Minister introduced the bill in the House, and I believe after it was given second reading in this House. Certainly the development did not come to my attention until after the bill had received second reading.

I do not think this is the appropriate time to proceed any further with the bill. Let us find out exactly what the college of pharmacy had in mind in seeking this amendment. Let us see how they explain it in relation to the circular that they sent out a month or so ago. I think this House is entitled to an explanation of such matters before it proceeds any further with the bill.

After all, the college has been carrying on for a great many years with the enforcement procedures, the disciplinary procedures, that are already in The Pharmacy Act. I know they have been unhappy about them, because people whom they look down upon have been able to get away with price competition, and they would like to stop that. I am afraid that this tighter section, although I am sure when the hon. Minister introduced it he accepted it at face value as I did, is part of the overall plan to try to eliminate what little remnants of price competition there are in the pharmaceutical industry.

As I say, it may be the hon. Minister has an explanation of these matters. I thought at least they should be brought to his attention for his comment. I would suggest to him that unless he has an adequate explanation we should simply let the bill stand for this year until the situation clarifies itself.

Hon. M. B. Dymond (Minister of Health): Mr. Chairman, I have to say to you, sir, that I have no knowledge of this committee's report. I could expect and accept that this could be a professional committee of the council set up to investigate some phase that is of interest to the profession, and that it has submitted its report. As far as I know, the report has not been accepted by council or adopted by council.

Mr. Bryden: Oh yes, I am sorry, it has.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: It has?

Mr. Bryden: I probably did not make that clear.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: This might well be, but there is no indication in council's request to us that this enters into the matter of the amendment in any way, shape or form. For some time now, the profession has been trying to exercise some control over the price of drugs by having their members adopt and stand by a professional fee for their services, rather than running the business by pricing the drugs according to a mark-up or a scale of profits. This, I believe, might well be behind the thinking of the council when they set up this committee.

There is nothing that I can see involving this amendment that would give any solid ground to the suspicion of the hon. member. After all, there is an appeal to the courts from any ruling of the college or the disciplinary committee of the college. If the member charged is convicted by the disciplinary committee and disagrees with their finding, he has recourse to the courts.

Mr. F. Young (Yorkview): May I ask a further question of the hon. Minister in this respect? Evidently the whole purpose of this disciplinary committee is to try to get some stability in the price structure. I think of a friend of mine—

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Mr. Speaker, excuse me for interrupting. That is not the function. The sole function of the disciplinary committee is to oversee and keep watch over the professional conduct of pharmacists.

Mr. Young: How far then will professional conduct go? I think of a friend of mine who has to take drugs all the time in order to live, and those drugs are very high priced. He is not a wealthy man and he was paying too high a price. I talked to his druggist, who felt that it would be unethical to lower the price; but talking to another friend of mine who is a druggist, he made some arrangement whereby the patient could get his drugs at a much lower price, near the wholesale level. Now, this was an unethical practice according to the first druggist, and he was irritated that the business left him and went to the other person. In a situation like this, would this kind of undercutting of prices be thought of as unethical, and could this bill conceivably give the druggists power to discipline the second druggist?

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Mr. Chairman, I think I should point out that, in all sincerity, this is not the business of the college. I think that the first druggist was irritated because he lost some business—a very human trait. But I am quite certain that, if he took that formal charge to the college, it would not even be looked at. The business of the college is to look after and maintain educational and professional standards, not to concern itself with pricing or charges of price-cutting. They try to maintain and constantly elevate their group to the status of a profession, where they belong, and this is the only place where they become involved in matters of advertising and things of that kind. All the professions, as you know, have fairly rigid standards relative to professional advertising, and the college of pharmacy is trying to maintain theirs. To the best of my knowledge, sir, they are not involved officially in the matter of price control.

Mr. Bryden: Well, Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Chairman: The member for Perth.

Mr. J. F. Edwards (Perth): Mr. Chairman, I have listened with interest to the thoughts of the hon. member for Woodbine. I have been a practising druggist for 38 years, having graduated 40 years ago. My drugstore has been going for 102 or 103 years, and in that time—I have had some very honest predecessors—we have served the people well in that area; we did not overcharge. There has been a lot mentioned about pricing and fair profit, and we all know you cannot live unless you make a profit. I believe that a fair profit should be paid to everybody who works and also the man who retails. He cannot give something away and not make it up somewhere else, let us not kid ourselves.

We are talking about the cost of drugs. Over the past years I did not have the privilege of serving on the drug committee for reasons not my own, yet there was undue criticism made of the druggists at that time, and of the profits they were taking as a result of being in that type of business. This was entirely untrue. It has been mentioned, and I think it should be mentioned again, that often a druggist buys 100 pills because that is what he has to buy to fill a prescription of 30. We can blame this on the manufacturers, possibly, yet when a doctor prescribes, it is the duty of the druggist to fill just what he asks for, no substitutions. I make a practice of that. If necessary I will phone Toronto and have things delivered that night. That is what you call service.

Someone mentioned somebody who had to take drugs over a long period of time. Any customer for vitamin E, for instance, in my area, can buy it in my drugstore at a 20 per cent discount. That is a common practice among druggists in this province.

With regard to dispensing charges, they are for the birds as far as I am concerned, because in the area where I live, the people do not make the kind of money that they can afford $2.50 for a prescription on top of the price of drugs. I think one has to use his judgment as a doctor does. The man who has money pays and the man who does not have money has a right to service even if he cannot pay for it. I think we have to take that for granted.

In connection with these cut-rate stores which the hon. member mentioned: Possibly, if you ride along Danforth Avenue you will find about 15 good druggists who had to go out of business as a result of the price competition from these discount houses. As the hon. Minister of Health has said, there is no setting of prices; there never has been, and by the same token, there is nobody who tells the manufacturer where to sell his goods; manufacturers do not care where they sell them as long as they sell them. That is creating half the problems of the retail drug stores.

We all know that there are locations in this city, where, if a man did not have a drug-and-sundry business he would not have a business, because the doctors send their prescriptions to certain stores, or the customers take them to the stores that have the leadership. Beyond that they cannot tell them where to take them.

So you see, there are difficulties. But I would like to have it on the record that some of the criticism of drugstores is not merited at all, and I would also like to say that as far as I am concerned, and I am fairly active in the different groups, I can see no objection to giving the council a little further disciplinary powers with regard to—it is not unfair competition, it is unethical practice, that is actually what it is.

I would even go a little farther. You have heard me mention dispensing. In some of our communities the doctors hand out drugs, but there is not a graduate druggist to do it when he is not there. I just wish the hon. Minister of Health could take that into account and some day ensure that dispensing is done where there are only qualified people to do it. The doctors are qualified but they are not always in their offices in the country.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, I would not disagree with anything the hon. member has said. But that is not really the point that I was trying to make. I am not trying to criticize the retail pharmacist—that is not the matter at issue—but I am concerned about what the college of pharmacy may have in mind.

The hon. member for Perth stated that as a practising pharmacist he thinks the professional-fee method is for the birds. I think those were his words essentially. Under this report of the committee, which was approved by the council of the college on Monday, April 12—

Mr. MacDonald: We are heading for trouble.

Mr. Bryden: —“effective June 1, 1965, professional-fee method of pricing prescriptions be the only method approved by this council.” Now that has been approved by the council of the college of pharmacy and is now in effect as far as they are concerned. I take it that what they mean is that if a druggist, such as my hon. friend from Perth, does not use that method they will consider that he is guilty of unprofessional conduct and conceivably take disciplinary action against him. I admire the position of the hon. Minister of Health that one should not normally look behind a bill for the motive of those sponsoring it. I think that is a reasonably sound proposition in the main, but let it be borne in mind, Mr. Chairman, that the council of the college of pharmacy has been indirectly trying to engage in price-fixing without contravening the federal restrictive trade practices legislation.

For a great many years it has badgered and harried people who have been selling drugs at less than the price at which the college would like to see them sell; it cannot lay down rules that that is unprofessional conduct, but it sits over them and watches them for the slightest slip so that it can haul them up before the discipline committee. It has certainly done that in the past, and when there is an organization with a record like that, I think we have to take a somewhat more critical look at what it is doing than the hon. Minister is taking in this case, and than would be legitimate in most cases.

When an organization with a record like the council of the college of pharmacy asks for a tightening of its disciplinary powers—at the same time that it is trying to make unethical the advertising of prices that pharmacists are going to charge for products, not for professional services, but for products—then I think we should take a hard look at it. As I said to the hon. Minister, I think perhaps he should in this case develop a somewhat more suspicious attitude than is in his nature, because the facts here merit it. I fully accept his explanation that when the proposed amendment was brought to him, it was in terms merely of bringing the Act into line with certain other professional Acts. But in view of the record of this organization, and in view of its recent attempts, as indicated by the document I have read, to clearly restrict price competition and to use our legislation for that purpose—I think the whole matter should stand until we have had a good, hard look at it.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, to bring this to a head, I wonder if I might ask the hon. Minister directly if it is his intention that the existing powers or the enlarged disciplinary powers as they are spelled out in this Act, are not to be used for price regulations, in advertising or otherwise?

Hon. Mr. Dymond: It would certainly be my belief, sir, that this government should not give any professional body powers that will give them the right to regulate prices. I do not believe that this is inherent in this amendment at all. It certainly is not from the government's standpoint.

I am still of the opinion that this is a recommendation of council, not an order of council. To the best of my knowledge, council does not involve itself in checking price-cutting. I believe this is the association; is it not the association, Mr. Chairman, that keeps a constant eye on this competition, rather than the college?

The college, again, according to the legislation we have provided for it, is to maintain educational standards and to look after professional conduct. It has really nothing to do with the average advertisement a druggist will publish in the newspapers.

Mr. Bryden: I agree with the hon. Minister that this is what the college of pharmacy is supposed to be doing. The council maintains that inspectors—and these inspectors have certainly been used in the past in a way designed to intimidate people in the industry—qualified pharmacists, registered pharmacists—from engaging in price competition.

They cannot do that directly, because, as I said, they will be in trouble with the federal authorities; but they certainly have tried to do it indirectly. My fear is that, under this legislation, their hand may be strengthened in trying to do indirectly, something that they certainly cannot lawfully do directly.

However, Mr. Chairman, I was happy to hear at least the hon. Minister's assurance that there is no intention on the government's part to put legislation on the statute books that would in any way give an association a power to fix prices. If it should turn out in the jurisprudence of this matter, that that has happened, or that in practice they are able to use this section for that purpose, then I have no doubt that, under the circumstances, the government will take another look at the section.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Mr. Chairman, I will go even further and give you an undertaking that I will call the council into conference and tell them very specifically that this is a fear of hon. members of this House, and it is not the intention of this legislation to give them this power.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, may I just get one further point of clarification? Then I think we will have complete satisfaction here. When you say that you do not intend that they should have the power of price fixing, do you interpret the power of price fixing to include the power to forbid advertising prices of products—not professional fees, the products?

Hon. Mr. Dymond: I would have to think about that before giving a snap answer, sir, because there is a great deal more to this than is apparent on the surface.

My hon. friend from Woodbine says that I should develop a suspicious nature. I am steadily doing this through listening to the points that they raise, but I do not want to become overly suspicious, nor do I want to give any snap judgment on a question which could have the ramifications that his have.

I do not believe that is the type of advertising at which they are aiming. The advertising that the college is seeking to control, I believe, concerns the professional side of pharmacy. I do not know how many of these discount houses advertise prices for prescription drugs, and these are the drugs about which the college is concerned. It is the pharmacists' plight with which the college is concerned, not the alarm clocks and the hot water bottles and cosmetics and all the other stuff that the druggist sells in his store. I do not think that the college would seek to control or hamper that advertising in any way. But they might very well have certain regulations and responsibilities with respect to the advertising of prescription drugs.

The recommendation that the pharmacist use the professional fee system is to elevate him to where he ought to be and to where he was always expected to have been, as a dispenser of drugs, rather than a retailer or pill peddler; as he has been commonly called, and wrongly called.

I think this is the intention. I think having some knowledge of the price of drugs could redound to the benefit of the consumer in a great many cases, particularly in these days of the sophisticated and somewhat exotic drugs that we have to use in the treatment of the ill.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, I do not think that the elimination of legitimate competition will redound to the benefit of the consumer. It may be a little paradoxical that I, a socialist, should be trying to put that elementary point across to people who profess to believe in private enterprise; but I do not think it is inconsistent with either of our philosophies, and I do not think that the elimination of competition is going to redound to the benefit of the consumer.

I do not want—obviously it would be pointless to try to push the hon. Minister into making what he thinks would be a snap judgment. When I heard his reservation I was motivated to get up again because his reservation relates to what is the whole point at issue. That point is that under the policy statement of the college it will be unprofessional conduct, I take it, for a pharmacist to associate his name with an advertisement relating to the price of goods. That is the way I understand it. It is not a matter of advertising the price of his professional services, which I think all professions frown upon, but it is a matter of advertising the price of goods.

I think, Mr. Chairman—and we have to face facts—that we cannot draw an exact analogy between pharmacy and such professions as medicine and law. Doctors and lawyers are selling, almost exclusively, their services. There may be some other small items for which they charge, but mainly they are charging fees for professional services. This is not true, and in the nature of things cannot be true, in pharmacy.

The main item, in most cases, is going to be the products sold. I submit to this House that it is illegitimate to accept the line of argument coming from the college of pharmacy that they should be put on the same basis as the other professions; they cannot, in the nature of things. They are essentially selling a product, and in addition they are providing a professional service which in most cases is the smaller part of the total cost.

For whatever reason, there are some pharmacists, qualified men, just as qualified as the others, who have found that they can sell those products at a lower price than some of the others are doing. Of course the college of pharmacy cannot stop them from doing that without getting into trouble with the restrictive trade practices commission; so what it is now trying to do is to say that these people who can sell at lower prices will not be permitted, without running the risk of being charged with unprofessional conduct, to tell anybody that they are willing to sell at less than an accepted price.

As far as I know, there is no large-scale advertising of prescription drugs, but there is some advertising. I know of one organization, for example, which specializes in drugs for long-term treatment, that will send circulars to various associations, associations of old age pensioners and that sort of thing, telling them that certain products that those people frequently use, and some have to use over long periods of time, are available at certain prices for certain quantities.

It may be that the hon. member for Perth makes them available at exactly the same price, I do not know. The point is that unless the old age pensioner or other persons on long-term treatment knows that he can get them at this lower price, what is the value of having them available?

This is the point; I hope the hon. Minister will take another look at this, not make a snap decision but take another look and face the fact. We are dealing with a product, and a product that is very expensive in many cases. We cannot treat it as if it was nothing but a professional fee. I would say that there should be all reasonable opportunity for competition in the sale of these products. I hope the hon. Minister will consider the matter further.

However, sir, if he considers that it is unprofessional conduct for a pharmacist to advertise a certain product he has for sale at a certain price, then I am afraid that exactly the danger I am afraid of will take place; that it will be no time at all until the college of pharmacy will have its inspectors down the necks of anybody who dares to sell at a price lower than it, in its wisdom, considers appropriate—using its disciplinary powers to badger and harry them until they give up the practice; a practice, I may say, that has been beneficial to the public up to now and will continue to be beneficial if it continues to exist.

Mr. L. Letherby (Simcoe East): What would you do about Honest Ed's?

Mr. J. B. Trotter (Parkdale): Mr. Chairman, I just want to bring up that very matter now because I do not know whether the hon. Minister is aware of it or not—there is a good possibility of using this Act before the House and getting around a legal test case that took place about 1959 or 1960. The college of pharmacy, by using its disciplinary authority, tried to stop a druggist from going into the business of what is now known as Honest Ed's pharmacy—alleging that all kinds of things would take place; that the public would not be properly served.

Now, experience has proved that this has been a very good pharmacy; it bases its whole business on volume, not on service. It does not supply the service that the local druggist supplies, which I go to. But if you have the time, and if you are buying expensive drugs, they do supply this service. This annoys many of the members of the college of pharmacy and I say that if they are given the power of controlling prices—and I am glad to hear that the hon. Minister has said that they cannot control prices, I wish it was spelled out—I hope if a case ever comes before the courts that Hansard is allowed to be read in court by the judge in order to cope with what the hon. Minister has had to say.

Even stopping advertising is another way of controlling prices, simply because an outfit like Honest Ed's, or any discount house, bases its sales on volume. Instead of getting 40 per cent profit on the volume, they get only 25 per cent. It is a perfectly legitimate business transaction they carry on. They supply a perfectly good product. Despite all the efforts on the part of the college of pharmacy to stop Honest Ed's, the pharmacy college did not succeed in that case because the individual who wanted to make a change in the selling of drugs had the determination and the financial backing to face this situation in the courts. It was a very expensive litigation, and it was not based on the fact that the man had done anything illegally, but on the fact that he was said to be unethical. Now what does the term "unethical" mean?

I wonder if, by passing this legislation, Mr. Chairman, we are not going to at some future date put some businessman—let us face it, sir, a druggist is also a businessman—to a great deal of expense in order to carry on a perfectly legitimate operation. There is no doubt that these discount drug houses have supplied to many citizens in this province high-grade drugs, trade-name drugs if you will—not just generic drugs but trade-name drugs—at a much lower price. For those people who do not have the money and who do have the time to go down to these various discount centres where you can get these drugs, we are putting the consumer at a real disadvantage.

I do not think—if this bill was never passed—you would harm the local druggist whom we all know so well, because the local druggist makes his living because of his contact in the community; because of the service he gives. But again, this is a deliberate aim at those people who sell the discount drugs. Again I say, these drugs are from the standard manufacturers—the trade-name manufacturers—and it is the matter of selling drugs that the college of pharmacy is trying to attack. I wish that the hon. Minister would take this bill back and reconsider the effects it has, or put into it certain provisions to say that the individual druggist or discount house is allowed to sell at the price that it deems wise and that it be allowed to advertise. After all, all you have to do is look at Honest Ed's ads; and obviously they do advertise. I think that this bill could stop that and this is what the college of pharmacy is trying to do; to get around the law as determined in our courts in about 1959.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Mr. Chairman, I think the hon. member has completely drifted away from this bill altogether. This amendment is asking to give the college the right to subpoena witnesses who can then be forced to appear before the disciplinary committee and give evidence. It gives them the right to take testimony under oath, and it also gives them a legal basis by which to apportion costs against those found charged and convicted before the disciplinary committee. But there is nothing in this amendment at all that has any reference to price control, price setting or price cutting. This report of a committee set up by the council is a recommendation. I do not know if it is a recommendation of the committee to council, or if it is a recommendation of the council.

Mr. Bryden: The recommendation was adopted.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: The recommendation was adopted by the council, but I have no knowledge of it being made into a law of the council or a ruling principle of the council to its members. There is nothing in this amendment that gives the college any right to set or control or forbid price cutting.

THE CHILD WELFARE ACT, 1965

House in committee on Bill No. 119, The Child Welfare Act.

Section 1 agreed to.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, before we proceed to the detailed consideration of this lengthy and highly important bill, I would like to make one or two comments—generally with regard to the bill. I am not—before you raise your gavel, Mr. Chairman—going to try to discuss the bill in principle at this stage; it has already been well discussed in principle. But I would like to call the attention of the House to the number of symbols indicating changes made in the bill in the standing committee. I think it is a tribute to the standing committee that considered this bill, and also to the hon. Minister of Public Welfare (Mr. Cecile) that he was prepared to enter the standing committee with an open mind, and to accept changes where he was convinced on the basis of argument that they were in order.

But I would say of the committee that it demonstrated the value of this type of standing committee with this type of legislation. Interested parties from the welfare professions testified before the committee. They made representations to it from time to time, both orally and in writing; members of the committee made many representations to the hon. Minister. I will say that the hon. Minister approached all these matters with an open mind, prepared to be convinced where arguments were sound.

He was not convinced in all cases where we thought he should have been, but, as you can see, he did accept a substantial number of proposals for change in the bill both in the committee and in discussions with the representatives of the profession. He is to be commended for that. I think the bill is now considerably improved as a result, over what it was when it was brought before us at the second reading stage. There are still some further improvements that we in this group would like to see made but we will deal with those when we come to the appropriate sections, Mr. Chairman.

Sections 2 to 6, inclusive, agreed to.

On section 7:

Mr. S. Lewis (Scarborough West): Mr. Chairman, excuse me—I have been handed a further amended copy of this bill. Is that subsequent to the last copy we have in the book?

Mr. Bryden: Amended by the committee.

Mr. S. Lewis: On this section, Mr. Chairman, the hon. Minister will anticipate the point which I am about to raise. It is a fairly simple point: A good part of the intent of this bill—and I agree with my hon. colleague from Woodbine that it has been admirably amended by the hon. Minister—a good part of the admirable intention will be defeated by maintaining the present structure of organization and administration through the province, of child welfare.

The hon. Minister now has before the House, the second reading of a bill in which this government, for the first time in its history, will finance the administration of larger units for welfare matters in the province of Ontario. That is a fairly major step forward. I suppose it relates rather strongly to the public assistance programme being contemplated by the federal government. But if, in fact, in the field of general welfare the government is prepared to move, then I strongly suggest that it should also be prepared to move in child welfare. Whether this move is in the direction of the county unit or in the direction of regional welfare units, or for that matter in any of the alternatives held out by the original advisory committee to the Minister on child welfare—whatever the mechanism—some alternative must be found. The overlapping of children's aid societies, the inequality of municipal resources, the inability of units in this province to function adequately where children are concerned, should not be permitted.

It should not be permitted, particularly when the hon. Minister prides himself on a bill of this quite meaningful substance. And no one can deny its important content. So I urge strongly on the hon. Minister that he consider amending this section in the very near future. I appreciate that it will take a major amendment and I hope it will be perhaps coincident with his bringing down those ever-mysterious, ever-unreachable regulations.

Section 7 agreed to.

Sections 8 to 11, inclusive, agreed to.

On section 12:

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, you are moving along rather rapidly here and—

Mr. Chairman: I recognize the member for Ottawa East.

Mr. H. S. Racine (Ottawa East): Mr. Chairman, on section 12, I would like to move an amendment deleting section 1(a), which reads "40 per cent of the part of the approved estimates referable to operating costs other than operating costs referred to in clause (b)." I would like to remove that section (a) so that section 1 would read:

100 per cent of the part of the approved estimates referable to operating costs for the care and maintenance of the children of unmarried mothers.

Mr. Chairman: I would have to rule that amendment out of order.

Mr. Bryden: Are you sure?

Mr. Chairman: Rule 49: "No motion or amendment, the subject matter of which has been decided upon, can be again proposed during the same session."

Mr. Bryden: The idea is a good one.

Mr. A. E. Thompson (Leader of the Opposition): The idea was good.

Mr. Trotter: Mr. Chairman, before we pass by this section I would once again like to protest as much as I can that this is one of the essential weaknesses in this bill—this particular section—because, when you call upon the municipalities to provide sixty per cent of the moneys—and let us bear in mind that the municipalities have a far narrower tax base than we have here in the province as a whole—you are asking municipalities who can ill afford it to initiate the changes that are most important.

The fact is that the changes that are desired in this bill are simply not going to be brought about at the rate at which they are needed because the municipalities do not have the funds. We in this province are far better equipped to administer and to plan here in the provincial headquarters at Queen's Park the necessary changes that are needed; because, looking at the situation as a whole, the province not only has the funds and the means of obtaining the funds to institute such a programme and such changes as are contemplated under this Act, but they have certainly more personnel than most of the children's aid societies throughout the province and most of the municipalities, Mr. Chairman.

There are exceptions. It is true that the larger centres in Ontario are in some cases well equipped. But, looking at the province as a whole, the funds should come from the province of Ontario and in conclusion I would like to say once again 100 per cent of the responsibility to carry out this Act in financial matters should rest with the province of Ontario. In this way a great deal of the financial burden is taken off the municipalities and also there is a much more efficient administration of The Child Welfare Act.

Mr. S. Lewis: Mr. Chairman, I would simply like to point out to the House, though it is probably evident to them already, that this section 12, as it presently stands, contradicts every representation that was made to the hon. Minister in respect of this Act, and contradicts every other facet of policy presently operative within his own department. For the members of the House, let me briefly summarize: When the advisory committee presented its report to the Minister, it recommended that the province of Ontario should pay a minimum of 50 per cent of the total cost: an absolute minimum. Failing that, the advisory committee went one step further. It said that even if the province could not pay a minimum of 50 per cent it should take into account the varying financial resources of the municipalities right across the province. It should not foolishly assume that there was the same absolute ability to pay in northern Ontario as in Metropolitan Toronto, and that some emphasis should be given to the variation of financial resources, geography, and understanding of child welfare through past experience.

Mr. Chairman, when the Ontario welfare council came to the hon. Minister after his advisory committee had reported, before the bill was drafted, they said that the municipal contribution should be a nominal one—and they used that word. By “nominal” they implied that it should not be more than 20 per cent of the total cost. They used an analogy, if memory serves me, with general welfare assistance, where indeed the municipal contribution is only 20 per cent.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, I would point out that there is not another single piece of legislation in the hon. Minister's entire department, from the homes for the aged to The Children's Institutions Act, to mother's allowance, to any piece of legislation one can recall, where as heavy an onus as this is placed on the municipality—not one! The highest it ever reaches is 50 per cent. Yet, in the area of child welfare the hon. Minister in his wisdom and the Treasury board in theirs have decided to place the maximum responsibility on municipalities—municipalities which have shown for the last decade that they are unable to fulfill such an obligation.

I say to the hon. Minister, that what troubles me therefore, about section 12, is not only the patent injustice in the burden that it puts on the municipalities and because of the inability of some of them to respond, not only the patent injustice of the province refusing to take all or a large measure of the responsibility for child welfare, but because it negates all the recommendations made to the hon. Minister and all the conduct of legislation in his own department. That is a feat of inconsistency not given to many Ministers of the Crown and I heartily hope that he will therefore consider an amendment in the future.

Mr. Chairman: Was the member for Woodbine speaking on section 12?

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, it is the same section that I wish to discuss. I can hardly argue with your ruling that the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Ottawa East, when moved by a private member, is out of order.

Nevertheless, it was a very good idea, and my only regret is that the hon. Minister has not seen fit to bring in such an amendment since from him, in his exalted status, it would have been in order.

The purpose of the amendment, as I heard it when the hon. member for Ottawa East read it, was simply to make the costs of the administration of this Act entirely a provincial responsibility.

Mr. Chairman: That would be out of order anyway.

Mr. Bryden: It would not be out of order, I think, if moved by a Minister; however, we do not need to discuss the matter because it does not look as if the hon. Minister is anxious to get on his feet in order to move such an amendment.

Mr. S. Lewis: Suppose the hon. Minister does?

Mr. Bryden: We would be prepared to accept it as being in order if the hon. Minister would do so, Mr. Chairman. I suspect the trouble may be with his Treasury board colleagues who so often adopt a penny wise and pound foolish attitude.

The total expenditure here, or the total charge on the provincial Treasury, if the government took over the entire cost of providing for children covered by the Act, would no doubt be significant, but it certainly would not break the government. Yet the method that the government insists on maintaining, and antiquated method, is going to militate seriously against effective administration of what is otherwise, in most respects, an excellent Act.

We have talked a great deal in this House, and its committees, and when I say “we” I mean just about everybody, about local autonomy. Frankly, Mr. Chairman, the more I see of the legislation the government places before us, the more I am convinced that it does not give a hoot about local autonomy. It talks about local autonomy and tortures and destroys it at almost every turn.

Just consider what it is doing here. It has before us legislation which gives the municipalities no discretion of any kind whatever.

They cannot do a solitary thing under this Act to change policy in the slightest degree. I am not saying they should be able to, but that is the effect of the bill. This legislation is simply not a matter on which the municipalities have any discretion, and yet they are soaked for 60 per cent of the costs.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, that it is a fundamental principle of democratic government that a government body should pay for those matters on which it legislates and should not have to pay for matters on which it does not legislate. But we, in this House, in our wisdom, are being asked to pass a bill that imposes obligations on the municipalities, financial obligations, and we give them no say at all in the matter. They cannot affect the policy, that is determined by other people. They just have to pay up when the time comes.

I suggest that this is not only unsound as a principle of government, Mr. Chairman, it also is calculated to create resistance on the part of the municipalities. They would be more than human if they did not resent a financial obligation imposed upon them without any exercise of discretion on their part. What is the likely result of their resentment? They will, as far as possible, use every effort to avoid having to pay the money; or at any rate they will use every method—and after all there are methods available in the Act as there have to be—they will use every possible method to restrict the amount of money they have to pay. Why should they be expected to develop a constructive attitude toward a matter for which they have no policy responsibility? Therefore, they will try to save money. What else? They are worried about the mill rate just as every level of government is worried about the tax rate, especially as the day approaches when the wrath of the electorate must once again be faced. The municipalities will fight like anything to hold down costs under this Act because they are not given the opportunity, much less the encouragement to develop a positive policy attitude towards it.

We do not have to rely on speculation to arrive at that conclusion. One just has to look at the past year's record of the Metropolitan Toronto council with regard to matters of children's welfare to realize that even the council of the largest municipality in Ontario—and, indeed, the largest in Canada—takes a penny-pinching attitude when it comes to children's welfare. The council cut down the appropriation for the family court because the family court wanted to provide what I think the council regarded as frills, namely, services for the benefit of children, to prevent children from getting into court in the first place. This is the negative attitude which municipalities take, even the largest municipality. This is just a charge on their mill rate! And yet we continue with this principle in the legislation which is now before us.

I suggest to the hon. Minister that by doing so he will greatly reduce the effectiveness of a very good Act. As the hon. member for Scarborough West has pointed out, everybody who appeared before the committee—and indeed, I suspect, even possibly a majority of the members of the committee—thought that the government should take over, if not the entire cost at this stage, at least the lion's share of it. For some reason or other the hon. Minister was not willing to give any consideration to this proposal at all. I think he said that it was simply a matter of government policy and he was not prepared to consider it any further. So I suppose that, if it is a firm decision by the government that they are going to load most of the costs that accrue under this bill, on to the municipalities, there is nothing much we can do about it.

I would hope, however, that the hon. Minister would really go to work on his hon. colleagues and convince them of the folly of the position they have now taken in the interests of economy. They are destroying economy, they are militating against the best operation of a good piece of legislation that would save this province millions of dollars in the long run, if it operated properly. It would save money in terms of avoiding situations where people have to go to penal institutions or mental institutions. If we can get a proper child welfare policy operating, we can avoid much of that necessity in the future and thereby save ourselves a great deal of money. But the government apparently looks at the few nickels it can save today without considering the dollars it is going to have to pay tomorrow. It once again takes its penny-pinching attitude of throwing costs on the municipalities, which do not legitimately belong there.

The whole history of this country in the last 100 years has been to relieve municipalities of responsibilities for welfare, at any rate of those that involve costs. In the 19th century it was considered that if any level of government had any responsibility in this field at all, it was the municipal level. It was really considered that no level of government had much responsibility, but, if any level had, it was the municipal level—that was the 19th century view. Gradually we have seen over the years that that is an impossible view. Slowly the higher levels of government, both federal and provincial, have been taking over costs relating to welfare. But, here, in this otherwise forward-looking Act, we still cling to an ancient, antiquated 19th century conception. It is a pity that the bill is marred in this way. I am afraid that the defect in section 12 is not just a minor defect, it will have unfortunate consequences in the total effectiveness of the bill.

Mr. Chairman: Shall section 12 stand as part of the bill?

Mr. G. Bukator (Niagara Falls): Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask a question of the hon. Minister. I do not get on my feet very often of late, I am under the doctor's care with three different kinds of pills for which I have to pay. I find with all the coverage I have I do not have coverage I need for pills.

However, I have been in municipal affairs, as you know, Mr. Chairman, for 12 years. There must be good reason for the government taking this stand. I was wondering whether the hon. Minister would care to explain section 12 at this time and tell us why they insist on the board paying 60 per cent?

Hon. L. P. Cecile (Minister of Public Welfare): Mr. Chairman, I was going to comment on this, I am sure that the government is not taking an entirely negative position.

Before, as you will appreciate, the municipalities paid 60 per cent of all costs of protection and prevention services, except that we would pay $100 for each employee they had for that purpose. Now we participate in the whole picture, not only the fact of our giving $100 per employee for prevention and protection services. On top of this we are bearing the entire cost for children of unmarried mothers, which is also quite a large factor. I can assure you that to be very honest with myself, I could not say I am completely satisfied with the way it is now or that this is the way we intend it to be in the future. We on this side would like to be progressive, and I am sure that we will be progressive in this particular matter. But, after all, I think we have made quite a large step forward helping the municipalities in this particular matter. I hope, and I would like to say this now, that this will not—although some people might think so—make the fact that the children's aid society or its work will be a forgotten thing by all united appeals. I hope it still will be considered to be held in this respect, and that this particular legislation will not be a means to duck out of any responsibility.

I make this statement in all sincerity. I appreciate the words that were expressed by the hon. members and I can see their point, but at the same time, as I say, you must go along with what you are able to do at the present time; and this has been established as the percentages that were possible at this time. On top of this I would not like the idea—if it should ever get to there—of having the 100 per cent feature in it for the simple reason that, when that happens, I am sure the children's aid societies would disappear. I would not like this to happen because they have served this province for many long years, over 70 years, and have done so well; and we hope to have them with us for a long time to come. I would like to also participate in the responsibilities that there were before and that there will be under this Act.

Mr. Chairman, I do not want to leave the impression that we have lagged behind as badly as would seem to be by the hon. members opposite who have spoken. We have made a large step; a step which will represent anywhere in the neighbourhood of between $2 million to $4 million more than before, and $2 million to $4 million less to the others. But that doesn't mean to say that we have to look to the experience that lies ahead. I am sure that I can assure this House, and the hon. members here, Mr. Chairman, that as far as I am concerned we will be very glad to look at the progress of this Act, and I can assure them that this is not the last word.

Mr. Bukator: Mr. Chairman, early in the hon. Minister's comments he mentioned that they would, I think, "duck out" of the responsibilities and that he did not want that to happen. But I am sure the hon. Minister did not mean it quite the way he said it in making reference to the children's aid societies. As I know them, they do an excellent job together with the united appeal. As the hon. Minister and everybody in the House knows, the personnel who make up the organization are excellent people. The united appeal does a good job too, and I am sure the hon. Minister must admit that it is that way rather than the statement that he would "duck out" of the responsibilities. These are civic-minded people who do this. I am just trying to protect the hon. Minister because I thought he might be in for a rough time a little later on in the day. I was just putting a little oil on the troubled waters. The children's aid society, as everyone knows, does an excellent job, and by asking it to contribute the 60 per cent the united appeal also get behind it and then they know of the activity and where the responsibility lies and what is necessary for the people. That is the reason for leaving this in, as I gather.

Hon. Mr. Cecile: Mr. Chairman, I do not know if I understood my friend very well. Before this Act the 60 per cent was paid by the children's aid society, who collected from the municipalities and also had part of that share, I suppose, from the united appeal. Now, the united appeal is not asked to contribute anything as far as this legislation goes. It will be shared 40 per cent by the province on the whole programme—not only on part, but on the whole programme—plus taking over all the responsibilities of children of unmarried mothers; then the 60 per cent balance is to be paid by the municipality. But what I meant to say a moment ago is that, because of the fact of these percentages being arrived at, I hope the united appeal will not opt out—if I may use that expression—on the fact of helping the society in its work. I am quite sure that it will be very useful, and I daresay it is a very good piece of advertising for them also. I hope they will stay with the programme as they have in the past.

Mr. F. Young (Yorkview): Mr. Chairman, I am glad to hear the hon. Minister say that he hopes that more progressive legislation on this might come at a later time, because this seems to be not as progressive as it certainly ought to be. Now, in legislation of this kind—and this bill is a good bill by and large, I think there is real progress being made here—the child and his needs ought to be at the very forefront of our thinking. But just as soon as we put a dollar toll gate between the child and the needs of that child, then we are running into real difficulty.

In most municipalities budgets are set early in the year, and it might well be that many municipalities will be inclined to say, well, over this year of 1965 we will need $5,000, $10,000 or $15,000 for this kind of welfare work, and so we put it in the budget. But my guess is, and my experience with municipal government would lead me to believe, that most municipalities will set aside a minimum budget of this nature. Then, as cases may flow in at larger numbers later in the year, there will be real trouble in meeting the budget. And this means that there may be war brewing between the children's aid society and the municipality, because the children's aid society will see a child who needs special care and it will have one eye toward the municipal treasurer and the other eye to the child's needs. So that child may just not become the ward of a children's aid society; it may not get the proper care it needs because of the impossibility of that children's aid society to collect its 60 per cent of the expenses. And here is real trouble building up for this legislation and for the children.

In most of our welfare activities the province has been accustomed to paying 80 per cent and the municipality 20 per cent. The municipalities are used to this fact, and I see no reason why at least the same standard should not be set for these needy children as for the other welfare cases within the municipality. I would urge the hon. Minister, in looking at this legislation, that this figure of 80 per cent should be the absolute minimum as far as the province is concerned; in other words, double the 40 per cent that is being envisaged here. In this way most municipalities will be able to handle the situation. When I look at almost a thousand municipalities in this prosperous province and see the financial weakness of so many of them, I realize that they are just not going to be able to handle this 60 per cent that they are required to do. So if the province would raise this to 80, I think we could see a practical solution to this problem and a solution which would again put the needs of that child in the centre of a legislation where it ought to be.

Mr. Racine: Mr. Chairman, following the remarks of the hon. member for Yorkview, I have had considerable experience in children's aid society work. For instance, I know that in the Ottawa area the money for preventive services has been supplied by the Ottawa community chest and later on by the united fund. The children's aid society of Ottawa and Carleton county, I think, had some $150,000 coming from those sources and a small subsidy from the municipalities. Just to give you an idea of the subsidies of municipalities for preventive services: The city of Ottawa gave a grant of $12,000, the county of Carleton gave $2,000, and the city of Eastview gave $1,000 for preventive services.

Some of the hon. members would say: "That was peanuts. There should have been available to the children's aid society of Ottawa some $350,000 or $400,000 for preventive services." According to this new Act, possibly the children's aid society of Ottawa will put in its budget this sum of $350,000 or $400,000. This will be quite a hardship on some of the municipalities because from a small grant, which they paid on a voluntary basis in the past, they will be compelled by the legislation to provide a considerable amount of money. Because, mind you, of the moneys spent, more than $110,000 came from the Ottawa community chest, which left the municipality with approximately one-tenth of what was needed for preventive services.

I would like to ask one question of the hon. Minister. Have any municipalities protested about this division? Have there been any letters from various municipalities through the province asking that they be relieved of this part of the cost of the children's aid society in their municipality?

Hon. Mr. Cecile: Mr. Chairman, the answer, a very short one, is, no.

Mr. Racine: No? No municipality has made any representation?

Hon. Mr. Cecile: Not that I am aware of.

Mr. Racine: I am very surprised.

Mr. Bryden: They do not know about this section. Wait till they find out.

Mr. Chairman: Shall section 12 stand as part of the bill?

Sections 12 to 31, inclusive, agreed to.

On section 32:

Hon. Mr. Cecile moves that subsection 1 of section 32 of the bill be amended by striking out the words "the local director of" in the sixth and seventh lines.

Hon. Mr. Cecile: I make the same motion with respect to section 33. Mr. Chairman. The amendments give the society the responsibility for exercising the powers and duties and obligations of guardianship in respect of wards. The society may delegate any of these to "the local director of" the section 4.

Mr. Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, it is a little difficult to follow. I wonder if the hon. Minister would explain just what he has in mind in this amendment.

Hon. Mr. Cecile: The Act, as you will note, Mr. Chairman, reads—if I may just use the last two lines:

Section 32. (1) The Crown has and shall assume all the rights and responsibilities of a legal guardian of its wards for the purpose of their care, custody and control; and the powers, duties and obligations of the Crown in respect of the wards of the Crown, other than those assigned to the director by this Act, may be exercised and discharged by the local director of the children's aid society having the care of the ward.

The objection to that was that it gave too wide powers to the local director, who should really be getting the powers from the society itself. That is provided for in section 4, that is why it was struck out.

Amendment agreed to.

Section 32, as amended, agreed to.

Hon. Mr. Cecile moves that the words "local director of" in the first line of subsection 1 of section 33, be struck out.

Amendment agreed to.

Section 33, as amended, agreed to.

Section 34 agreed to.

Hon. Mr. Cecile moves that section 35 of the bill be deleted.

Hon. Mr. Cecile: The explanation, Mr. Chairman, is that the section is not necessary in view of the estimate system of financing the operations of children's aid societies.

Motion agreed to; section 35 deleted.

Sections 35, formerly 36, to section 38, now 37, inclusive, agreed to.

Mr. Trotter: Mr. Chairman, on this section 38 now section 37, I would like to make a few remarks. I am glad to see that there has been some improvement in the legislation pertaining to the adoption of children, having to do with their religious faith. But because this bill has had a number of amendments, and all of them have been improvements, I would like to suggest one more amendment.

I think this bill should be more definite as to the problem of a child's religion—not only the child's religion but that having to do with the adopting parents.

Hon. Mr. Cecile: Mr. Chairman, I might point out to my hon. friend that this section is not the adopting section, it is foster care.

Mr. Trotter: Foster care? Very well, foster parents, as you will, is all right. I would like to make one suggestion as regard to this. For example, in subsection 6, it says: "Where a children's aid society, (a) is unable to place a child in a suitable foster home within a reasonable time—" We do not know what a reasonable time is and I think that there should be no doubt left in the mind of the public or in the mind of the children's aid society that this problem of religion or lack of religion should not interfere with putting a child out to a foster home.

We have had instances just recently when people who have been attempting to become citizens of Canada, have been questioned as to their being agnostics. There are many people who would probably make very good parents and foster parents, and make very good citizens but who have no prescribed religious faith. They say they are agnostics. We may all prefer that somebody have a definite prescribed religious faith, but in this day and age there are a great many people who may not even use the term "agnostic" but who are not identified with any particular religious faith. They are good citizens, they could make very good parents.

I would like to see added to this section, subsection 6(c), to read:

In no case shall a child be denied a good home because of the religion or non-religion of the foster parents.

I would therefore submit that this be added. That would be in the new section 37, subsection 6(c).

Mr. Chairman: It has been moved that section 38 be amended by adding:

Subsection 6(c). In no case shall a child be denied a good home because of the religion or non-religion of the foster parents.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, I presume that if this amendment carries, as I think it should, the legislative counsel will clear up any little problems in drafting that may arise.

I do not quite see where a clause (c) can go in, but the principle is, I think, a sound principle. I believe from the discussion in the committee, that it is already envisaged in the bill as it now stands that this principle will apply. There are certain provisions attributing certain religious beliefs to children under certain circumstances—if their father is of one faith, the child will normally assume the same faith, and so on. All that is in there, but then section 38—or section 37, as it now stands—is intended to provide that where a child cannot be placed in a foster home of the same religious faith as that attributed to him, he can be placed anywhere he will find a good home. I believe that is the intention.

I do not think, however, that it hurts a bit to spell it right out, as the hon. member for Parkdale proposes, that there can be placements of an interfaith nature. I think it is rather sound to make it quite clear that the question of religious faith attributed to the child must not prevent him from getting a good home. I think this is quite desirable, although the hon. Minister could conceivably argue that the amendment is redundant.

I have difficulty following the thinking that says a six-day-old baby has a certain religious faith. I do not know how that is possible, but perhaps that is merely because of my lack of training in theology. I think that what is basically important is the welfare of the child, not the welfare of religious organizations. I regret seeing religious organizations fighting over children as they have done for all too long in this country and in other countries. I would be very happy to support the principle of the amendment as proposed by the hon. member for Parkdale.

I hope, indeed, that the hon. Minister will accept it because I think he intended that the section, as re-enacted, will actually recognize the principle incorporated in the hon. member's amendment. Therefore there is no harm in having that principle spelled.

Hon. Mr. Cecile: My hon. friend stated a moment ago that I would use the word "redundant," well, I suppose I could use that, but at the same time I see no reason why it would enhance or better the bill at all by using that section. The court is given complete and entire discretion to deal with it, if nobody else can agree in dealing with it, regardless of the children's aid society or the people in the foster home.

After all, placement to a foster home is made by the children's aid society. I do not like to defeat the purpose of the section as such, because it clearly states there that one children's aid society will place a certain child having a certain religious faith in a particular foster home and vice versa.

Now, if I use this, am I not defeating the whole purpose of that section? Furthermore, it seems to me that the words "reasonable time" are used. Generally speaking, I am quite sure a "reasonable time" can be decided upon by the society itself. If anybody thinks that they are not reasonable and are temporizing, it can be brought up by anyone before a court of justice or a court of law.

I would like to say, Mr. Chairman, that I do not want to encourage any religious discussion here in the House, but there is definitely, as far as I am concerned, a definite demarcation as between faiths. I think this is why this has been brought about, and I am sure that we want to recognize everyone in this particular respect.

The general principle is the same, but the way of acting in dealing with this is possibly difficult for one side to understand; but on the other side it is not so difficult. I can assure you that all are very concerned with this—whether of the Jewish faith or the Protestant faith or the Catholic faith. These denominations are very set in their views and I do not see why we, as a Legislature, should disarrange that at all. I think the words “reasonable time” are quite proper. I would not like to see anything brought into this section to defeat the main idea as it is stated in section 37, which was formerly section 38.

Mr. Chairman: As I see it, the amendment is in order, although I do not see where it is necessary at all.

All those in favour of the amendment, say aye.

All those contrary?

In my opinion the nays have it.

Call in the members.

All in favour of the amendment, please stand.

All opposed to the amendment, please stand.

Clerk of the House: Mr. Chairman, the ayes are 22, the nays 45.

Mr. Chairman: I declare the amendment lost.

Sections 37 to 69, inclusive, formerly sections 38 to 70, inclusive, agreed to.

On section 71:

Mr. S. Lewis: On section 71: whereas I am in concurrence with the chair and the hon. Minister that in one sense—although not sufficient to vote against it—the government was right in feeling that the previous amendment was redundant with respect to the religion of the adopting foster parents in sections 38 and 39. I think that the amendment which I propose to move will not in fact be redundant of any part of this bill. In fact, it will be, I hope, an important addition to this bill.

The amendment, which will relate to no order being denied on grounds of religion, Mr. Chairman, will be, as those of us who are on the standing committee on education, health and welfare know, parallel to that moved in the committee by the Conservative hon. member for Lakeshore (Mr. Eagleson).

I want to take a moment, Mr. Chairman, and give credit where credit is due to that hon. member for Lakeshore. He has fought a bold and good fight in this Legislature, and he has fought it honourably.

In the inexplicable manoeuvring behind the scenes, unfortunately, for whatever reason, this particular amendment is not forthcoming from the government. But I think that to do justice to the speeches and the work that has been done in this Legislature by the hon. member for Lakeshore, I shall ultimately move my amendment in the express wording that he used.

In fact, Mr. Chairman, I want to suggest to this House that if that amendment had not been withdrawn—accidentally withdrawn, unsuspectingly withdrawn—in the standing committee on education, health and welfare, it would have passed. I offer my personal feelings on that, but I suspect it would have passed and I honestly suspect, Mr. Chairman, that it would have passed with the majority of the Conservative members in that standing committee voting in favour of it. It was a good amendment, truly drafted and valid to its point.

In fact, Mr. Chairman, I may say that if it behooves the hon. Prime Minister to allow a free vote on this amendment in the Legislature at this time, it is my strong feeling that the amendment would pass and pass with support from all political parties. I want to suggest, Mr. Chairman, that it is time we spelled out our acceptance of interfaith adoption in the best welfare of the child, with clarity and without reservation. We must reject the bogeys and the vested interests of yesteryear, which have so bedevilled this issue in the public eye, so that it remains, whatever the hon. Minister may suggest, confused and muddled. I suggest, Mr. Chairman, to this Legislature, that we have reached the point of maturity where a moral imperative demands that we be unequivocal on the question of no order being denied on religious grounds.

Like the hon. member for Parkdale, I think that the effect of sections 38 and 39 of this Act, working in concert, can result in interfaith adoption. The hon. Minister will correct me if I am wrong, but I believe that that, in effect, parallels the Lamb case. That is in fact what happened. The Lamb case was a judicial expression of sections 38 and 39, acting in concert. It was a judicial expression. I would have wished that the same expression would have come from this government, from the Legislature, indeed from outside interests. There is in the Osgoode Hall Law Journal, the issue of April, 1964, a fascinating symposium on interfaith adoption in which one Darren Michael makes the following observation:

The fresh breezes of ecumenicity have evidently not achieved a velocity sufficient to permit cross-faith adoption where it is felt that the best interest of the child would indicate its desirability.

The hon. Minister in committee—and he can again correct me if I am wrong—has argued that the Lamb case prevails—that there is no need for putting in an amending phrase that no order shall be denied on grounds of religion, because the Lamb case is the rule of the land and will ever after prevail.

I want to suggest strongly to the hon. Minister that the Lamb case is a temporary judgment. It can go either way—it could have been appealed or we can have an entirely different judgment in the future. It is not in fact an immutable decision. In truth, Mr. Chairman, the decision by Judge Little in the Lamb case was given precisely because he did not know the intent of the Legislature in respect to interfaith adoption. Thus a judge was put in the position of having to speculate upon that intent.

I hope I do not do my judicial friends damage by the words I use—my training is not as skilled as theirs—but Judge Little suggested that the religious factor spelled out in part 2 of this bill, did not in fact apply to part 4. And he therefore said and I quote from his decision:

This section refers only to the placing of children in foster care and makes no reference to adoption—that is the section in part 2 of the bill.

One cannot infer that the requirement regarding religion therein set forth should be applied to part 4 of the Act where no reference to religion is made. It is clear that the Legislature did not intend any such limitation in adoptions, otherwise it would have said so.

The question that, therefore, I think, asks of the legal process, Mr. Chairman, is whether Judge Little's observation that the Legislature did not intend any such limitation in adoption, would stand up in future cases. I want to read into the record of this House one or two observations made by other eminent legal authorities on the intent of the Legislature. I recall the observation of Lord Watson in Solomon vs. Solomon and Company:

"Intention of the Legislature" is a common but very slippery phrase which, popularly understood, may signify anything from intention embodied in positive enactments to speculative opinion as to what the Legislature probably would have meant, although there has been an omission to enact it. In a court of law or equity, what the Legislature intended to be done or not to be done can only be legitimately ascertained from that which it has chosen to enact, either in express words or by reasonable and necessary intendment.

And let it be said that Mr. Willis also has spelled out the rule. I can recall it in my brief sojourn in law school, of literal rules and frivolous rules and similar rules which can be given much interpretation. So I think the fundamental fact, Mr. Chairman, is that the legislative intent is not sufficient, and that indeed a subsequent ruling can deem an entirely different legislative intent. What we have to do, therefore, is to spell out unequivocally and with literal clarity precisely what we mean.

Judge Little in his decision said that he was satisfied on all other grounds and he referred to what is in this bill, I believe, section 77, subsection (b): "That the order will be in the best interests of the child." Within that clause there waged the debate over the religious factor and the validity of interfaith adoption.

The hon. Minister has also said, and others said in the standing committee on education, health and welfare, that by putting in a specific provision we would be tying the hands of the judge. My contention is, Mr. Chairman, that Judge Little himself demonstrated manifestly that he now has to pronounce on the intent of the Legislature. We are not in fact tying a judge's hands. What we are saying, Mr. Chairman, is that all things being equal, religions should not be a factor in denying an order. Now, surely, there can be nothing with more valid and sensible and simple clarity. It by no means confines a judge, it just states without qualification, the position of this Legislature.

I strongly urge, Mr. Chairman, that the Legislature pass this amendment. I think it is important that the public know and that we know in our own minds, precisely the intent of this Act. We do not know as the Act presently stands.

In another very interesting observation from the Osgoode Hall journal, Mr. Darren Michael said, and I quote:

Having considered the terms of The Child Welfare Act and the jurisprudence of the highest courts in England, Canada and Ontario, how is it possible to say that here in Ontario in the year 1964, the religious affiliation of an infant's parents—father if legitimate, mother if illegitimate—can be a bar to the adoption of that child by any married couple who do not happen to share the same faith?

No doubt the simple answer is that it just is not done, but that is not a satisfactory answer in the absence of any clear-cut statutory directive for laying of decided cases that lay down any other alternative. It will continue to be an unsatisfactory answer until the Legislature determines to resolve the uncertainty and dubious legality of the current practice. Such a solution has indeed been suggested during the current session of the Ontario Legislature by R. A. Eagleson, the member for Lakeshore.

Mr. Chairman, I think that the weight of evidence, the nature of the Act, the feelings of this Legislature, should give free and unqualified expression as to our intent. That intent can only be expressed in precise legislative language and I urge that the moral imperative work. The feeling which I suspect reside in the minds of the hon. members of this House, should be transformed into votes. I therefore move that subsection 2 of section 71 be amended by adding thereto the following:

And no order shall be denied on grounds of religion.

Mr. Trotter: Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to dwell long on this, because I would only be repeating in principle what I said on section 38. I would like to emphasize again that religion is of the utmost importance in the upbringing of the child in modern society but at the same time we should bear in mind that there are many fine citizens who do not have the strong association with organized religion as many people did in the past. They are often fine citizens and would make good parents; and it is bearing this fact in mind, whether it be the religion or non-religion of the adopting parents, that they should be judged simply as people who would make good parents and would give a child a good home.

I know that the hon. Minister in this government has said that all this is now provided for, but still the government wavers. It wavers out of facing up to the issue. I feel that it should be spelled out in the words of the amendment of the hon. member for Scarborough West, or as I had suggested earlier in dealing with section 38.

So again I would plead, through you, Mr. Chairman, with the government and with the hon. members of this House, that we let the people of this province know exactly where we stand—that we want children who need adopting to be adopted strictly on the grounds of a good home, and not so much on the grounds of religion or lack of religion.

Mr. L. Troy (Nipissing): Mr. Chairman, I would like to say a few words. I have listened with interest to the presentations of the hon. member for Scarborough West and I regret very much that I, through circumstances that were beyond my control, I was not able to be present at the consideration of this bill before the standing committee.

There is one thing that I think is wrong when the hon. member says that all things being equal, religion should not play a part. It seems to me that all things being equal, the religion of the child should be most important. As one who is a practising member of a certain church, it is my own feeling that the important thing is the welfare of the child and I am sure that many also have that stand. So the important thing, I think, is the welfare of the child, and that is why I agree.

Mr. S. Lewis: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, so that my hon. friend will understand: I did not imply what I think he is suggesting. I said that all things being equal—that is that the adoption be deemed advisable and in the best welfare of the child, by the judge—religion as such, should not be a factor which would deny such adoption.

Mr. Racine: Mr. Chairman, I think I have stated my position in this respect in my speech in the debate on the Throne Speech, some time ago, and I am convinced, Mr. Chairman, that we are making a mountain out of a molehill on this issue, because I believe that we cannot find any statistics of people in this province of people having been denied a home because of their religious beliefs. I think I read into the record, a letter by Mr. Markle of the Catholic children's aid society of Toronto, at that time, and I think this still stands. I do not believe that this is really a problem and I think the hon. Minister will be able to tell us that, if this is not a problem, we are running into considerable problems by trying to put this type of amendment into legislation. I personally do not know how my party feels on the matter as a party, but I feel that this amendment is not necessary at all, that there is enough in the Act at the present time, to protect the religious faith of all children that have to be adopted.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, I am a little surprised at the position just enunciated by my friend from Ottawa East.

Hon. J. W. Spooner (Minister of Municipal Affairs): He is a wise man.

Mr. Bryden: The hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs says he is a wise man, but the Liberal group saw fit a few minutes ago to put before this House an amendment, which in my opinion—I think in your opinion, too, Mr. Chairman—was really unnecessary. Certainly it was unnecessary in the hon. Minister's opinion. That amendment proposed, in regard to foster homes, that where a home was not available in one religious faith, it would be available in another. I think that is already provided in the bill quite clearly, and quite specifically. The hon. member for Parkdale nevertheless saw fit to move an amendment to set it forth as a clear and definite principle and we, in this group, agreed with that approach. We saw no harm in making it clear beyond all possible doubt.

But when we come to the question of adoption, Mr. Chairman, the matter is far from clear in the bill. In fact, I am coming to the conclusion that it is being left deliberately obscure. There is no doubt that under this bill, if it becomes law, it will be possible under certain circumstances to place a child in a foster home of a different faith, but it is by no means clear, that where circumstances otherwise make it desirable, it will be possible for a judge to order an adoption of an interfaith nature.

We have heard numerous references to the Lamb case; that the Lamb case established a precedent under which, if the judge considered the other circumstances to be proper, he could order an interfaith adoption. I am not a lawyer, but in talking to lawyers my understanding is that the Lamb case is law in the district of Parry Sound and not anywhere else. It was a decision of the district court of the district of Parry Sound. As I understand it, that decision is not binding on any other court except the district court of Parry Sound and subordinate courts within that jurisdiction, that is all.

There has been no decision at a higher level that, under our statute as it now stands, interfaith adoption is possible. No one knows how the Court of Appeal of Ontario or the Supreme Court of Canada might find in such a matter. Why should we make it necessary to take the question to the court of appeal or to the supreme court? We all know that such a proceeding would take about two years and involve tremendous costs. If we are agreed that interfaith adoption is proper where in the opinion of the presiding judge that is the best way of looking after the needs of the child concerned—not to be entered upon frivolously, but no judge would enter upon it frivolously and would act only in the best interests of the child—if we believe that this is a good principle, then why do we not put it into legislation so that it will be clear to everybody on the face of the earth and so that there could not be any possible doubt about it?

Why are we holding back, why are we equivocating on the matter? Why are we not willing to come out and say that this is the policy of the province of Ontario?

The hon. member for Scarborough West mentioned that when this matter was before the standing committee on—I have forgotten the exact name of that committee, but education, health and welfare are its three duties—that an amendment in precisely the terms he is now putting forth was moved by the hon. member for Lakeshore, Mr. Chairman. I regret that the hon. member for Lakeshore is not here today, because I know he is most interested in this matter and he was prepared to bring it to a head at the committee meeting. At that time those who were present will recall that the hon. Minister said: "Let this one stand while I have a chance to think about it."

Perhaps the hon. member for Lakeshore and some of the rest of us were, shall we say, beguiled by the innocent nature of the hon. Minister's remarks on previous occasions in that committee. When he had said let a section stand so I can think about it, he himself came back with an amendment incorporating in all essentials the proposal that had been put forward in the committee. I have no doubt that the hon. member for Lakeshore may have thought that he was going to do the same in this case; that what was worrying him was perhaps the nature of the drafting rather than the principle involved and that the hon. Minister himself would bring forth the amendment. I suspect that that is what happened. I am certain that the hon. member for Lakeshore was quite serious about the amendment and wanted to see it carry in the committee. Therefore he would not have withdrawn it or let it stand unless he had thought that the hon. Minister was likely to bring forward such an amendment himself.

Furthermore, I do not think there is any doubt at all, as my hon. friend from Scarborough West suggested, that if that amendment had come to a vote in the standing committee it would have carried. There is no doubt that it represented the consensus of the standing committee. I might say that at the time there were only three Opposition members in the committee, the hon. member for Scarborough West and myself from the New Democratic Party, and the hon. member for Ottawa East representing the Liberal Party; otherwise all members of the committee present were Conservative members and my guess, and I think it is pretty close to being right from having heard what they were saying and having had some of them make comments to me, is that the Conservative members themselves, apart altogether from the Opposition members present, would have voted two to one in favour of the amendment.

An hon. member: They did not.

Mr. Bryden: They did not because they were led to believe that the hon. Minister was going to give the matter further consideration. I certainly am not suggesting for one minute that the hon. Minister implied that he was going to give it favourable consideration, but I am sure that in view of what had been happening in the committee that is what the other hon. members thought.

They were all ready to vote for it. I will not now talk about conversations that took place outside of the committee meeting, but there is no doubt in the world that at least some of the government members were quite unhappy that the hon. member for Lakeshore saw fit to withdraw his amendment, they would have liked to have voted on it. I do not happen to see any of them present in the House at the moment, but certainly there were a good many of them that made it quite clear that they favoured the amendment. Some of them at least sotto voce, indicated that they would have liked to have had an opportunity to vote on it and bring the thing to a head right in the committee. I regret they did not have the opportunity.

I suggest that the government should adopt the procedure suggested by my hon. friend from Scarborough West. Why not remove the whips and make this a free vote? This is a matter that to a certain degree we can recognize impinges on religious convictions, private convictions of the members, and it is not really a partisan issue. It is an issue, which, I imagine, cuts across political parties generally. I have no doubt that in our party there are some people—not in this House but some active people in the party—who probably would not agree with this amendment. I believe that the hon. members in the House from this group all agree with it, although they can speak for themselves if they do not, but I believe that in the Liberal Party there are people on both sides of the question, I believe that the same is true on the government side. There are undoubtedly some members who conscientiously would oppose this amendment or would consider it inexpedient, but there is no question in the world that there are hon. members on the government side of the House who are absolutely convinced that an amendment such as proposed by my hon. friend from Scarborough West is necessary and desirable in the interests of children who may subsequently be up for adoption. I would hate to think, Mr. Chairman, that these hon. members will either have to absent themselves from this House or vote against their consciences because party discipline is applied in a case where I think it is quite inappropriate.

Let the matter be settled on the basis of the individual consciences of the people's elected representatives. If the majority in their individual consciences are opposed to the amendment, that is fine, I am prepared to accept their verdict, but I hate to have to accept a verdict that is dictated on the basis of party discipline in a matter of this kind. I urge the hon. Prime Minister to permit a free vote on this matter. It is not appropriate to make this a matter of government policy, in any case, and to impose party discipline. I urge the hon. Prime Minister to permit a free vote, and then I urge hon. members to vote in accordance with their consciences, one way or the other. I have a hunch that, in a free vote, the amendment would carry; but if it does not, I am perfectly prepared to accept the verdict of the House.

Mr. E. A. Dunlop (Forest Hill): Mr. Chairman, I agree with the hon. member for Woodbine that this is probably not a partisan question. Certainly I do not approach it from a partisan point of view but from the point of view of good law making and good jurisprudence.

The intent of the section as it is now drafted, and in relation to other sections, Mr. Chairman, is to ensure that the courts have full freedom to make their orders in accordance with the best interests of the child. That and nothing else. Now, if we are to accept the amendments proposed by the hon. member for Scarborough West—and I think he suggested that he had some inspiration from some other source—we would be saying that no order can be denied on grounds of religion or non-religion, and that is a pious statement. We may argue about the state of the jurisprudence, but I think it is clear now that no order can be denied on these grounds.

Let us think of other comparable things. Should an order be denied on grounds of race; should an order be denied on grounds of place of origin; many of these qualifying phrases we see so often in the human rights code. I should think we would not want to in any way hamper the discretion of the courts in these matters. We might say, then, in amending this statute, we would put in all these good things; we might say, to take the matter to its logical extreme of absurdity, that no order shall be denied for any good reason whatsoever. This is in fact a limitation being imposed upon the untrammelled discretion of the courts if we adopt the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Scarborough West.

Mr. Chairman: The leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Chairman, referring to the remarks of the hon. member for Ottawa East I should state, sir, that he has had a good deal of experience with children's aid societies and has been in touch with a number of them throughout the province—at this point certainly there had not been an overwhelming number of difficulties from the point of Catholic children being adopted into Catholic homes; there has not been a shortage of Catholic homes for deserted children. Similarly with Protestant homes for Protestant children, and so on. So that in one sense, with this situation with the amendment that is proposed, in the actual application it may appear as though there is not an urgent need for it. On the other hand, from the point of view of the principle which this amendment is part of, if there is not a proper home—I mean by that a good home with loving parents—for a child within the religious denomination of its parents, then that child should be assured of a home, a good home with the love which is in a home, rather than be kept in an institution or something else, and I would say—indeed I am sure—that every hon. member would agree with that principle.

We do not want children to be deprived of the love, affection and security of a home. I am sure there would be no religious leader who would deprive a child of the affection of a home on the basis that it did not fit any one particular religion. It is because of the principle attached to this that we will vote with this amendment. But I want to re-assert again that, from the aspect of the details or the application, there is not a great deal of alarm. A principle is being stated here that the home and the love and the affection of a family should be the right of anyone born in Ontario, and it is for this reason that we support the amendment.

Hon. Mr. Cecile: Mr. Chairman, I appreciate all the speeches that have been made in this respect, but relating especially to the remarks of the hon. leader of the Opposition,

I would like to point out to him that all through the Act this principle is evident. To add more words to any section in that particular design is simply, in my estimation, giving a direction; it is not an order to a judge in this particular respect. This section has worked beautifully all through the years. We have had no difficulties with it at all. When it was asked to be looked at, and to be decided upon, it was acted upon in a very judicious way.

I appreciate that I am one of those who is a firm believer—and I think this is running through the Act; as a matter of fact we admitted it in that particular respect—of having full faith in the judiciary of this province and giving them full authority and full responsibility in dealing with these questions. Surely we have not reached the point where we should even give the slightest direction to the judiciary of this province of Ontario in this respect. I think we have full confidence in them and I honestly believe, Mr. Chairman—and this is what I put to the hon. members of the House—it is quite all right to speak about amendments and to speak piously about what it is going to do and what it should not do. Let me say this, I would much prefer to live with the section as it is there and give full power to the judge to decide than to create some trouble. I think, Mr. Chairman, we have had no trouble in this province in the religious sense, so let us not please create any.

Mr. Chairman: All those in favour of the amendment say "aye."

Those opposed to the amendment say "nay."

In my opinion the "nays" have it.

Call in the members.

All those in favour of the amendment please stand.

All those opposed to the amendment please stand.

Clerk of the House: Mr. Chairman, the "ayes" 18; the "nays" 48.

Mr. Chairman: I declare the amendment lost.

Sections 71 to 81, inclusive, formerly sections 72 to 82, inclusive, agreed to.

On section 82:

Hon. Mr. Cecile moves that section 3 of section 82, formerly 83, be amended by striking out the words "unless the contrary is expressed" in the third line.

Hon. Mr. Cecile: In order to explain this, Mr. Chairman, the words are deleted to strengthen the objectives of not making a separate class of adopted children.

Section 82, formerly 83, as amended, agreed to.

Sections 83 to 86, inclusive, formerly sections 84 to 87, inclusive, agreed to.

On section 87:

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, with regard to section 88, now 87, which relates to the general powers to make regulations—I would like to raise the point that was raised in the standing committee to some extent. To an important extent the effectiveness of this bill will depend upon the regulations issued under it. The power to make regulations in this section are quite broad. For example, they include such matters as prescribing the standard of services that children's aid societies shall provide; prescribing special needs of children for which joint facilities may be established under section 14; governing the construction, alteration, remodelling, extension and equipment of receiving homes; prescribing the amounts that shall be paid by parents for the purposes of subsection 1 of section 26, and so on.

I do not particularly object to the fact that these things are to be done by regulation, I would agree with what no doubt is the thinking of the government that it is almost impossible to regulate such matters by statute. A certain degree of flexibility is desirable. We can all accept that. What I do object to, however, Mr. Chairman, is the growing tendency in this jurisdiction and in most jurisdictions to delegate most of the lawmaking authority to people who are in no way accountable to the elected members or, at any rate, whose accountability is so indirect as to be practically meaningless. I say that the hon. Minister could quite readily have his regulations available in draft form so that at least we would see them before we were called upon to vote on this bill.

When this matter was raised in the House, the hon. Minister said that was not possible, he was still talking to experts about the regulations. That is fine. That may be his situation. But he also indicated that the bill will not, in any case, come into effect until January 1 next year, so why could he not let the bill stand for the present, until he gets his regulations drafted and then let the hon. members of the Legislature take a look at them? The hon. Minister is looking at me in some bewilderment at the moment. I have heard it said that there is going to be a fall session of this Legislature. If that is so, the bill could stand until that time. Even if it is not in the present plans of the government to call—

Hon. Mr. Cecile: Mr. Chairman, I do not recall that I stated that I would let it stand.

Mr. Bryden: Oh, no. No. I am sorry, Mr. Chairman. I may have missed a word along the way. We suggested to him that there was no reason why he could not let the bill stand, in view of the fact that the hon. Minister does not expect it to come into force until January 1 next year, in any case. Unfortunately, the hon. Minister did not agree with that point of view, and we are going ahead without really knowing what is in the regulations.

I make a special point of this, Mr. Chairman, because we have had rather bitter experience in the past, where statutes passed through this House looked fine, and then they were—shall we say—substantially changed as far as their real import was concerned, by the regulations adopted under them. I think we have a right to be particularly uneasy when we see such broad powers given to the Lieutenant-Governor in Council, with regard to regulations.

The regulations that the Lieutenant-Governor in Council might pass under clause D for example, could change the whole import and stress of this bill. This is what has happened before, and I think it is time we made sure it does not happen again. I have many times argued in this House that there should be a standing committee of the House—one that is empowered to meet between sessions, as well as during sessions, but a standing committee nevertheless—that would regularly review all regulations issued by the government. Unfortunately, we do not have such a committee. If we had, then I think people such as the hon. members of this group would be quite happy to see this regulation section go through. But failing any sort of review, I must say that we view it with some uneasiness. We hope that the regulations will be in accordance with the spirit of the Act, but we have no guarantee that they will be.

There is only one appeal on this matter that I would make to the hon. Minister. I would ask him to publish his regulations two or three months in advance of their coming into force. I think that is possible in this case. He has said that the Act will not come into force itself until January 1 next year. The regulations cannot come into force before the Act comes into force, so, if he publishes his regulations in September or October, as early as possible, then we in this House and others will at least have a chance of looking at them before they come into force, even though we will not have any specific opportunity to deal with them in the House.

The hon. Minister has said that he is in close contact with experts in the drafting of these regulations. I think that is a sound practice, but I think we should dispel the notion that experts have now taken over the government of the province. Maybe they have. I do not know, but the theory is still that elected representatives are governing the province, and are responsible for its governments. Experts have a place. But it is not sufficient to say that the elected members do not have to see these regulations because the experts are straightening them out and we can rely on them to look after these matters.

As long as I am a member of this House, although I have the greatest respect for experts—I think their opinions should always be consulted—I am not prepared to give them carte blanche to make laws in my name. This, unfortunately, is what we are doing when, as no doubt we will, we pass section 88.

Hon. Mr. Cecile: Mr. Chairman, I can assure the hon. member, that as soon as it is possible, the regulations will be published.

Section 87, formerly section 86, agreed to.

Section 88, formerly section 89, agreed to.

On section 90:

Hon. Mr. Cecile moves that section 90 be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

The moneys required for the purposes of this Act shall, until March 31, 1966, be paid out of the consolidated revenue fund and thereafter shall be paid out of the moneys appropriated therefore by the Legislature.

Motion agreed to.

Sections 89 to 92 inclusive, formerly sections 90 to 93, inclusive, agreed to.

Bill No. 119 reported.

It being 6 o'clock, p.m., the House took recess.

ESTIMATES, DEPARTMENT OF HEALTH

Hon. M. B. Dymond (Minister of Health): It is said, Mr. Chairman, that hope springs eternal in the human breast; but I noticed you did not respond to the word "carried" so I guess I have to get up and tell you something about my department. I kept waiting.

Before presenting the estimates for the consideration of the House, sir, I would like to touch upon a few of the highlights of the activities of the department over the past year. This will have perforce to be done rather sketchily, but I would like to pay a little more attention to the programmes which we propose, new programmes which we shall undertake and the extension of existing programmes, in order that the hon. members, through you, sir, may have some idea of some of the things we have in mind and some of the things we have been planning and towards which we are aiming.

I need not remind you, sir, that The Department of Health is one of the largest "service departments" of government in that the budget of almost $99 million is mainly expended for direct services provided by the members and staff of the department. Because there can never be any relaxation of effort in health matters, and perhaps because much of the work in which we are involved lacks the glamour and fascination inherent in some branches of health care, some of our people may tend to think little is going on.

We only need to look at the great increase in the budgets. In 1958-1959 when I assumed responsibility for the department, the budget was $59.5 million; this year it is almost $99 million, about 66 per cent increase in seven years. In 1958-1959 there were approximately 9,600 people employed by the department; the present complement is 14,000, excluding a number of consultants who provide service on a sessional basis as required. These figures which I have just quoted exclude the budgets of the Ontario hospital services commission.

The broad spectrum of services provided, touches almost every facet of life from the programmes for prenatal and perinatal care through the division of maternal and child hygiene to the overseeing of cemeteries under the division of environmental sanitation.

Although the department was established for the main purpose of combating infectious diseases, its interests have broadened and its responsibilities have increased greatly in the 42 years of its existence. Sometimes I fear we tend to become complacent about these early epidemic diseases; because we do not hear of them in our times, we tend to believe they are no longer a threat. This is so only because of the constant vigil kept by the health workers all over our province and nation. The killers of yesteryear are not conquered, they are only controlled. But measures to ensure these controls are still provided by The Department of Health—the provision of biological vaccines, toxoids, anti-sera, and so on, are still our responsibility and with the apparent complacency I have mentioned, the need for vigorous education of our people steadily grows. I find it is difficult to apprise people of dangers they have never seen or experienced, and even when minor epidemics do occur their significance not unusually goes unnoticed.

Involved in these activities—the activities of watching over the general health of our people and trying to keep in check diseases that can be controlled—are four separate divisions of the department chiefly, although the entire department has some involvement at some time.

The branch chiefly concerned is, of course, the health units branch, involved in the matter of public health.

There are now 38 health units operating in Ontario, of which eight are in territorial districts of northern Ontario; 25 are county health units, including nine city-county units and one two-county unit, and four serve a varying number of municipalities within a county. These health units provide a full-time service to a population of close to 3 million people and I think it is worthy of note that more than 80 per cent of the total population of our province comes within the sphere of influence of some public health facility.

Four new units opened in 1964—Renfrew county, Metro Windsor-Essex county, Carleton county and Wellington-Dufferin counties—the first-named, namely, Renfrew county, giving full-time public health service for the first time in that county. Fifty full-time qualified medical officers, specialists in public health, serve in the health units, as directors.

Of the 38 health units now in existence, 25 have been established for more than 15 years and, as such, have demonstrated to the more than 700 municipalities under their jurisdiction the value to the individual and to the community of full-time public health services. It is hoped that again during the coming year, further areas not now receiving such service will establish this type of worthwhile programme.

Grants paid by the province to these units for their basic programme totalled $2,598,034 for the calendar year 1964. In addition to these, special grants totalling $585,000 were provided for programmes over and above basic services such as prenatal classes, vision and hearing testing, secondary school services and additional medical and sanitation activities.

The northern Ontario public health service was established in 1962 to bring public health services to the many isolated communities and territorial districts which do not form part of a health unit. As in the orthodox health units, our programmes are built mainly around general sanitation, immunization, public health nursing and investigation of communicable diseases.

It is our ultimate goal to bring generalized public health services to those unorganized areas that cannot receive service from existing health units. This has been attained in the field of sanitation, and we trust, in due course as staff becomes available to us, that the goal will be reached in respect to public health nursing.

A health education section has been established within the public health administration branch to give assistance in educational matters to public health personnel when it is requested or indicated. The service of this section is not meant to be a substitute for basic health education responsibilities of health unit and branch directors but, rather, to augment and supplement the work they do.

Maternal and child health branch, 1964, concerns itself with problems affecting the health of the expectant mother and the health of infants, preschool and school age children. Our main objectives are, as one would expect, a reduction in maternal and infant mortality and means to improve the health of mothers and children. Since local health departments and hospitals are autonomous bodies, our branch provides consultation regarding maternal and child health programmes in local health departments, advice concerning nursing problems in the obstetrical and newborn nursery departments of all public general hospitals, liaison between various official and voluntary health agencies, as well as assistance to help co-ordinate research.

In our poison control programme there are 31 poison control centres in the province. A number of other areas have indicated interest in establishing new centres. A physician from our staff visits these centres in order to discuss problems and programmes and offer consultative service. Reports to the central collection agency indicate that household drugs are responsible for nearly 60 per cent of such poisoning accidents—more than $\frac{1}{3}$ of these are due to acetyl salicylic acid or compounds of this substance—commonly known as Aspirin, and about 30 per cent are due to household products, including cleaners, polishes, paint products, pesticides and fertilizers. The age groups at greatest risk are the two-year-olds followed by the one-year-olds and the three-year-olds, which is to be expected.

Phenylketonuria—PKU—is the result of a metabolic defect present at birth in a small proportion of infants. The incidence of cases, as we heard a few days ago, has been quoted as rather a wide range, somewhere between one in 10,000 and one in 40,000 births. If not treated, in most cases, this condition will result in mental retardation. To prevent mental retardation, treatment with a special diet must be started during the first few weeks of life. In 1963, you will recall, Mr. Chairman, a programme was set up by The Ontario Department of Health to supply at public expense the necessary diet without charge to affected children, on request. This diet is prescribed and distributed at three special centres located at Kingston, London and Toronto. Since few cases are found, and great gaps still remain in our knowledge concerning this condition, a research committee has been set up to study all cases being treated at these three centres.

There has been much interest in this disease, PKU, and many proposals for its control have been advanced. Some jurisdictions have recently made it mandatory that this test be done on every newborn infant, and a bill is presently before this House proposing to make it mandatory that every parent shall cause the test to be done on their newborn children. I have given long and careful thought to this matter, and have discussed it personally with the chief of every pediatric service at all of our medical schools in Ontario. All of us, as I said last week, are agreed the test is of great value, but none agrees that it should be made mandatory. This has never been done in medicine, and since—I must repeat what I have said often—times in the past—government cannot practise medicine, it is not believed government should legislate how medicine should be practised.

Mr. E. W. Sopha (Sudbury): Why not?

Hon. Mr. Dymond: We believe this can and will be done voluntarily—would my hon. friend like the government to tell him how to practise law?

Mr. Sopha: Well, they certainly do.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: But the lawyers never obey the government.

Mr. Sopha: We certainly do.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: We believe this can and will be done voluntarily, and to that end I have written the chairman of each hospital board and the chief of medical staff of every hospital in Ontario, asking that PKU testing be made a routine service in the hospital. These letters went out, I believe, about 2½ weeks ago and I already have a confirmatory response from more than 50 per cent of the hospitals; just over 100 out of the 174 hospitals have undertaken to make this a routine service in their hospital.

Where the hospital laboratory is equipped and staffed to interpret the test, it will be paid for as an insured service under the Ontario hospital services commission. Where the hospital cannot interpret the test, it will be done free of charge by the central laboratory of The Department of Health.

The chief functions of the epidemiology branch are the provision of advisory and consultative assistance concerning communicable diseases and their control, investigation of disease incidence, collection, compilation and analysis of communicable disease data, the purchase and distribution of biological products used in the provision of immunization and the purchase and distribution of insulin and some other preparations used in the treatment of diseases. I am glad to say to you, sir, that no serious epidemic of communicable disease was reported in the province during the year just ended, although there was a significant increase in the incidence of German measles. Almost twice the number of cases reported in 1963 were reported for 1964, and this is a far cry from only a very few years ago when we had to report these cases in the hundreds.

Two cases of paralytic poliomyelitis were reported in 1964, and these are the first cases reported in the last two years. One patient was severely infected, requiring respirator care, and died of complications about one month after the onset of paralysis. This was the first polio death since 1960, a rather commendable record in our province and one of which we are reasonably proud.

Financial assistance is now available for needy families with children suffering from cystic fibrosis. The Ontario society for crippled children acts as the department's agent in providing prescribed drugs, and equipment, for any needs of cystic fibrotic children who are residents of the province of Ontario. An item to cover this has again been included under the main office vote of the department's estimates. The amount is $250,000.

This is a disease of infancy and childhood, certainly fatal unless vigorous treatment is begun early. This treatment is so costly as to be beyond the means of most families, hence the involvement of the government in providing some assistance in this matter.

When The Department of Health was first established, a man's environment was not of very great importance except insofar as it might affect the purity of the water he drank. I believe it was because of an idea that burial of the dead might adversely affect the purity of man's water supply that the control, and so on, of cemeteries was first put under The Department of Health.

But in these days of rapid and extensive industrialization, with the increasing concentration of population in certain areas, our environment is becoming of greater importance from the standpoint of health. Both consultative and inspection services are provided by this branch to local boards of health, to schools, to various departments of government, to summer camps, to milk processing plants and to dairies. The branch is also responsible for the administration of The Cemeteries Act.

Although air pollution control comes under the industrial hygiene division of the department, it is very much related to and very much involved in man's environment. In November, 1964, regulations were passed requiring the submission of plans and prior approval of air pollution control measures for new sources of industrial emissions or for existing sources which are altered or modified.

During 1964, five approvals, covering 27 sources, were issued, and one refusal was made since that date. Preliminary discussions have been held with 17 companies, which plan construction during 1965. Emission surveys were conducted at 57 plants. Twenty-one complaints regarding industrial sources were handled. Operation of air sampling stations in 21 Ontario municipalities was continued to determine the amount of airborne particulate matter and amount of radioactive fallout. The tests for radioactivity are done by the radiation protection laboratory and this activity is being expanded to encompass gaseous constituents. Four municipalities passed air pollution bylaws during 1964, bringing the total to 22.

Applications for financial assistance for the expansion or initiation of municipal air pollution control programmes were received from three municipalities, and approved, and three others are now in the process of having their applications considered. The first training course for municipal air pollution control inspectors was held in January, 1965, with 12 municipalities represented, and you will recall that this programme is provided for community municipalities at no expense to themselves.

Three applications for funds for air pollution research projects were approved, for a total amount of $50,000.

In June, 1964, the state of California approved two devices which are attached to the exhaust pipe to reduce exhaust emissions. This made its automotive legislation effective for the 1966 model automobile. Since that time one manufacturer has had an engine modification approved, which will result in lower cost to the consumer than the exhaust device. Other automobile manufacturers have applications pending for similar types of engine modifications.

We have held discussions with the Canadian automotive manufacturers' association. The industrial hygiene branch is keeping in close touch with developments in California, where problems of maintenance of the control devices and of enforcement of the legislation are being encountered. Engine modifications may eventually prove a much more effective measure.

During 1965-66 we intend to expand the air pollution control programme. Legislation implemented last year brought under provincial control new sources of industrial emissions. It is our plan now to develop a programme for the control of existing industrial sources of air pollution.

It is estimated that there are 4,000 industrial operations in the province which contribute significantly to the pollution burden, and, in consequence, these should receive priority. To this purpose, it is necessary to initiate an orderly recruitment of experienced professional personnel and to give them individually specialized training in air pollution control.

Provision has been made in our estimates for six additional personnel and as these staff are acquired and trained, our control programme will be developed as follows:

1. The grouping of sources by industrial classification and rating of each classification according to its air pollution potential.
2. Plants in those classifications having the highest air pollution potential will be surveyed first on a province-wide basis to determine their atmospheric emissions and the degree of control required. This programme of control will be on a voluntary basis with industry's co-operation, until such time as the acquisition of trained personnel makes it possible to implement enforcing regulations.

Looking for a moment at the laboratory branch, I would observe that many of our branches are engaged in routine though important tasks, so much so that there is a tendency to overlook them or to forget their presence. Their functions do not take on the drama or glamour of a television or radio production, and yet in the day-by-day business of watching over the general health of our people, they are of the greatest significance. Little is ever heard, for instance, about the laboratory service provided by The Department of Health and yet it performs practically all of the public health laboratory service and about 30 per cent of all the clinical laboratory work done in the province.

The year 1964 was a notable one, particularly in the history of the laboratory branch for it marked the completion of three-quarters of a century of service. Although The Department of Health was established only some 40 years ago, the laboratory branch had been going for much longer than that; 75 years of service were completed last year. It was hoped to mark this event by the opening of the fine new home situated on Highway 401 in Etobicoke township. However, this will open later in this year.

The first concern of the laboratory service in 1890 was with community hygiene and the diagnosis of infectious illness, and this has been maintained as a primary function. Although the communicable diseases originally dealt with might have been eradicated before now, they continue to present problems. From the original Toronto laboratory, regional laboratories were established as early as 1904 and these today number 17 in assistance to expanding public health practice in a growing province.

During 1964 specimens examined numbered 2,088,369 for an increase of more than ten per cent. These included water specimens, raw milk specimens, medical microbiology, serodiagnosis—blood specimens—and clinical pathology.

We have also maintained for some years, the technician training unit of the central laboratory. Last year it graduated 20 students, completing a total of 234 in the ten years the school has been in existence. The first mobile laboratory spent a useful summer in providing assistance to the Muskoka health unit. A second mobile laboratory was equipped to provide service for the eastern counties of the province, and a new regional laboratory is to be sited with the new hospital school at Palmerston, and building, I understand, is about to begin now.

Looking now at the tuberculosis prevention branch, we are bound to agree with the many that much progress has come about in this field of medicine in a relatively short time.

I had occasion to say last night, attending a dinner which was held to bid farewell to the present director of our service, who had served this province and this government well for more than 20 years, that the men and women who are now in this field of medicine have seen it probably at its worst and have, through their efforts, come to see its incidence at its lowest possible peak. There are at the present time, something of the order of 800 patients in all the tuberculosis sanatoria of the province. It is a far cry from just six and a half years when I became Minister when there were 6,000 patients in our sanatoria.

Yet, we are also much concerned because of the dangers resulting from a complacency which seems to have attacked all of us, and seems to give a false sense of security arising out of that progress.

While it is gratifying to note that again our province showed the world's lowest mortality rate for tuberculosis, it must be emphasized over and over again that this is no longer a significant statistic. The incidence of tuberculosis last year in Ontario was 26.4 per 100,000 population—a total of 1,702 active cases were recorded on the provincial register. This is the significant figure which we must always keep before us and which should constantly remind us that tuberculosis is not yet conquered and that continuous watchful care, case-seeking and research are still very necessary.

Tuberculosis is now relatively more significant in the older age groups, and apparently this attacks men—although Mr. Chairman, we are still referred to as the stronger sex, but this, I can assure you, is not medically true. In 1963, 64 per cent of the active cases were males, 36 per cent females. To the age of 30, the incidence for both sexes is very much levelled out; beyond that age it attacks much more rapidly so that the male rate begins to climb sharply while the female rate gradually drops.

There are 12 sanatoria in which at November 1, 1964, there were 871 patients, compared with 1,103 at the same date in 1963. Surplus accommodation is being used for other purposes as follows:

General hospital, active treatment beds, 341 beds—Hamilton 224; St. Catharines 25; Windsor 92;

Chronic hospital, 520 beds—Brantford 30 for children, which might better be classed as mental hospital; Cornwall, 44; Haileybury 86; Hamilton 95; Kitchener 91; St. Catharines 24; Weston 150;

Mental hospital, 709 beds—Gravenhurst 300; London 184; Ottawa 78; Sudbury 37; Windsor 110;

Rehabilitation hospital, Hamilton, 64 beds;

Outpatient mental health clinics, Ottawa and Windsor;

School for laboratory technicians, Hamilton;

School of nursing, Hamilton;

Society for crippled children, Hamilton;

Institute of physical medicine, Hamilton;

Schools for nursing assistants, Kitchener and London.

Since the greater part of treatment is now outside of sanatoria, the importance of assuring adequate follow-up of ambulatory patients on chemotherapy is now being stressed, and as you will recall was within the scope of the programme last year as a programme of benefit that was provided out of The Department of Health.

Chest clinics are conducted by various agencies, principally sanatoria, city boards of health and the department's division of tuberculosis prevention. The department maintains its own clinics in five permanent districts serving 70 centres.

The tuberculosis prevention division conducts mass surveys throughout the province except in two counties, using five bus units and one portable miniature x-ray unit. In 1963, there were 283 community and industrial surveys conducted by the branch, as well as 25 for special groups—371,726 persons. A total of 242 cases of pulmonary tuberculosis—58 active—were reported. Other diseases and abnormalities were discovered in 4,352 cases.

Hospitals are now co-operating fully in the hospital admission chest x-ray programme. More than 340,000 in-patients and out-patients were x-rayed in 1963. In 1963, 111 cases of active tuberculosis were discovered by this means.

Other special programmes conducted by the branch: jail chest x-ray programme, homes for the aged, recipients of public assistance—provincial and municipal—foster parents, bush camp workers, applicants in industry, food handlers, barbers and hairdressers, and school board employees.

While The Department of Health has an overriding interest in and concern for the education and preparation of all health personnel, there is a more particular interest in those whom we need to staff the facilities through which we as a department provide services. The majority of these call for post-graduate training, and for this purpose bursaries are provided in 18 different professional specialties. In 1964, 281 people benefited by such bursaries.

The dental and medical students' bursary plan was initiated during the academic year 1962-63 and is now in its third year of operation. During the present academic year, bursaries under this plan were awarded to 22 dental students and eight medical students, a total of 30. In addition 585 other bursaries were provided for people taking other special courses. This meant a total of 896 bursaries were provided in the amount of $965,000. This does not include the three schools of nursing operated by the department for the education and training of registered nurses. In 1964 they had a total enrolment of 92 students and graduated 73 nurses.

Then in all our hospitals there is an ongoing programme of in-service training for attendants and ward staff. Last year 606 men and women successfully completed these training courses, and experience has indicated that the failure rate for such staff members is very low.

During this session already, two quite complete statements have been made to the House concerning the alcoholism and drug addiction research foundation, so I will not take the time of the House to repeat this material. Alcoholism, however, is a matter in which other departments are involved, directly and indirectly, and as in many other areas, co-ordination is needed in the development of active and effective planning.

When the alcoholism and drug addiction research foundation was established, I believe it was in the mind of the founders that it would be the agency through which all the government's activities in this area would be directed, and that, as well, it would act as a guiding and co-ordinating force for all such activity. I have encouraged the foundation in this concept and now, after careful and exhaustive study, an exciting new programme has been proposed, which government has adopted, and which I now propose to this House.

The proposal is as follows:

(1) Ontario's present alcoholic population of 90,000 to 100,000 people will reach 120,000 in 20 years unless, in the meantime, our prevention and treatment activities are substantially expanded.

(2) The government of Ontario is prepared to declare alcoholism a public health problem requiring for its prevention and control a complete programme of education and information, early detection, treatment and rehabilitation, together with continuing research. The alcoholism and drug addiction research foundation will play a leading role in such a programme in co-operation with other government and private organizations and agencies of Ontario, and will thus fulfil the role originally envisaged for it.

(3) Prevention will be achieved mainly by: (a) expanding the present youth education programmes in the schools; (b) expanding the advertising and publicity which will reach adults; (c) developing industrial programmes with a view to the earliest possible recognition and treatment of pre-alcoholic symptoms; (d) developing and expanding existing community programmes for early detection and treatment of alcoholism.

(4) Treatment of alcoholism should be considered separately for three main groups, and all of this will be undertaken by the foundation:

(a) The employed alcoholic population of about 50,000, for whom industrially oriented staff and facilities are needed for diagnosis and outpatient treatment and referrals where needed to other facilities.

(b) The skid row and chronic drunkenness offender group of 9,000 to 10,000 for whom there is a need for: (i) changes in the law or its administration regarding public drunkenness; (ii) medically staffed detoxication and diagnostic units in major cities; (iii) small half-way house rehabilitation units; (iv) rehabilitation farms for up to 3,000 semi-permanent occupants.

(c) The remaining 40,000 individuals in the alcoholic population who are not employed and for whom there is a need for: (i) home and agency treatment; (ii) outpatient clinic treatment; (iii) day-care and hospital treatment.

(5) While the foundation now has in seven out of Ontario's ten economic regions skeleton programmes of research, education and outpatient treatment, the expanded treatment facilities proposed above call for a fourfold to fivefold increase in the number of professional personnel—physicians, social workers, psychologists, nurses, and so on—having some specialized training in the management of addictions. In order to provide the training required, the foundation will establish as soon as possible small inpatient units in each of the four to five university centres in Ontario where health professional training is now concentrated. These inpatient units would serve both for treatment of patients and for training of professional personnel. A total of approximately 350 to 400 hospital beds throughout the province is envisaged for this programme.

This plan is based on an approach to the problem of alcoholism that is entirely different from that prevailing when most of the existing legislation was written. It is based on the "treatment principle" as opposed to the "punishment principle" of the past. It is our conviction that this is a more realistic view, but even if we were not convinced of this, it can be said the old method has done no good and anything should be better. From the viewpoint of cost alone, this proposal will, in the overall consideration, be less costly. We project the cost ten years hence to be $18 million.

The proposal and programme is so great and comprehensive that it cannot be brought about overnight. The programme is shared over the next ten years. I think it not unreasonable that the House will hail this as a bold and imaginative undertaking, and one that will be achieved. I need only remind you that the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe, Rev. A. W. Downer, pointed out that we have more than accomplished the tasks we set ourselves five years ago.

Even our hon. friends opposite will pardon us if we proudly note, once again, Ontario leads. No other province has yet taken such a step and, remember, too, we do this alone—although I continue to press the federal government to support us in this programme, as recommended by the Hall commission.

Looking for a few moments at mental health, Mr. Speaker, you will recall that during the Throne debate, I presented to the House a detailed statement concerning the activities of this branch, but certain aspects apparently were not as clear as they might have been.

The hon. member for Scarborough West (Mr. S. Lewis) wondered, "What was the policy of the department in respect of mental health clinics, and why were they being encouraged to locate in hospitals?" The policy was enunciated in 1959, and with very few changes, we have adhered to it. Then it was hailed as progressive, forward-looking; it is still considered so by those qualified to judge. For years now, we have heard the cries: "Mental illness is no different from any other illness," and "Let's treat the mentally ill like other sick people." And with these statements I agree. Yet, when we do this, we find the cry changes, and even in that now much-quoted reference work, the Hall report, we hear this cry, and yet we read recommendations specifically spelled out that would make the treatment different.

The community-based clinic, for those who cannot seek the services of the privately practising psychiatrist, is the keystone of the treatment services. Backed up by inpatient facilities in the psychiatric unit of the general hospital, or the community psychiatric hospital, or the Ontario hospital, the spectrum of treatment services is complete. I believe, however, the hon. member was concerned that prevention would be less emphasized in a hospital-based service; I take this from his suggestion that we are fast becoming a "department of sickness." I can agree that this could be a possibility, but I believe history of medicine would deny this belief. When health forces are called on to tackle an epidemic or a problem, certain priorities must first be established. If it is an active disease, treatment for the afflicted must come first. Those who are ill must be relieved, treated, and if possible, cured. In performing this function methods of prevention may become obvious, or may be developed—or research projects essential to the development of means of prevention may suggest themselves. All this has already happened many times over in the various branches of health care, and more and more these programmes are hospital-based.

The mentally disturbed patient may be ill for some other cause; his mental illness may be secondary to something else—all of us have encountered such cases. In the hospital-based clinic there is available to him every facility, every resource, scientific and human, the entire range of diagnostic and consultative services, just as in the case of the so-called physically ill patient.

There is, I submit to you, inestimable benefit to the mentally disturbed patient in his being able to go to the same place for treatment as all other sick people do. Perhaps we may never be able fully to measure this benefit, but I believe it is evident in the fact that of all those who seek help through these clinics, fewer than one-third of the number have had to be admitted to hospital, at least on the first visit. There is evidence that patients do seek help earlier through these facilities. We already have statistical experience to prove to us that patients admitted to the psychiatric units of general hospitals have an average stay of some 28 days. Perhaps the readmission rate is higher, but I cannot become very exercised over this. If, in balance, the total time required for treatment of the patient is shortened, then I think it is all to the good.

Taking the long-range view, I believe I can assure the hon. members that, according to our present knowledge, this is the better approach to the treatment of mental illness, and will lead to better control, and I hope, prevention.

How to prevent mental illness is not quite as simple as some of us may think—and one only has to work with the mentally ill to recognize how true that statement is. Before we can prevent illness, we have to know a very great deal more about it than we now know about mental illness, what it is and what causes it.

Out of this knowledge may well come methods of control or prevention. But let us remember that society does not always readily accept these measures. There was great resistance to chlorination of water and pasteurization of milk when it was found these would control many diseases, water- and milk-borne. Mental illness is much more complex than typhoid or tuberculosis, and measures found useful in preventing it may have great impact upon our way of life—this, so far, is beyond our knowledge although we are learning things every day.

Some things are already known, and more and more public health people, those to whom we look instinctively for preventive measures, are becoming increasingly involved in mental health programmes, of case-finding, of follow-up, and of after-care. Voluntary organizations, mainly, perhaps, the branches of the Canadian mental health association, are steadily expanding their services in education, follow-up and after-care, and those of us close to this work can see the progress that is being made.

A few months ago I had the privilege of attending a dinner held in honour of the founder of the Canadian mental health association, Dr. Clare Hincks, who died very recently. This man spent the whole of his professional life striving to have the mentally ill given the same consideration and care and treatment as all our ill. Indeed, in this respect I think we in Ontario should be very proud of the fact that the name of Clare Hincks can rightfully rank on a par with names like Schweitzer of Africa, Seagrave of Burma, and many others whom one could mention, for he too had one cause which he espoused with evangelical fervour. On the occasion of that dinner in his honour he spoke of the progress he had seen in the course of one lifetime and he paid glowing tribute to the work that has been done here in Ontario, and the results that had been achieved. Men like Hincks know and can measure the progress—he was a psychiatrist, and often he told me that he saw his dreams coming slowly but surely to reality.

Mr. Chairman, I believe in the rightness of our programmes, but I will have no hesitation in changing course quickly or suddenly if experience, or the opinions of those expert in the field, should indicate the need.

When I presented the report on mental health, I spoke also of mental retardation, and particularly of the work of the inter-departmental committee. I want, now, to speak in greater detail about this matter, and to present to the House a "blueprint" for future action.

A little over one year ago, an inter-departmental committee was established comprising representatives of The Departments of Education, Public Welfare and Health. Representatives from this committee, the consultant in mental retardation to the mental health branch, and a representative from the Ontario association for retarded children, were then asked last spring to form a study group in mental retardation.

As its first major responsibility, a report entitled "A Spectrum of Mental Retardation Services for Ontario" was prepared for presentation to the first federal-provincial conference on mental retardation, held in Ottawa last October. The Ontario delegation met with me during this four-day conference in Ottawa to review our Ontario programmes to compare them in the light of what we had heard at that time, and to consider how best to improve our services. Following this experience, the study group prepared a number of recommendations.

Several weeks ago, my colleagues, the hon. Minister of Education (Mr. Davis) and the hon. Minister of Public Welfare (Mr. Cecile), met with me to discuss these recommendations. This close interdepartmental collaboration is based upon the recognition that mental retardation is much more than a health problem, and that successful treatment involves specialized education and welfare programmes. All future programmes will be based on this partnership. The government has accepted in principle, in their entirety, the recommendations of this group, and these proposals will now form the basis of mental retardation planning for this province for the next several years.

It will be possible to implement quickly some of the recommendations of this group. Some however, will require more detailed planning and costing, and, therefore, this committee will continue to meet and to formulate in detail the plans that will be implemented over the next several years. It has been agreed that:

1. The Department of Health will accept the responsibility of acting as the co-ordinating department for mental retardation planning for the province.

2. Recent public concern over the needs of the mentally retarded is a most encouraging development, since this enlightened interest is essential to the success of our programmes. I am pleased to announce the establishment of an advisory committee comprising persons representative of both lay and professional groups. I am particularly pleased to announce that Mr. Harold Lawson has agreed to act as chairman. Mr. Lawson, president, National Life Insurance Co., has a long and interesting record of service in a variety of voluntary organizations mainly related to health, and social and welfare matters. He was recently chairman of the social planning council of Metropolitan Toronto and has long been active in his support of programmes for the mentally retarded. His acceptance of our request that he serve in this capacity is much appreciated by government, and I know will be most satisfying to many now in this field of service.

This committee will have broad terms of reference, but its primary objective will be to advise me on matters relating to mental retardation. At the same time, I also propose to establish a separate advisory committee at each of the hospital schools, and so enable the interest, enthusiasm and goodwill of the people in the community to be made available to the staff and patients of these hospitals, and permit of the active involvement of people outside of government in our planning and programming.

3. An interdepartmental committee of deputy Ministers and their professional advisers from the The Departments of Education, Public Welfare, and Health, will be established to facilitate the planning, co-ordination and integration of all government services for the retarded.

4. Within the mental health branch of The Department of Health, a mental retardation services division is to be established. The director and his staff of this division will be responsible for the administration of, and the programme development in, the Ontario hospital schools in Orillia, Smiths Falls and Cedar Springs, the Ontario hospitals at Cobourg and Aurora, the new school at Palmerston, as well as the children's psychiatric research institute in London. He will be responsible, also, for co-ordinating those services for the retarded that exist in other departmental facilities, and the development of new resources within the province. His staff will provide the secretariat and the technical services to both the deputy Ministers and the advisory committee on mental retardation.

5. The hon. Minister of Education and I are now able to announce that The Department of Education will assume full responsibility for all educational services provided for the patients in our Ontario hospital schools and other Department of Health facilities. The first step will be a survey of current needs to get this programme under way. Some preliminary studies have already been made.

This study group to which I made reference earlier proposed a number of recommendations affecting The Department of Public Welfare's role in mental retardation. One of the most significant of these was the recommendation to undertake the establishment of a programme of community residential care. The hon. Minister of Public Welfare is now able to support the establishment of residential care facilities for children. The two Acts of The Department of Public Welfare immediately concerned are, first, The Children's Institutions Act and, secondly, The Homes for Retarded Children Act.

These Acts, as hon. members will recall, have been revised so as to encourage local organizations to develop suitable residences to care for those children who can benefit from group care in their own communities. The amended Act before the House at present provides that capital construction grants up to 100 per cent of cost, not exceeding $5,000 per place, be provided, and maintenance of 75 per cent of the cost also be provided. I now understand that these are realistic supports and will be utilized by the groups and organizations interested in this area.

Other recommendations made by the study group dealing with support to preschool, home care and workshop programmes, will be put before the advisory and interdepartmental committees immediately for further study. It is recognized that these programmes are basic to the provision of the continuum of care ideal for the retarded.

In The Department of Health, I have already mentioned the establishment within the mental health branch of a mental retardation services division. This division will be staffed by a director, assistant director, two programme co-ordinators, a co-ordinator of in-service staff training, as well as an administrative executive officer. Recommendations were made about the establishment of diagnostic clinics in the community, and I spoke of these in the House on February 15.

Hon. members will recall that such a facility is being planned at the Chedoke general and children's hospital, in conjunction with the centennial project of the Ontario branch of the Canadian association for retarded children in the Hamilton and Niagara district. I mentioned briefly, at the same time, the enlargement of the diagnostic and assessment programme in Toronto, and I am now able to state that the present Toronto psychiatric hospital building will be utilized for the establishment of a two-team diagnostic and assessment clinic, and that there will be about 70 beds available for investigation and short-term active treatment in this facility. This building will become available to us for this purpose about January 1, 1966, when the hospital moves to the new Clarke institute on the university campus. It will become the focal point for our programme in this region for the next three to five years. During this year, we will provide budget to support additional staff to the existing mental retardation clinic so that there will be minimal delay in the development of this new facility.

The study group advocated the establishment of a number of beds for the profoundly mentally retarded and physically handicapped child. Arrangements are now completed with the board of the Fort William sanatorium for its development of 80 beds in the Lakehead area. We have added an additional ten beds to the Ontario homes for the mentally retarded infants at Plainsfield. Discussions are still under way—in fact, construction alterations are now being proposed and studied—for alterations to the sanatorium at Kingston. Discussions are also under way for the establishment of additional beds for this purpose in the Metropolitan Toronto area as well.

When these developments are completed, they will relieve the pressures on our hospital schools at Orillia, Smiths Falls and Cedar Springs, but they will not solve all our problems. To expect this would be too optimistic. These large institutions, about which so much has been said over the past many months, were built in an era when they were fashionable, but now, because of changing concepts, new ideas and methods, different administrative patterns must be developed, and for this reason, a unit system will be introduced. The hospital school will be divided into four semi-autonomous units. There will be: A medical nursing unit, with hospital and infirmary divisions and diagnostic outpatient facilities; a unit with activities for the more seriously handicapped; an educational unit, in which the school programme will be under the direction of the school principal who is responsible to The Department of Education, but who shall ensure that the school programme is conducted in close liaison with the other activities and staff of the education unit; an adult rehabilitation unit.

Each of these units will be supervised by programme directors responsible to the superintendent of the institution. All of these programmes will be co-ordinated through The Department of Health.

I have been much encouraged by the imaginative enthusiasm of the Ontario association for retarded children and its local organizations, which have undertaken the development of the centennial projects in mental retardation. These projects envisage the establishment of a model community programme in the Hamilton and Niagara area, and an adult services programme in the metropolitan area.

I have already advised the House that we are to provide funds to assist the diagnostic and counselling clinic for the model community. At least two other areas in the province are showing great interest in facilities of this kind, and several groups have already begun discussing with us community residential accommodation, which we believe will be possible through the amended Acts placed before the House by the hon. Minister of Public Welfare.

These programmes require additional funds and personnel. During this current year, we plan to establish 35 additional positions for professional staff of various clinical disciplines. New professional and ward staff will, of course, be supported by this branch in the establishment of the new facilities in Edgar and Palmerston, which should come into operation within ensuing weeks, and further examination will be undertaken in regard to the complement of patient care staff in the light of these new facilities and programmes.

This, Mr. Chairman, in very brief outline, is the programme for the mentally retarded quite like that put forward six years ago for the mentally ill. If this is as productive as that was, Ontario will continue to provide, as Dr. Frank of Smiths Falls told the hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Roberts) a few weeks ago, "far better than, and more than, any jurisdiction in Canada and in most of the states."

Several changes took place within the hospital care insurance plan in 1964. Some of the most significant are as follows:

New hospital construction and a growing amount of hospital renovation increased the number of rated beds in 1964 by 2,130 to a total of 45,263 at December 31, 1964, or an increase of 4.6 per cent over the number available at December 31, 1963. All of this increase took place in public hospitals. The estimated ratio of beds per 1,000 of population is now:

Type of beds	Estimated No. of rated beds as at Dec. 31 1964	No. of beds per 1,000 population
Active treatment	36,124	5.4
Convalescent	1,351	.2
Chronic care	7,756	1.2
Total	45,231	6.8

I am quite certain that most hon. members will already have noted that the Hall commission gives the desirable bed ratio for 1966 as 6.8 per 1,000 population.

One entirely new hospital was built, while four other new hospitals replaced outmoded facilities. Quite a number of renovation projects were completed in 1964, while many others are in stages of construction or planning.

The number of insured persons under the plan reached an estimated total of 6,572,871 at December 31, 1964, representing 99.2 per cent of the estimated eligible population of Ontario based on data from the Dominion bureau of statistics.

New outpatient benefits made available under the hospital insurance plan effective July 1, 1964, were as follows:

(a) Follow-up visits in accident cases: under the new regulation, follow-up visits became insured even though the original admission was as an inpatient. Formerly these were excluded and only outpatients were included in this benefit.

(b) Radiotherapy services: Formerly limited to inpatients, these were extended to patients with cancer who became outpatients and their services in the outpatients department were then insured benefits. The service would be insured in clinics operated by the Ontario cancer treatment and research foundation and in those hospitals now equipped to provide radiotherapy for cancer, whether this was by deep or superficial x-ray or by radium. Radioactive isotopes, when used for the treatment of cancer, were considered to be radiotherapy services.

(c) Occupational therapy, physiotherapy and speech therapy: These services were accepted as insured outpatient benefits when given in hospitals which had organized outpatient departments providing the specific service. In the case of speech therapy, the regulation states that the outpatient benefits include "the use of speech therapy facility, where available, for the treatment of an organic illness, or injury, when prescribed by a physician."

(d) Private physiotherapists: Effective September 14, 1964, the outpatient benefits were extended to cover physiotherapy services given in approved private institutions and practices. These treatments are available to all residents of the province and are financed by federal and provincial health grants.

The total OHSC expenditure on emergency outpatient care and additional outpatient services available in 1963 was $4,979,997. It is anticipated that the total expenditure in 1964 will be approximately $6,724,000 and in 1965 will, with the full impact of the recently extended benefits, reach $9,024,000, Mr. Chairman.

The final estimate of provincial grant contributions in 1964-1965 is $12,265,432. The estimate for 1965-1966 is $15,583,603. The latter figure, sir, includes $1,931,250, which has already been allocated for the special accelerated programme of grants for proposed expansion and renovations of schools of nursing. These figures do not include special grants to be paid to university teaching hospitals and university affiliated hospitals.

The hon. member for Woodbine (Mr. Bryden) recently asked if we had enough money in our budget to meet the increased grants to hospitals. I had forgotten when I undertook to answer that question that these grants were increased in 1963 and provision had been made in last year's estimates.

As a result of our extensive hospital building programme in Ontario, the fixed sum allocated each year by the federal government has proven to be inadequate, with the result that payment of claims has had to either be delayed or carried over into the next fiscal year; that is, payment of federal claims.

It is estimated that claims from public hospitals for federal grants amounting to $5 million will be carried forward into 1965-1966.

No improvement in this situation, sir, is foreseen during the coming year. The shortage mentioned above does not include a backlog of approximately $7 million for those mental hospitals constructed in recent years, grants on which we have been unable to collect since 1957.

The following is a summary of the grant formula:

Grants for new construction are payable at the following rates for projects commenced after August 15, 1963:

Type of Accommodation	Provincial per bed	Federal per bed
Active treatment beds	$3,200	$2,000
Chronic beds	3,000	2,000
Convalescent beds	3,000	2,000
Nurses beds	3,200	750
Interns beds	2,000	750
	per bass.	per bass.
Nursery bassinets	1,066 $\frac{2}{3}$	666 $\frac{2}{3}$

Auxiliary Services	Provincial	Federal
(a) Dispensary, Physiotherapy, x-ray, Laboratory, Occupational therapy, Autopsy, Emergency department, Outpatient department, Community health services, Hospital training facilities	\$10.66 $\frac{2}{3}$ per square foot of floor area	\$6.66 $\frac{2}{3}$ per square foot of floor area
(b) Dietary department, Operating suite, Delivery suite, Central supply and treatment and examination rooms and laundry service	\$10.66 $\frac{2}{3}$ per square foot of floor area	nil

Type of Accommodation	Provincial per bed	Federal per bed
Psychiatric beds	$8,500	$2,000
Detention beds	8,500	2,000

The provincial grants will be paid on all new beds provided, however, that the grant is not more than 50 per cent of the cost of construction. Federal grants are limited to 33 $\frac{1}{3}$ per cent of the cost of construction, or the noted grant whichever is the lesser.

If the cost of providing beds in the psychiatric and detention bed classifications should be less than $10,500 the provincial grant is reduced to the difference between the federal grant of $2,000 and the actual cost.

In the case of renovation grants each level of government pays on the basis of one-third of the cost of renovating any area eligible for grant assistance if it were provided in new construction. The provincial grant is limited to $2,000 per bed and/or $3,200 per bed unit for any area renovated. Federal grants are limited to $2,000 per bed and/or $2,000 per bed unit.

Other changes in the capital grant regulations became effective on July 1, 1964.

(a) Renovating grants for psychiatric units are now payable on the basis of $\frac{2}{3}$ of the cost by the province, $\frac{1}{3}$ of the cost by the federal government.

(b) Renovations of auxiliary service areas which are sometimes quite costly are payable on the basis of $\frac{1}{3}$ of the cost as before, but the limitation is raised from \$2,000 to \$3,200 for every 300 square feet improved.

(c) Hospitals may now apply for advances on grants as each eighth of the work is completed.

A new regulation was also approved as you will recall which provided for loans to public hospitals to assist in constructing new facilities. These loans may be made in amounts up to $5,000 per bed at an interest rate of 3 per cent per annum. Repayment must amount to at least three-eighths of differential income incurring from the new beds.

It is estimated that the amount of these loans for 1964-1965 will be $5 million; for 1965-1966 $8 million; and it will level off again in 1966-1967 to $5.9 million. As of December 31, 1964, the commission had approved $3,276,000 in loans under this programme.

Turning to grants for teaching areas; in keeping with the Prime Minister's announcement October 29, 1964 of special grants to teaching hospitals, provision has been made for such grants to five group A hospitals for the purpose of new construction and for the renovation of existing hospital property, to provide hospital training facilities and teaching areas. The commission will determine the schedule of payments by instalments according to the progress of the renovation or new construction. As announced when supplementary estimates were before the House, grants amounting to $3 million have been provided already for these special teaching areas in six hospitals.

A special capital grant of $75 per bed was again made to all public hospitals in 1964 for a total amount of $2,823,450.

Standard ward costs to the insurance plan for care in public hospitals in 1963 was $251,877,052. In 1964, it is estimated the comparable figure will be $283,100,000. Total plan costs for general hospitals in 1964 are estimated to be $306,200,000, as compared to $273,900,000 in 1963. When you add to this, Mr. Chairman, the costs for mental and tuberculosis hospitals, all of which are included in our hospital insurance plan, these costs are $70,110,000, and we have a total expenditure of $376,310,000.

Mr. J. Renwick (Riverdale): Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, I would ask whether it is not incumbent on any hon. Minister who presents his estimates to this House to either present them slowly enough so that the people in the House can understand them, or to put the effort into it to make it understandable. What the hon. Minister has said in the last few minutes is completely incomprehensible. I am certain, to all the hon. members of this House.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Mr. Chairman, I have deliberately gone over this rapidly because the figures are of such magnitude that it is impossible for one reading them off to make them comprehensible, but I would like to advise the hon. member through you, sir, that I have stood in this House for ten years and this is the first time that I have ever been told that what I said was incomprehensible. I think I will take the hon. member aside and give him a few lessons in language.

Mr. Renwick: Mr. Chairman, on the point of order, I was asking you if it is not the obligation of any hon. Minister who presents his estimates in this House to present them in an intelligible manner. I did not anticipate that the hon. Minister of Health would usurp the position of the chair by answering the question himself.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: The estimated costs for 1965 are: general hospital care $357,800,000; and mental and tuberculosis hospital care $74,247,000; for a total of $432,047,000.

Sources of revenue for 1964 are estimated as follows: premiums $105,000,000; federal government $141,200,000; and provincial government $130,110,000; for a total of $376,310,000.

Regarding additional insured services, as already stated, PKU testing of all infants will be done as an insured service under the hospital plan where the hospital laboratory is equipped and staffed to do this work. This service will begin July 1, 1965. In addition, we plan to provide as an insured service, the routine Papanicolaou smear to all women between the ages of 20 and 65 admitted to hospital. This test is a simple one to detect cancer of the uterine cervix. The interpretation of the test is difficult and requires special training of the pathologists and technicians doing the work. The Ontario cancer foundation finances the cost of this training and it is planned to expand this service as quickly as possible to all women at risk. This is one type of cancer which, if found early, responds well to treatment. This service will also begin July 1, 1965.

Mr. J. B. Trotter (Parkdale): Is the test compulsory?

Hon. Mr. Dymond: No, it is not.

A further extension of benefits under the hospital care insurance plan will be the extension of coverage to include as dependants under the family coverage all those, up to age 21 years, attending educational and/or training institutions where they do not receive wages or salary. This is estimated to cost $3.5 million in lost premiums, and will become effective September 1, 1965.

Nursing and nurse education has been the subject of intensive study and activity in the department through the hospital services commission during the past year. Having been advised and having accepted the advice that we should double the number of graduate nurses from our diploma schools in the next five years, studies of existing schools were embarked upon. From these we have learned that:

(1) Existing schools can increase enrolment this fall by about 600 students without additional classrooms, teachers or residences.

(2) Three regional schools have been given approval and this will answer the question of my hon. friend from Algoma-Manitoulin (Mr. Farquhar). (a) Hamilton and district school at Chedoke hospital opened last September with 21 students. It will double enrolment this fall and then will steadily increase intake to 100 students annually. The reason for the delay is that additional building is necessary and this is going forward now. (b) Quo Vadis school of nursing, which is a unique experiment, began operation last September with an intake of 30 students. It is proposed to enrol 40 this September, and additional temporary property is being acquired by this government for their use and for the use of this school, pending the development of plans for the permanent school. This school too is anticipated to steadily increase its enrolment to the point where it can graduate at least 100 students every year, but this will call for some new buildings. (c) Humber memorial school of nursing has been given approval. It will operate as a day school at least to begin with, with an ultimate enrolment of 100 students annually. Then it will be recalled, through The Department of Education—(d) Ryerson polytechnical school of nursing started September 1964, another new experiment with 16 students, and it is expected will enrol 50 students in September 1965.

During 1965 we plan to approve the development of further regional schools at Ottawa, Sudbury and North York. In each case, it is planned to enrol 100 students annually.

Least some of the hon. members of the House are somewhat confused by certain reports that have appeared in the newspapers within the last few days, Mr. Chairman, I would like to point out that this figure of 24 regional schools meant that 18 existing schools will convert from single hospital schools to regional schools; they are not to be new schools. It is simply an expansion of their activity and function, to take on the regional function. The new schools are those which I have announced here.

At least 100 additional bursaries will be provided for the next academic year to encourage nurses to seek higher education to prepare them for positions of greater responsibilities. Special courses to assist in the upgrading of present teachers will be launched this year under the aegis of the college of nurses for Ontario and all the university schools of nursing are presently in discussion with us, seeking ways and means of increasing their enrolment, and graduation of nurses prepared to teach and assume positions of leadership in the profession.

For the record, I want to give the actual numbers of graduating nurses over the past four years: 1962, 2,186; 1963, 2,292; 1964, 2,480; and 1965, 2,650.

Mr. Chairman, as I said at the outset, in the brief space of time which I feel I can take, I have only been able to touch the highlights and to place a little more emphasis on the things that we are embarking upon in the ensuing year and if I have spoken unintelligibly, sir, I can assure you that before I come back here next year, I will have learned to speak Gaelic, so that everyone will understand me.

Mr. Trotter: Mr. Chairman, I can quite understand the hon. member for Riverdale wanting the hon. Minister to talk in a manner that can be understood, because the hon. Minister had no sooner started to speak than I found him very hard to follow and I sent to his friends under the gallery there for a copy of his speech. I was not able to find one, but I was able to get one from the press gallery and as a result was able to follow the hon. Minister a little more closely.

But I want to assure the hon. member for Riverdale and the others in this House, through you, Mr. Chairman, that one of the reasons why the hon. Minister, I am sure, talked fast was there was not very much in the way of concrete evidence that this province is meeting the major health problems it has to meet. So this is one reason for talking fast.

He is like the clergyman that goes on circuit on a Sunday and gives the same sermon in each of the three places, and because he talks so fast he gives it all over again on the same Sunday, and nobody knows the difference. This is the way in which the hon. Minister of Health has told us about his accomplishments.

The real problem, Mr. Chairman, is that we have not come to grips with the major health problems or the major social problems in the province of Ontario.

The hon. Minister of Health said that hope springs eternal in the human breast, I think that was his opening remark, and when I come back to speak upon the problem of mental health, I come back to a problem that I first spoke about the first time I was ever on my feet in this House back in 1960. In the Budget debate I have always spoken on it, and certainly on the estimates of The Department of Health I have always spoken on it. The real tragedy I find in this province is that so little is being done with this major problem.

We have heard that a little is being done for retarded children, how they are going to move 80 patients to Fort William and they are going to move 10 to Plainsfield. After all the talk and tragedy at Smiths Falls, after we had the loss of the lives of one or two children there, after the great public uproar, we finally get a little done.

Despite the fact that we have talked about mental hospitals, the old hospitals in the Toronto area, the old hospital in Woodstock, the old hospital in London, we see little or nothing being done in that regard. I admit some patients have been moved from London and there is some building going on in that area, but it is going on so slowly that the space provided is not keeping pace with the demands of our population.

Once again we see brought to the forefront, Mr. Chairman, this mess, literally, the public scandal that is at 999 Queen. It is not until a patient escapes and shoots himself, or there is a coroner's inquest into the death of a patient at 999 Queen, that once again this great problem is brought into the public focus. I am willing to admit that there is a public apathy to this whole problem of mental health and it is not until someone's brother, or sister, or father is taken to 999 Queen that it hits that family, that they see what a snake pit that 999 Queen Street actually is.

Queen Victoria, Mr. Chairman, had only been on the Throne a very few years when 999 Queen Street was built. It was built in 1846, and despite the fact of that new wing sitting out in front, which is really a reception wing and is for the most part administrative offices, the old building, as it was in 1846, still stands; despite all the improved knowledge that we have in constructing buildings, despite all the knowledge that we have in bringing about cures for those who are mentally ill and in their treatment, we have done very little or nothing at 999. It is typical of the approach of this government to the whole problem as it exists.

Again, Queen Victoria was still on the Throne and was going to be on the Throne for another 10 years when the hospital at New Toronto was built. Whitby, relatively modern, was built in 1920. This is the type of building that serves a wealthy community like the city of Toronto. London, another wealthy area, has certainly got an extremely old hospital.

You certainly cannot blame the personnel who are inside those hospitals trying to work, especially when you meet a distinguished superintendent like the superintendent in London. I know when I was on the committee going into the causes of the aging and the problems of the aging, we had an opportunity to talk to him. We were all impressed, and yet we also were all shocked when we saw the facilities with which that man had to work. In some cases they had outdoor porches for the patients. These had been boarded up in order to make the extra bed space that should have been supplied in a proper manner.

Admittedly, London is not as crammed as it was, but it is still even today a scandal and despite the new building that is going on they have a long way to go.

When you go back to 999 Queen Street and see the crammed wards, there is hardly space enough between the beds for an attendant to walk to change the beds. I have seen these instances, and it is no wonder that families have been shocked.

I know I mentioned one to the hon. Minister in this House and he said I should not have brought it up. Perhaps the government wants us to keep our mouths shut and say nothing, but I think when the public is aware, and they are becoming more and more aware, of the mismanagement of our mental hospitals in the province of Ontario, not only at the present time but over a long period of years, they are going to demand that this public scandal be cleaned up.

The report of the committee appointed to survey hospital needs for Metropolitan Toronto, in part 11, even in their rather conservative wording estimated that 999 Queen Street had 400 patients too many in the hospital. I know Dr. Christie, the superintendent, once admitted to the press 200 people in 999 Queen alone were there simply because they were too old and there was no place for them to go.

Mr. Chairman, I have seen some of our homes for the aged in the province of Ontario that have been built recently, and I know if a department wants to do something, if the government wants to do something, they can build homes for people who, by necessity, have to live in an institution, that are decent, that are clean and do not have that frightful smell of old age. Yet you see those old buildings so similar, like the buildings at Orillia. Before they were torn down, I was in those buildings—they were torn down eventually, the older ones at Orillia, after there was a great public uproar. Even after the children had been taken out and the windows were open, it still stunk—just the same way that 999 Queen smells. When you have a building with wooden floors, built in 1846, with literally hundreds of people, thousands of people over a period of years, who are incontinent going through it, obviously no detergent in the world is going to clean up the smell.

This is 999 Queen today and as it has been for years and years despite the protests of many of us on this side of the House and despite the protests of many of the public.

Again, I would be the first to admit that the building is not the most important thing, it is the personnel inside; but despite all the fine people that do work in 999 Queen, despite the voluntary help they have, they are so thoroughly understaffed and they are working in facilities which are not conducive to attracting people who want to work there and stay.

Even as you go in to the dining room where the staff eat dinner, there is always that heavy ancient smell. Again, when I compare 999 Queen with some of the homes for elderly citizens in the province of Ontario, it is obvious that there is a tremendous difference and that we can do it if we will it, if we would quit keeping our head in the sand and ignoring this very major problem.

Even in the city of Toronto, our Toronto psychiatric hospital was built away back in 1925—43 years ago. At long last we are going to have a new psychiatric hospital here in Toronto. After years and years of being announced, it is finally coming! We are glad to see it, but it shows what slow and what mincing steps the province of Ontario takes in this very major problem.

As has so often been said, Mr. Chairman, we have 32,000 patients a year in our mental hospitals—about one-half of our entire hospital population are mental patients—and on these people we spend $8 a day per patient, on those who are in general hospitals we spend approximately $30 a day. This despite the fact that again and again various organizations have emphasized the tremendous economic loss of people who are incarcerated, who, in many cases, could be working but are not working. We think of the crimes, the suicides and the cost of the administration of justice because of mental disturbance, but we still sit back and do not attack this problem as it should be attacked.

I think I have used the illustration that if we could save the money that mental illness costs in Canada, the income tax of everybody making up to $5,000 a year could be cancelled. This is what it costs Canada; and in proportion, Ontario being the largest province, that is what it costs us.

The hon. Minister and many hon. members in the government know these figures as well as I do, they knew them probably long before I was ever around. What is inconceivable to me, is that they have dragged their feet for so long and done so little.

Even today, the metropolitan hospital survey said that over 1,000 people—1,109 people—are kept in our mental hospitals who should not be there. In other words, in some cases it is not mental illness, it is just old age. I have been through our homes for the aged and seen people who are senile and I wonder how it is that some have been lucky to get in a new home for the aged, as they are in some districts in Ontario, and others are locked up in Woodstock or in London mental hospital or at Queen Street or in Whitby. It is a matter of luck!

If we are to encourage people, and by "people" I mean professional personnel, to work with those who are really mentally ill and can be cured, we are going to have to have some type of classification so that people in our mental hospitals can receive far better treatment. For example, in 999 Queen there are 1,247 patients, at least 400 more than there should be, and of these only 676 are what might be called active treatment cases. Active treatment patients are those for whom psychiatrists can do something. It is this group, the 676 that can be worked on, who can receive intensive treatment.

But how can any psychiatrist, any professional person, have the time when they are short staffed and when they have almost twice as many as they should have for such treatment services? It becomes a matter of custody, it becomes a matter of changing wet beds instead of practising psychiatry. It is no wonder you have a tremendous professional turnover among the men who could really do something.

Despite the fact they have very good men at the hospital in New Toronto, very outstanding men who have done some outstanding research at that hospital, the same situation applies. They have 996 beds, but they have only 458 what they might again call active psychiatric cases. In Whitby, 1,562 people are crammed into the hospital; 1,562, Mr. Chairman, of which only about 950 actually receive active treatment.

So you see that in our mental hospitals in many cases it is a matter of keeping people in custody, rather than treatment. After seeing 999 Queen for a great part of my life as I have driven by, it has become to me a symbol similar to Mercer in the matter of reform institutions. Even though buildings are secondary and personnel are the most important, you can have a situation where a building becomes so old, so decrepit that it becomes a hindrance in trying to cure or help the people that you want to help.

I hope, as the hon. Minister of Reform Institutions (Mr. Grossman) says, that they are going to demolish Mercer. I hope that in the immediate future they demolish that back part of the building at 999 Queen that was built in 1846. As long as either one of those two buildings stands it is a blot on the name of the people of Ontario, and yet we hear no mention of this building at 999 going. Let us remember this: We may say we have so many beds, and even then we are away short under our present circumstances; but we might also say, what kind of beds? When we see these beds crammed into wards we cannot under any circumstances say that this is proper mental care. Even if it is admitted that many people in our mental hospitals are human vegetables, at least they are still human beings and they deserve to be treated as human beings. Even for the sake of their families, give them some dignity in their last days.

We have talked over the years about the crowding in our mental hospitals and I know the hon. Minister often thinks, "Well, it is just the politicians talking," but let us turn to what they say about mental care in Metropolitan Toronto in a report by the committee for survey of hospital needs of Metropolitan Toronto. They say this:

With regard to the types of patients, it should be noted that, while a step forward has been accomplished by the physical separation of patients undergoing psychiatric treatment and those not undergoing such, by the use of residential units and approved homes, yet the patient population is still fairly heterogeneous. Psychotics, psychoneurotics, alcoholics, mental defectives, epileptics and old and adolescent patients with various other diagnosis, are often grouped together, a situation which has presented some serious problems. In many cases, the problems have been aggravated by the overcrowding on the wards and by the lack of staff, especially on evening and night shifts.

You know, when I read a thing like that in very conservative and restrained language, Mr. Chairman, it is easy for me to believe attendants and former attendants who tell me, "On a night shift I had to look after 120 patients and close to 20 per cent of them have been bed patients." How can one man on a night shift properly look after 120 disturbed people? Obviously with one-fifth of them in bed and unable to move, the evening or night is spent in changing beds. Is it any wonder it is difficult to get attendants or that the patients are escaping from 999 Queen or that when they die, they seem to have to have a coroner's inquest? Is this not an obvious reason? And we are told that, with the attendants working at 999, we have a turnover of 42 per cent per year. I have heard it estimated at 50 per cent. How can you have any staff morale if you have such conditions as that going on?

The hon. Minister might say, "Well, my wage scale is bound by the civil service." Surely to heavens the government can come to grips with this problem. You are going to have to have attendants who have some reasonably good training. Often, new Canadians get the job and some of them are fairly well educated; but for them it is a stop-over. They land in the country, they get a job in a hospital, they see a better opportunity before too long and naturally they leave. And whether they come from abroad or are born here, it is obvious that they are all of the same mind, they want to get out of there—with a turnover of 42 per cent. Again I say, at times it is as high as 50 per cent.

After all, Mr. Chairman, the maximum amount allowed to a man with a family on welfare is $3,600 a year and yet if you go and work for The Department of Health in one of our mental hospitals and you are a trainee attendant, for the first two years you get from $3,120 to $3,240, so even after working there two years, you get $360 less than if you were on welfare. How can a system be run properly if this is the organization? Mr. Chairman, the blame and the fault is strictly on the hon. Minister of Health and on The Department of Health. He has been there for several years and no matter what mess he inherited, he has certainly had plenty of opportunity to straighten out a scandalous situation.

An attendant, even after he is fully fledged, is still making $3,480—$120 less than if he had a family and was on welfare.

Again we have to smarten up and see to it that we have a decent system. Again I point out the comparison with our general hospitals: We spend $8 a day on a mental patient and we spend approximately $30 a day on someone in a general hospital.

The hon. Minister says he believes that mental patients should be treated on the same basis as those who are suffering from a physical illness. Well then, why does he not see to it that they are treated in the same way? Certainly $8 worth compared to $30 is a comparison that is shocking and a disgrace to the province of Ontario.

We have discussed—and I know the hon. Minister has discussed on various occasions—the fact that we should have outpatient services. Certainly, we on this side of the House are all in favour of outpatient services and the fact that the general hospitals are developing psychiatric wings is a good thing in the province of Ontario. But let us remember that, whether or not we develop psychiatric wings in our general hospitals, which is a good thing, we are still going to need the Ontario mental hospitals. To date, the general hospitals have normally been taking those cases that are easy to cure or of relatively short duration in a hospital. If they are very serious and of a long duration, they are obviously going to the Ontario hospital. This to date has been the tendency and we are going to have to face that fact. If we think that by letting the general hospitals take over the whole problem, our present Ontario hospitals are going to empty by attrition, we are sadly mistaken, because there is still no indication that long-term cases are going to be taken over by the general hospitals in the province of Ontario.

Again, after a long struggle, we are glad to see that the general hospitals are taking a more active interest because it also means that the local practitioners, the general practitioners, are able to come closer to the problem of mental illness. And I think too that there is a tendency, where a general practitioner may have a patient who should have been in a mental hospital, but he did not like to put him or her there because of a stigma, he will now send that patient to the psychiatric wing of a general hospital. There is a certain amount of that.

It also means that a lot of people who normally—because of the stigma, the old-time fear of mental illness—would stay hidden, will now come forward because of what is being done in our general hospitals. Again, I urge this fact: that we are still going to need our major mental hospitals in Ontario. We have this one greater problem in the matter of personnel because our Ontario hospitals are not that pleasant to work in; they seem backward in so many things. The psychiatrists have been leaving the service of the Ontario government and going to work in the psychiatric wings of the general hospitals where the working facilities and the atmosphere is so much more congenial.

In one respect, we give grants for these psychiatric wings of the general hospitals, and we are building up competition for personnel. In the long run it is a good thing, but we have to face the fact that we are going to have to compete for the professional help that the psychiatric wing of the general hospitals will take.

Again, the hon. Minister of Health has mentioned, I think, from time to time, that the stay in the mental hospitals has been decreasing, which again is a good thing. Mr. Chairman. But if we are going to develop a hospital situation—at least a mental care situation—in the province of Ontario we are going to have to go much further in the after-care of our patients, that once they leave the hospital there must be facilities available to a far greater extent than there are today. Again, look at 999 Queen. They have an outpatient service there; they have pioneered many things and done good work, but they are in cramped quarters and they have about 2,000 patients a year for their outpatient facilities. Any members who have seen those facilities will know that they work under a tremendous handicap, and yet, by keeping people coming to the outpatient facilities, by seeing to it that they get the tranquilizing drugs and the other drugs that are required, we are keeping down the cost of our mental hospital system. But if we look at the facilities that we have for our people—the outpatient facilities—it will be found they are very, very inadequate, and especially when it comes to children, a point on which I should like to dwell in a short time.

Even one of the doctors in the service of the Ontario government, Dr. J. S. Protten, the superintendent of the Ontario hospital at Kingston, has pointed out that by giving short stays in Ontario hospitals without having proper facilities of after-care, we are creating a new major problem. In the old days the Ontario hospitals followed the policy of closed doors—keep everything locked up. And then we went to the open door which we all want, but in fact what we are getting is the policy of the revolving door—they are going out of the hospital and very shortly they are going back in—and why? I will quote from what Dr. Protter says in an article written very recently. After all, he is a man in our own service, a superintendent of one of our hospitals and should have a grasp of the situation.

With active programmes of therapy and changed attitudes the hospitals are now discharging about 75 per cent of new admissions in about three months but this, it seems to me, is a disservice to our patients. Hospital outpatient, community psychiatric, medical social work and rehabilitation services are not sufficiently developed or sufficiently integrated with psychiatric hospitals to provide adequate after-care which the patients need. These may be psychological supports, vocational assistance, counselling, psychotherapy, medication, and so on. Readmission rates are rapidly reaching 35 to 50 per cent of returns of former patients within weeks or a few months of leaving hospital. The American five-state study and other reports—that is the Carmichael report—indicate that readmission rates may easily be reduced to 15 per cent or less, given adequate organization and services and facilities to provide continuing community care.

Now, Mr. Chairman, we in this province just do not have those after-care facilities nor do we seem to have made a very substantial beginning in coming to grips with this major problem, because we on this side of the House are the first to admit that we want to see the patients released from hospital as soon as possible. We realize that if they are helping themselves—and after all this is the main thing for government, not to give this assistance as pie in the sky, but to help people help themselves and if people are out of the hospitals working, paying taxes, they are certainly helping not only themselves but the taxpayers throughout the province of Ontario.

We in this province do not have a vigorous after-care programme. We know from various studies that have been made how we lack the outpatient facilities in the province of Ontario; and, I assume, nothing in the way of active steps are taken by the hon. Minister of Health.

Just to give an example of that. Epileptics in the province of Ontario—I believe there are approximately 25,000 of them. Very little has been done by government to help this group and yet the vast majority of them can be kept working if they were helped and if the public were educated. We keep most of the severe cases of epilepsy in Woodstock.

In the 1930s they built a school to help train the younger epileptics. They no sooner got the school up than war broke out, and they emptied St. Thomas and put, I believe, TB patients in what was going to be the school for the epileptics. They have never returned the school to the epileptics. Again, here is a group that could be helped and could be assisted. We find in Woodstock another old hospital crammed with patients where the doctors and personnel concerned can do very little in comparison with what could be done with the knowledge that modern science has given to us in this problem.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to touch briefly on this subject of Fred Fawcett. Fred Fawcett has become a symbol that makes us all wonder what is really going on in our mental institutions. I do not doubt the word or the opinion, for a moment, of the doctors or the psychiatrists in the service of the province of Ontario. I think many of them are outstanding, and I think it is often unfair to say, "Well, he gave such-and-such an opinion because he is a government psychiatrist." I do not go along with this. But I do think that under our present situation, you put a psychiatrist working for the government in a most unenviable situation. Here we have the situation of a man who was arrested and charged with using firearms and then was declared to be mentally disturbed and eventually he ended up in one of our maximum security institutions; he was said to be thoroughly and highly dangerous; he was defended by good legal counsel; he was before the courts on various occasions, each time declared to be mentally disturbed to the extent that he was dangerous to the public. So four years went by and some of us here were disturbed to hear about it—not questioning so much the decision of the psychiatrists—but when first we heard that there was a witness who wanted to swear, and as a matter of fact had already sworn, that the man was not even carrying a gun! Surely there should be some procedure where such a case could be heard, even to decide if there was a legal case against the man; but in this case, nothing was done.

First of all, the hon. Minister of Health said they were not going to reinvestigate the case; then a few days later the hon. Prime Minister comes forth and sets up a committee. That committee, Mr. Chairman, consisted of three distinguished men—I believe, Mr. Justice Stewart, Dr. Boothroyd and Dr. Markson. This matter was turned over to a committee and the next thing we know, before this committee comes to a decision, Dr. Boyd, who had kept Mr. Fawcett incarcerated there as part of his duties in Penetang, the next thing we know Mr. Fawcett is back on his farm.

Is it not reasonable for those of us on this side of the House, and for the public, to ask why? How is it a man who is so dangerous, and according to the government, it is so obvious that he is mentally disturbed there is no point of having an investigation, is suddenly released and back on his farm?

Without questioning the good intentions of the professional staff of our Department of Health, who again I say are very able men, I repeat that our system of keeping people incarcerated in such a manner is a very dangerous thing.

We should have in this province, as they have in the United Kingdom and Saskatchewan, I believe, an appeal as of right for an individual incarcerated in a mental institution, or an appeal by one of his family or someone on his behalf. The committee that hears that appeal, in order not to put any government official in any invidious position, should consist of people who are outside direct government employ, and not necessarily all psychiatrists. Again I think that in some other jurisdictions they have psychiatrists and lawyers and private persons, so that in this way there is no question that someone is being held in a wrong manner.

If I were to believe every letter that I receive from someone in a mental institution who thought that they were being falsely held, I would be knocking on the door of The Department of Health about every second week. On some of those I have looked at and had investigated, I have nothing to question; again I say, I do not question the professional personnel or the hon. Minister of Health in keeping people locked up, because they are crowded to the rafters anyway and would be glad to release them.

But you must do two things:

Protect the public—you cannot turn out a man whom you can reasonably expect, no matter how normal he might appear, might be completely disturbed in some subject. You cannot turn him loose, you have to protect the public.

Second, you must protect the individual. You must not only be just, you must appear to be just; and in the Fred Fawcett case you do not appear to be just.

This whole question should be re-examined and this mess that the department got itself into, and also The Attorney General's Department got itself into over Fred Fawcett, should be cured once and for all by saying that an individual, as of right, should have the right to appeal to a board that is outside immediate government employees; not only that individual but anyone on his behalf can appeal, and then there is no question.

After all, Mr. Chairman, such appeals should be inexpensive and they should not entail long court proceedings; but at least the public knows, and the families of those people who are incarcerated know, that justice is being done.

The explanation that the hon. Minister has given on Fred Fawcett has failed utterly and leaves a lot to be questioned. In his speech to this House today he just ignored that whole problem; which is a vital problem, because thousands of people in the course of time, over the years, are in our mental institutions. We must not leave any doubt that there is any wrongdoing. We know it can happen and we do not want it to happen. We should set up the necessary safeguards to protect the people who come under the jurisdiction of The Department of Health.

There is one final item I would like to discuss, Mr. Chairman, and that is in regard to the utter lack of facilities for mentally disturbed children and for teenagers here in the province of Ontario.

Again, just as in the case of Fred Fawcett, who becomes a symbol, we have the case of this Jamie who has become a symbol of the utter lack of proper facilities. When the hon. Minister of Health was asked what they were going to do about him and he was told that the chief was down at the juvenile court, the doctor said, "Well, that is quite satisfactory as a holding operation."

Well, now, I do not think the people in this province think that keeping a child down in the family court—and this turned out to be quite a period of time—is quite satisfactory, either as a holding operation or any other kind of operation. It is a shocking operation that this has to happen in a city the size of Toronto, and with the wealth of Toronto. If this is happening in a wealthy area in Toronto, heaven knows what is going on in the rest of the province of Ontario, because we have gone into this problem and it crosses into The Department of Public Welfare, into The Attorney General's Department and to Reform Institutions—they are all involved in it. I think it is time you all got together, these four departments, to try to bring about some solution.

All they say is: "Well, you could take such a child to Warrendale if there was space for him." Warrendale is reputed to have an 85 per cent cure, but it costs $22 a day. After all, if the child had a broken leg and went to a general hospital it would cost about $30 a day. Let us bear in mind if you do not cure these disturbed children at this stage of the game, you are going to be keeping that child, either in your mental institutions or in your jails, as long as that child is alive.

So is it not wiser to develop facilities, even if it costs $22 a day, than just let everything literally go to pot, which is what has been happening here in the province of Ontario? We live in an entirely different kind of society than which existed when the present mental health set-up was conceived. Imagine—1846, 1906, 1890; these are the dates when so many of our major institutions were built. There is much of the Queen Victoria thinking in The Department of Health today, this is why we are faced with shocking examples such as Janie here in the province of Ontario.

It is nothing new! In 1962 a survey of hospital needs in Metropolitan Toronto uttered opinions on what was not being done for the psychiatric services of children here in the province—this was more particularly in the city of Toronto, but I would say to the hon. Minister of Health that after reading the detailed and extensive work done by the committee for the survey of hospital needs in Metropolitan Toronto, what we need is a similar survey for all of the province of Ontario. Again, if you have a wealthy area with all these inadequacies, certainly we must know that the rest of the province is in a sorry state. I for one know that northern Ontario has been sadly neglected in the field of health services from top to bottom.

This is what the survey in Metropolitan Toronto said about the treatment for emotionally disturbed and retarded children:

What emerges most clearly from this study of the facilities and requirements for emotionally disturbed children is the complete inability of anyone to gauge the needs in this area of diagnostic and treatment facilities.

The director at each inpatient service and at each mental health clinic was well aware of greater demands on the surface than the staff was able to meet, but no one had a clear idea of how great the lack of facilities seemed to be. There appears to be a general feeling among these highly qualified persons, and among practising physicians, that the volume of treatment services for disturbed children is lagging so far behind the need that it is almost useless to refer a patient for immediate care.

I repeat that:

—among practising physicians that the volume of treatment services for disturbed children is lagging so far behind the need that it is almost useless to refer a patient for immediate care. The judges, social workers and psychologists at the family and juvenile court feel the situation to be extremely serious and of great urgency and most frustrating in the face of an immense problem.

There is a great deal to read in that report, but that quotation puts it in capsule form, it sums up what they think of this situation and what needs to be done. I know cases that have come to me of children that have been disturbed whom they will not keep at public school. They are not bad enough or there is not room enough to get them in Thistletown, which is really there for experimental purposes, so what can you do? This child stays at home. I have seen a case like this for myself, and yet the Ontario association for emotionally disturbed children recently put out a brief to the hon. Minister of Health and other Ministers citing one similar case as an example.

So we see it in our day-to-day public life and we do not necessarily need it in the briefs that are presented to us, but it shows that at last a group like the Ontario association for emotionally disturbed children are now organized and coming to the fore and doing something. Recently after a lot of hard work they were able to raise enough money to build a school to help these children who are emotionally disturbed—again not retarded—but emotionally disturbed. And this is the pity of it. We know that when children are emotionally disturbed that if given proper treatment the vast majority of them can lead a normal life. The Warrendale experiment seems to prove that.

There are many pilot projects that are so-called private projects, that prove to my mind, and I think to most people, that something can be done. Again I think it is time that the government stepped in and gave more serious leadership to this problem than they have in the past, and I would plead with the hon. Minister of Health that the Ontario association for disturbed children get the support it should—first in the school that is now started, but in a greater number of schools that are needed.

The classes in our public schools or in our separate schools are so large that it is extremely difficult for a teacher to handle a disturbed child who really needs a lot of specialized care, and so the only solution is to have a school where these children can receive the treatment they need.

Again I emphasize that it is not just the humanitarian aspect but it is the hard-boiled economic fact that unless you get these children on the rails when they are young, you are going to have to face a far more expensive problem when they are older, and one way or another the taxpayer is going to have to foot the bill. It is far more prudent to seek for a solution now when something can be done than to wait until the situation becomes in some cases utterly hopeless and in all cases thoroughly and completely expensive.

Now, I would just like to mention briefly one or two remarks in this brief of the Ontario association for emotionally disturbed children, who I think have summed up the problem quite well. They, in seeking more funds for this problem, have pointed out the various projects that have been carried on—all of them commend very highly the Thistletown project, the children's village in Scarborough, that is the Sacred Heart children's village and boys' village, and as I mentioned, the Warrendale programme, but they say this at page 7 of their brief:

We find it difficult to understand why in view of results obtained by most treatment centres the province and the provincial hospital insurance commission underwrites the entire cost of a child's care at Thistletown while paying sometimes less than half the cost of a child's care at any of the institutions classified as treatment centres. There is no provision made for collecting the other half. If the parent can pay one quarter The Department of Public Welfare at present pays the other quarter.

Well, again, in the establishment of schools and also in handling such problems, maybe they are not as severe as Jamie, because it is claimed that he is both deaf and mute and this obviously makes it a very extreme case, but if more guidance clinics were available in our public schools we would have far more opportunity to reach the problem of the disturbed child sooner than we do.

Let us bear in mind, Mr. Chairman, that it is estimated that between from five to ten per cent of our school children are considered emotionally disturbed. In fact, in some American studies, and I think possibly this is a bit high—I hope it is high—they say it is from ten to 20 per cent. This means that there are literally thousands of children who now need some form of attention. A lot of them are not extreme cases and if nipped in the bud can be solved very easily and very quickly. So if these guidance centres were established in our public schools to a greater extent they would do even more good than some of the outpatient clinics in our general hospitals.

The fact that they are going to hospitals makes a lot of children afraid to go, whereas if clinics were to be held within the school walls, there is maybe to them not the stigma that sometimes seems to apply to this problem.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have mentioned these three items, our mental hospitals, the Fred Fawcett case and this case of Jamie because they sum up to me three of the many inadequacies of this Department of Health. There is so much to discuss and there are so many points that one would like to pick in discussing this problem of health services here in the province of Ontario, that it is often hard to know in which the government has done the poorest. But again I say the snake pit at such places as 999 Queen have been with us for well over 100 years and it has been with us because of public apathy, but worse still because of the lack of leadership. And despite the fact that since World War II so many more cures, so many more scientific devices and therapeutic treatments have been learned, that we know so much more can be done, yet when we go through an old building like 999 Queen or the hospital at London, we see that they still have a long way to go. The niggardly policy of the government in their approach to this problem is a shame on the people of the province; and it is a shame on all of us in this House regardless of our party, because we are all a part of the province of Ontario. I regret that the government has been as weak and has been literally turning a blind eye to a major social problem that we have in the province of Ontario.

Hon. H. L. Rowntree (Minister of Labour) moves that the committee of supply rise and report progress and ask for leave to sit again.

Introduction of bills.

Mr. A. E. Thompson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day, I wonder if I might make a request through you, sir, to either the hon. House leader (Mr. Rowntree) or to the hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Roberts). Last night the hon. House leader, with, if I might suggest a broad sweep of the brush, pretty well covered the waterfront and told us that the business today might include everything which really could be included in the parliamentary form.

This creates some difficulties, as I am sure he appreciates, for the Opposition, in that we are concerned if private bills should come up. The hon. members want to study them. I just raise the point that as well as being general, he has to be more particular in telling us what the business will be.

Hon. H. L. Rowntree (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I do not know how much more specific I could have been last night. I referred to the hour of 5 o'clock this afternoon, which would be set aside for the discussion of "Other public bills and orders" and I said: "And in addition to the hour tomorrow, Tuesday"—meaning today—that the same hour on Thursday would be set aside for that purpose.

Mr. Thompson: At the end of the evening session I did not get a chance to raise this point, but I would like to know if this includes private members' bills. I am thinking of resolutions also. These are of concern to us as well.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: I used the phrase, "other public bills and orders," which is an item that covers the bills advanced by private hon. members, and which is the same group of bills which was discussed on two other occasions last week.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day, I have a question for the hon. Minister of Labour. Does The Hospital Disputes Labour Arbitration Act apply to homes for the aged?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Mr. Speaker, in answer, may I say that it was not the government's intention to include homes for the aged as such under the definition of a hospital, as it applies to The Hospital Disputes Arbitration Act. I think I made reference to the definition section of that bill. In any event, that was the intention behind the legislation, and the definition.

Mr. MacDonald: Therefore, I conclude that it does not cover homes for the aged.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: The hon. member is on the right track.

Mr. MacDonald: Thank you.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

THE CHILDREN'S INSTITUTIONS ACT, 1962-1963

Hon. L. P. Cecile (Minister of Public Welfare) moves second reading of Bill No. 154, An Act to amend The Children's Institutions Act, 1962-1963.

Mr. S. Lewis (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, before this Act carries on second reading, I think that there are one or two preliminary comments that should be made.

This Act holds within it very considerable possibilities. The amount of money that is being provided for purposes of construction, on a 100 per cent to $5,000 bed basis, is a very, very major step, and I hope will be of sufficient inducement to various organizations to avail themselves of special homes.

The amount of money being provided on a per diem subsidy is equally significant; but is frankly suspect, because as every hon. member of this Legislature knows, the experience with The Children's Institutions Act in the past has been, to say the least, an unhappy one. Let me remind the House that when The Children's Institutions Act was first introduced into this Legislature, the subsidy that was to be provided for children was 50 per cent of $8 a month, for both wards and non-wards. That came to an average of 27 cents a day for the children who received the subsidy. That was the first children's institutions Act introduced into this Legislature.

The second children's institutions Act, or the amendment to it, provided for 50 per cent payment for non-wards up to a maximum of $8 a day—at least that is the way it operated. No children's institution, to my knowledge, received more than $4 a day subsidy for non-ward children in their care.

Mr. Speaker, this effectively meant that the principle of this bill was totally undermined. In places like Sunnyside children's centre, Warrendale, boys' village, Ottawa Protestant children's village and Sacred Heart, here in Toronto—in all these agencies where costs were between $12 and $24 a day per capita—the maximum $4 a day subsidy from the government was totally insufficient to provide for non-ward children.

It meant that all the children who fell within The Children's Institutions Act, therefore, had to be wards of the children's aid society. It meant that we had to go to court and premeditatedly separate children from their parents so as to bring them within the purview of this Act because the subsidy was not sufficient.

Indeed, the subsidy was not even handed out, Mr. Speaker, unless the parents subjected themselves to a means test; unless it was demonstrated that they could pay no portion of it.

Now, the hon. Minister has said we will pay 75 per cent of the total per diem cost. I hope he means what he says for the first time—that it will be 75 per cent of the operating cost, the total operating cost—and that those operating costs will be fairly calculated and that they will be related to the differential needs of various institutions.

Let me take a moment to explain, Mr. Speaker. Under this Children's Institutions Act there are a whole range of homes involved. They range from one extreme—I suppose the Loyal True Blue and Orange Lodge is probably the best example of the extreme of what is essentially custodial short-term care—through a middle ground of slightly disturbed children who can function in the community for school-going purposes—I suppose Linwood Hall in Hamilton is a good example of that—through to the other extreme of the very intensive treatment centre.

The financial needs of all these centres are vastly different. There must be some kind of differential established. In one instance it can be $2, $3 or $4 a day; in another instance it can be $12, $15 or $24; and yet we are assuming 75 per cent of the costs without any differential indicated. Since the regulations usually allow a maximum, I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that that maximum be related to the needs of the various institutions.

I also want to indicate to the hon. Minister opposite that I raise this because the institutions are lacking confidence, because the basis on which the operating costs have been evaluated results in a betrayal of confidence. Warrendale, Mr. Speaker, has been waiting since August of 1964 for its per diem subsidy. Warrendale, I believe, at the moment, is somewhere around $40,000 behind in the receipt of provincial subsidies because the operating costs have not been carefully and fairly evaluated, and because no money has been paid—for whatever reason, despite the fact that monthly statements have been faithfully filed.

This is not only true of that institution, it is true of other institutions in the province, Mr. Speaker. It happens to be true, however sadly, that the difference in what the institution thinks are operating costs and what this government deems to be operating costs, is usually considerable. The institution may think in terms of $12 or $14, whereas the government comes in and eliminates various factors which the institution feels indispensable to its needs, and cuts it down to $4, $5 or $6.

Now I say, Mr. Speaker, that this business of withholding payment, of slowing them up, of no differential, of no established rate of cost calculation—all of these things—will undermine the intent of this bill unless the hon. Minister moves on it.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, one other thing will undermine the intent of this bill, unless the hon. Minister acts. Within the child welfare branch of The Department of Public Welfare, there has never been enough people to properly supervise the children's institutions; to give them the leadership and direction they need. Let me remind the hon. Minister that perhaps the most able children's institutions supervisor he has had for many years, Miss Katharine Johnson—who is now with the York board of education—single-handedly supervised 43 institutions in the province of Ontario for close to a two-year period. Then there were two people supervising 43 institutions for a few months; then one person supervising all of them again from November, 1964, to March, 1965. Now we again have two supervising this range.

Frankly, Mr. Speaker, it is ludicrous to suggest that we can have an active children's institutions branch in the province with one or two supervisors for this extraordinary spectrum of services—much wider, much broader, let it be said, than even children's aid societies, because the complexity of treatment and the focus involved demands very, very close direction and supervision. Indeed, it is regarded as an impetus and incentive to the institutions themselves.

There should be a minimum of five children's institutions supervisors in the branch. There are now two. We have operated for a majority of time over the last three years with one, and everyone, on both sides, has suffered a lack of confidence and a lack of direction.

I therefore return to my initial point. On the face of it, Mr. Speaker, this is an excellent bill. On the face of it we are breaking through the impasse of financing special centres for children. The bill directly relates to many of the problems that have been raised in this Legislature over the session. I hope the regulations will not again thwart its intent. I hope it will not merely masquerade for legislation; and I look forward to evidence that things have changed in the principle of this bill.

Mr. H. S. Racine (Ottawa East): Mr. Speaker, I would almost entirely agree with the remarks of my hon. friend, the member for Scarborough West.

I think I would like to quote at this time the recommendations of the committee regarding the development of institutions. The committee said that the state would probably have to face the fact of inadequate facilities and services for the care of particular children and hence undertake or sponsor their development. The hon. Minister's committee recommended that more specialized resources be developed for children in care, including regional assessment and treatment centres, special institutional services, a whole range of foster homes and group homes as well as individual counselling services.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I would like to make one remark along those lines. I think we will require leadership on the part of the department to make sure that those institutions are built. This legislation, I think, is a tremendous improvement. It does not leave the responsibility of the costs to municipalities or individuals in those municipalities. The government is accepting almost total responsibility, but I think some leadership will have to be shown and, as the hon. member for Scarborough West said, there should be many more people involved in this department in doing something so that there is a co-ordination and the construction of those necessities in the various areas.

I remember many instances where we had to place children in special institutions, and it always caused a lot of difficulty; a lot of families that were not receiving welfare and could not find a means of paying up to—I think at the time—$30 or $35 a day for the care of some of the children who had to go to special institutions. Now the fact that the government will pay 75 per cent of the gross cost of children going into those specialized institutions, I think, is a tremendous improvement. I think I might suggest that eventually the government might consider 100 per cent of the cost of children who have to go to those special institutions.

Motion agreed to; second reading of the bill.

THE HOMES FOR RETARDED CHILDREN ACT, 1962-1963

Hon. Mr. Cecile moves second reading of Bill No. 155, An Act to amend The Homes for Retarded Children Act, 1962-1963.

Motion agreed to; second reading of the bill.

THE DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC WELFARE ACT

Hon. Mr. Cecile moves second reading of Bill No. 156, An Act to amend The Department of Public Welfare Act.

Mr. Racine: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the hon. Minister could give us some explanation of this bill. This is couched in legal terms and perhaps he could give us some explanation of it.

Hon. L. P. Cecile (Minister of Public Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I think, in introducing the bill on first reading, I made about as full a statement as I can make in this matter. This is to serve as an encouragement for the purposes of paying costs, or helping to pay costs, which would be operational costs—in providing more inducement, I would say to be very honest with you—in having more of the districts formed in the province of Ontario. As you know, we already have four of those and we have now four more on—if I may use the expression—the drawing board. We expect that many more will come within this scope.

Those we have now—the county of Wentworth, Prince Edward, Welland and the district of Sudbury—seem to have been working very well. The difficulties seem to have been that the administration costs were difficult to meet, and that is one reason we came in with this amendment. We hope that next year—and I rather think I am assured of this—under The Canada Welfare Act, which is supposed to become a reality sometime this year, we will be able to do so across the board; but this is something that is not sure. However, the reason this has been brought in is to provide help for the administration expenditures for a county or district consolidated service.

Motion agreed to; second reading of the bill.

UNIVERSITÉ D'OTTAWA

Mr. F. Guindon (Stormont) moves second reading of Bill No. 158, An Act respecting l'Université d'Ottawa.

Mr. Racine: Mr. Speaker, in the last session of this Legislature, and again in this session, I asked the hon. Minister of University Affairs (Mr. Davis) and the hon. Prime Minister of this province (Mr. Roberts), to reconsider the decision of previous administrations not to give l'Université d'Ottawa grants that would permit that great institution of learning to play its role in eastern Ontario. The answer given at the time was that because of its adherence to a theological system the university could not receive grants, with the exception of its faculties of medicine and sciences which were considered non-denominational.

Naturally, this answer, given at the time by the hon. Prime Minister, did not satisfy me, nor did it satisfy many other people in this province who thought that there was discrimination against a large number of inhabitants and saw in the decision, a flagrant breach of the Bill of Rights.

I was very pleased, however, Mr. Speaker, when my good friend, the very able and sympathetic Minister of University Affairs told me some time ago that discussions had been taking place between the Oblate fathers and his department, that would make it possible for l'Université d'Ottawa to receive grants that would enable it to carry on its work as a bilingual university in the eastern part of this province.

I am not aware, Mr. Speaker, of the discussions that took place. However, I am now convinced that both groups have arrived at an agreement acceptable to both parties, and I have no intention of asking the hon. Minister to tell us the difficulties that had to be ironed out.

I would like to say that I am in complete agreement with the hon. member for Stormont, who, in introducing this bill, had many nice things to say about the Oblate order, who have done so much for education since the incorporation of the university in 1849. I did not have the privilege of attending that institution. However, I have been very close to many of its professors, and I am proud to say that I have been on very friendly terms with many of its rectors.

I think I can say that without this new arrangement, this institution would not have been able to carry on, and that would have been a great tragedy.

Eastern Ontario which has been recognized as an area needing help, in order to develop its resources, will certainly profit by the development of the facilities of the university. At the graduation exercises held last Sunday, the largest ever number of graduates received their degrees. I think there were approximately 940 graduates.

At a time when this province is making an attempt to promote the teaching of French at all levels, I am sure a large share of the responsibility for the training of teachers will fall on the institution's shoulders. While I consider it important to train people in medicine, the sciences, political sciences, law and others, I believe the authorities will make a strong effort to train professors and teachers who will play a special role in this province in teaching the French language. This may offer a solution to the hon. Minister, who spoke so eloquently in his introductory address to this House, last Wednesday.

Monsieur le Président, la nouvelle de la présentation de cette législation a fait les manchettes des journaux de la capitale le Jeudi, 27 Mai dernier.

Je crois qu'il serait utile de lire le premier Ottawa, sous la signature de M. Willie Chevalier, intitulé "L'Université." Et je cite:

D'aucuns regretteront les transformations à l'Université d'Ottawa, annoncées hier. Leurs sentiments sont compréhensibles et très respectables, mais ce n'était un secret pour personne que les RRPP oblats, qui faisaient vivre l'Université depuis 1848, ne pouvaient plus suffire à la tâche. Leur dévouement, et leurs sacrifices, ne suffisaient plus à diffuser le savoir à une jeunesse de plus en plus nombreuse dans un monde chaque jour plus compliqué par les découvertes et les inventions de ces dernières années.

Le projet de loi relatif à la réorganisation présente plusieurs côtés positifs. L'institution demeure bilingue et chrétienne, au service des deux cultures du Canada, mais on lui donne en outre le but précis de "préserver et développer la culture française en Ontario," ce qui, de la fait du gouvernement, équivaut à reconnaître la nécessité de préserver cette culture française. D'autre part, le bilinguisme de l'Université n'est pas nouveau et il est normal dans la capitale du Canada. Que désormais le bureau des gouverneurs sort compose en majorité de laïcs, c'est conforme à un tendance qui saute aux yeux et que, d'ailleurs, l'Eglise encourage dans une certaine mesure; et, surtout, cela rend l'Université éligible à de plus équitables subventions provinciales, grâce auxquelles il lui sera plus facile d'accomplir sa mission sans renoncer à ses caractéristiques essentielles non plus qu'à ses traditions.

Ces transformations assureront le progrès de l'Université lui permettant de perfectionner plusieurs de ses facultés. La liste des gouverneurs mentionnés dans le projet de loi est impressionnante; en elle-même elle est une garantie de dynamisme. On devine bien que tout cela est le fruit de longues négociations; à tout prendre, ce fruit n'est pas du tout amer.

Je crois que les sentiments exprimés par Monsieur Chevalier sont ceux de la majorité des personnes de la ville d'Ottawa et de tout l'Ontario français, qui s'intéressent aux problèmes d'éducation.

Mr. Speaker, the other two Ottawa papers also had very favourable comments on the introduction of this bill and I quote from an editorial in the Ottawa Citizen of May 28, entitled:

NEW ERA FOR UNIVERSITY OF OTTAWA

Introduction in the Ontario Legislature of a measure that will establish the University of Ottawa as a non-sectarian institution opens up new opportunities for a university that has already made an indelible mark on the life of the community. Its character is vividly stamped by the make-up of the new board of governors, a predominantly lay body drawn from diverse faiths and disciplines.

I shall also quote the last paragraph of this editorial:

People in this city and of Canada will want to wish the board of governors and the administration of the new University of Ottawa God's blessing in their future endeavours.

The Ottawa Journal commented editorially when the proposed changes were announced last March. On March 24, the newspaper had this to say:

It is not necessary to await all the details or the formal announcement to approve, in principle, the far-sighted plan to broaden the role of the University of Ottawa in this community and province. The key policy decision has been taken. The Oblate fathers who founded the university and tended it for more than 100 years are, in effect, turning it over to new owners.

The University of Ottawa will not be a Roman Catholic institution. It will not be an Oblate university. It will be as public an institution as McMaster or Windsor universities which have shown the way in the tradition from the denominational to non-sectarian status, such as Queen's or Toronto.

While the university becomes a public one, we would hope that it would cherish and even deepen its bilingual character. The University of Ottawa is specially able to serve the French-speaking citizens of Ontario. It should be the ornament of higher education in the French language in this province.

Nothing could be a better testimonial of the biculturalism of Canada than to have grow and flourish a bilingual university in the national capital. With goodwill, these are details that can be worked out. The fundamental changes now afoot show in what exciting days we live, and how quickly the old order is making way for the new.

Mr. Speaker, with such unanimity on the part of the local press, it is difficult to criticize this bill. This is a step forward for the good of all citizens of this province.

If my friend, the hon. member for Sudbury (Mr. Sopha) will permit me, I would like to suggest that the University of Ottawa, with its expanded facilities, will become a very special institution for graduate studies, a university where scholars from many parts of this province and this country could come to do post-graduate work in a bilingual atmosphere in order to better equip themselves for duty to their province and to their country in the fields of politics, business and diplomacy, and also as public servants.

Mr. Speaker, as spokesman for my party and as the representative of this great constituency of Ottawa East, which has the honour of having this university, I would like to say that we will support this bill.

Motion agreed to; second reading of the bill.

CONSOLIDATED REVENUE FUND

Hon. J. N. Allan (Provincial Treasurer) moves second reading of Bill No. 160, An Act to authorize the raising of money on the credit of the consolidated revenue fund.

Motion agreed to; second reading of the bill.

THE ONTARIO MENTAL HEALTH FOUNDATION ACT, 1960-1961

Hon. M. B. Dymond (Minister of Health) moves second reading of Bill No. 161, An Act to amend The Ontario Mental Health Foundation Act, 1960-1961.

Motion agreed to; second reading of the bill.

THE LIQUOR CONTROL ACT

Hon. G. C. Wardrope (Minister of Mines), in the absence of Hon. J. Yaremko (Provincial Secretary), moves second reading of Bill No. 162, An Act to amend The Liquor Control Act.

Mr. A. E. Thompson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in speaking on the principle of this bill, I would like to say that our party over the years has fought hard to get some order and rationale into The Liquor Control Act. I think that all of us have realized the ridiculous and absurd compulsion which this Act has inflicted on the people of the province, and I say that particularly for the benefit of those on the other side, who say they hate and detest compulsion. If we have ever seen the most ludicrous aspect of compulsion, we have certainly seen it in this Act, and for those, sir, who hate and detest compulsion, may I say that they let this disease fester for over 20 years.

We saw something like little Jack Horner sitting in the corner eating his Christmas pie, in that the hon. Provincial Secretary stood up—and I am sure he must have felt embarrassed and shamefaced when he was suggesting the new amendments to the Act—time after time had to say that this was not Canadian justice.

Hon. J. Yaremko (Provincial Secretary): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order—a correction, if you please—I was not ashamed; I was very proud of the amendments I was introducing. This is a change for which there is a necessity.

Mr. Thompson: Let me say, sir, that if the hon. Minister is proud of the amendments, he should have been ashamed that he had to admit that Canadian justice had not prevailed over a long period—and his government has been in for a long, long time. Over a long period he permitted injustice to persist with this Act, and now, sir, the government has come out with some amendments.

Of course we appreciate that it has brought these amendments in. It listed the new opportunities that the people will have for enjoying drinking under standards of recreation. I notice the hon. Minister omitted the bagpipes and this was brought to his attention, or he added it as an afterthought. Last night we were with a person, a former Lieutenant-Governor, who felt that instead of considering the bagpipes as an afterthought, they should have been up ahead in his—

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: I also omitted the bandore; that will be permissible too.

Mr. Thompson: Let me say that I consider that real discrimination.

Apart from this, we have asked that there should surely be a recognition by the government that the people have arrived at a sense of maturity. It was for this reason that we were suggesting that if people should wish on a Sunday that they would have wine with their meals in a recognized and a dignified manner in a dining room of quality and of standard, they should not be compelled—and let me emphasize “compelled”—not to have this privilege. But this government still feels that the people are not mature enough to have this. I understand there were some in the caucus who might have felt differently, but timidly the government went forward a little bit; I suggest to the government that it should recognize that the people of Ontario are more sophisticated and civilized than the government recognizes they are.

Let me turn to the next aspect: We have asked that there should not be a patchwork approach but there should be order in the system so that there can be proper inspection, so there can be proper standards. It is for this reason that in looking at a revision of the whole Act over the years, we have advocated, rather than having the situation of local option where the government will permit a patchwork, bringing in a whole uniform approach throughout the province in connection with the liquor laws.

And then, sir, we have had the situation that the government seems to have omitted the procedure to get a licence in a restaurant. It was not too long ago that the hon. leader of the new party (Mr. MacDonald) brought what we would consider very grave charges before a committee of the House. Frankly, we would have hoped that when he brought such charges he would substantiate them. He brought grave charges that there was an atmosphere of patronage attached to restaurants getting a licence. I think he still has the opportunity to substantiate the charges if he so wishes and we would hope that he will do this.

But anyway, there is a smog attached to the whole aspect of getting licences in restaurants. Is there any reason why there should be this smog? I suggest there is, because there are no clear ground rules for getting a licence to sell liquor in a restaurant.

Again, when the hon. Provincial Secretary was talking with emphasis about now bringing Canadian justice into The Liquor Control Act, I would have hoped he would have also thought of going a little further than he did. He talked about the right of appeal for producers and others. Surely he might have thought of the right of appeal for the restaurant owner who has put up money to provide a dignified and high standard in a restaurant and is turned down, but never knows why he is turned down and cannot appeal the decision. Does that not, somehow, seem to be less than Canadian justice?

When you make an approach to apply for a licence, you are never sure why you were turned down and you cannot appeal the reasoning of the judge who made the decision. Is that not a denial of Canadian justice? When the hon. Provincial Secretary was changing some of the Act, we had hoped that he might have had the enthusiasm to see that Canadian justice prevailed throughout the whole of the Act.

May I say that the other thing that was encouraging to us, and yet somewhat ironical, was that having enlarged the conditions under which we can have liquor and wine in the province, the government came in hurriedly, through the hon. Minister of Health, emphasizing that it was taking a new approach to alcoholics. Mr. Speaker, in view of the revenue which the government gets from the sale of liquor, I would have hoped, when we think of over 100,000 alcoholics in this province, that this government would have been emphasizing this problem long ago. I would have hoped that in the schools—as the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Nixon) has outlined time after time—I would have thought that in the schools there would have been a programme, a comprehensive programme, to indicate to the school children in this province the dangers of abuse of alcohol. I would have hoped, instead of just the few beds that are given as a pittance for the treatment of alcoholics, that there would have been a number of beds for treatment, that there would have been a whole new approach to the treatment of the alcoholic.

This surely should have been done long ago; but we have to be thankful at this point that there is some recognition that there are 100,000 people who are suffering from the disease of alcoholism.

This point has been made strongly by the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Downer). At that time I thought he spoke with a liberal philosophy with concern for the people of the province and we appreciated his remarks.

May I say, sir, that in looking at this Act, An Act to amend The Liquor Control Act, we will support the Act because we are appreciative that after 22 years the government has decided to look at the mores and the customs of its people as being those of people who have grown up, have matured and become civilized. This legislation, in a small way, gives recognition to this fact.

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): Mr. Speaker, I think for at least two years we have heard rumours and stories, some of which seem to have been inspired on the fact that the government was reviewing the liquor legislation of the province and had substantial plans for changing it. These rumours have been particularly strong in the last two months, and sometimes I got the impression that the Conservative caucus spent most of its time talking about liquor with the result we could not get onto two o'clock sessions in this House.

Then one sees the bill that is now before us, together with the bill following it on the order paper, which is really a second part of a total whole; and one can only say that the mountain has laboured and brought forth a mouse.

What we have before us, essentially, is a series of housekeeping amendments. Apparently there have been all sorts of sections in the Act that are not necessary and are being dropped. In addition, the government is abandoning enforcement procedures in the Act. The onus was shifted and it advised us that those procedures are not necessary. I presume they have not been necessary during all the years they have been there. If they are not necessary to secure satisfactory enforcement, then certainly it is most desirable that they should be removed. We in this group are happy to see them removed.

Beyond that, there really is not very much in the bill. There are provisions whereby the character of taverns may, we hope, be improved. I have often complained in this House, as have many other hon. members, of the dingy, repulsive places that go under the name of "taverns"—or I am not sure if they go under the name of "taverns"—at any rate the men's beverage rooms and the mixed beverage rooms, which are nothing but drinking emporiums. There is nothing that a person can do in there except guzzle beer or have a noisy television programme inflicted upon him while he is doing so. They are huge, dingy, unattractive rooms that, as we all know, compare most unfavourably with the English pub. I hope that the changes in the law will make it possible to change the character of these so-called beverage rooms. I am not sure that it will. Their layout is such that it is hard to see how they can be improved without considerable changes in the total approach. It is now possible, at least, to provide something other than mere guzzling in these places.

On the other hand, will the proprietor do anything about it? I do not know. I think that the liquor licence board should now put some heat on them to make these institutions a little more attractive. I would say, also, that there should be a greater emphasis in our legislation than there now is on the provision of alcoholic beverages in association with food. I am somewhat regretful at the attitude which the government continues to take with regard to the licensing of restaurants that meet reasonable standards. There are some that seem to be able to get licences, while others do not.

In fact, if one goes to the corner of Bloor and Yonge in Toronto, one will find on one side of the street a restaurant called the Club Socrates, I think, that waited for several years before it was able to get a beer and wine licence. I do not normally frequent such expensive places, but I was there once and it seemed to be a well-run establishment. I could see no reason why it could not get a licence. Recently it got one, but then another place opened on the other side of the street and had a licence at the same time as it opened up.

Now, how can that be? It is a strange sort of anomaly and it is not confined to the corner of Yonge and Bloor. One finds it all over the place. I believe that properly operated restaurants should be able to get licences. I believe that the emphasis in licensing policy should be on giving licences to those establishments that serve food and to make the licences available in association with the serving of food. On the other hand, licences should not in future be issued to establishments that do not serve food. I think that this change in policy would have an important bearing on the problem of alcoholism, about which the hon. Minister of Health was talking last night.

My understanding of the researches of the alcoholism and addictions research foundation, as published in its little magazine, Addictions, and elsewhere, is that it has found that the danger of alcoholism is reduced when the consumption of alcohol is associated with the consumption of food. I do not see, even now, any basic change in our policy that would try to associate those two things. I think the failure to permit reputable restaurants to serve wine with meals on Sundays shows a continuation of the attitude of the government that it is not particularly desirable to have food and alcohol associated.

I am not suggesting that people should have to drink with their meals; but I am suggesting that, if they do feel like taking a drink, we in our public policy should do everything possible to encourage them to do so in connection with the eating of food.

There is one change in the legislation which I do not think is a forward step at all. In fact, I think it is a retrograde step. It is one of the few significant changes; that is the new provision whereby the serving of alcoholic beverages can now take place in hotel rooms, which clearly are not, shall we say, a second home for the person who is occupying them—a home away from home. The provision that there must be evidence that the person is occupying the room as a temporary home before he can serve alcoholic beverages in the room is being removed. I am suggesting to the government that that is a retrograde step and will militate against the policy that the hon. Minister of Health enunciated last night. The effect of this, as the hon. Provincial Secretary himself explained, is that it will now be quite all right to use alcohol in hotel rooms as part of the normal process of transacting business. That is what the change is for.

A salesman sets up a sample room in a hotel and serves a few drinks to make his customers, or prospective customers, feel in a better mood; although he is technically breaking the law if that room is not being occupied by him as a place of residence. Similarly, at conferences and conventions that go on almost constantly, rooms are engaged in which alcoholic beverages are served—not in association with food—merely as a goodwill gesture. I think that the government should start to take cognizance of the problems that are arising from the increasing association of alcohol with the normal transaction of business, and which they are now facilitating by the amendment they have put before us.

The researches of the alcoholism and addictions research foundation clearly indicate that the growing custom of having a drink in connection with almost any business occasion is an important factor in the growth of alcoholism. It is a little ironical that, on the one hand, we should have the hon. Minister of Health—at long last—advising this House that steps are being taken to provide both education and treatment on a substantial scale with regard to alcoholism and, on the other hand, the hon. Provincial Secretary asking us to pass legislation which will help to create alcoholics for the hon. Minister of Health's clinic. On the basis of all modern research, that is in fact what is happening from this custom of bringing in drinks on almost every business occasion.

I may say, in addition, that the whole practice is really a disguised form of graft. The cost of the drinks that are given so freely in the interests of so-called goodwill is, of course, charged up to the company that is sponsoring the event; and that is charged back to the public in the form of the prices that the company charges. Thus we are really facilitating here a procedure whereby the public can be willy-nilly assessed by private companies to put on free cocktail parties and similar affairs in order that businessmen in the country can expose themselves to an increased risk of alcoholism. I think that the hon. Minister should reconsider that section of the bill before it gets into committee.

The government has decided that it will not change the age at which it will be possible for people to purchase or consume alcoholic beverages. We, in this group, think it is right in that decision; except in one respect. I really cannot understand why the government persists in maintaining the myth that it can prevent parents from permitting their own children, under age, to consume alcoholic beverages in their own homes. We hear a great deal about the invasion of privacy and about the undesirability of compulsion. Now, by what moral right does the government claim to tell parents how they are going to regulate the conduct of their children? There are many people now in this country from Europe, whose customs are perhaps a little different from some of the extreme puritanical customs under which some of us were brought up, and who regularly serve wine with meals—at the family table—to the children as well as to themselves. Let us face it, the law of the province of Ontario says that is illegal. The law of the province of Ontario has no effect on the custom whatever. It does not prevent it. People regularly violate the law. All we do by such a silly law is to bring the law into disrepute.

It is something like the law that was on the statutes up until just a few years ago, under which it was illegal for a man to drink a glass of beer in his own backyard. We can all recall that the ridiculousness of that provision of the law was called forcibly to public attention by a magistrate in Kitchener who said he had to convict a man of that heinous offence because he clearly had committed it; but that it was a matter of grave regret to him to convict and penalize a man for doing what a thousand other people in the city of Kitchener were doing at exactly the same time. As a result of that publicity, we removed the ridiculous anomaly from the law.

I am suggesting to the government that it should also remove the ridiculous anomaly under which it pretends that it can prevent parents from serving wine to their own children in their own homes. The alcoholism and addictions research foundation has stated that this is an unenforceable law, that it contributes nothing to the liquor control legislation of the province and that it would be desirable to remove the provision. So why does the government not face up to reality and take its courage in its hands to the limited degree that is necessary in this case by making it abundantly clear that the law does not try to dictate what parents will do with respect to their own children?

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I would like to make one or two comments on the question of local option. The government has seen fit to retain that principle in the legislation of the province. We do not object to this decision, in fact we support it. Normally, we do not believe in legislation by plebiscite, which this in effect is, but there are always exceptions to every rule. There is no question that the local option principle with regard to liquor is well established in the traditions of this province, and indeed, of most of this country. It has worked reasonably well in the past, there is every prospect that it will work in the future and under those circumstances we think that it should be retained, as we have usually argued.

I think there probably has been some pressure from cities to have local option removed, I do not know. But actually the local option principle does not apply in cities of a population of 50,000 or over in any case. We in this group believe that if people in a rural community do not wish to have liquor outlets or wish only to have certain limited kinds of outlets in their communities, that is their business. We do not see any reason why people in cities should impose their will upon them.

There is, however, one aspect of this problem that I would like to call to the attention of the government and the House: We are engaged inevitably in this province in significant municipal reorganization. The municipality of Metropolitan Toronto, of course, is the outstanding example. The process is one that has been going on for a long time and will undoubtedly accelerate in the future. Municipal boundaries will be redrawn, and new municipal units will be created. I would suggest to the government that, in retaining the local option principle, it should ensure that it does not thereby entrench a local option decision of some time in the remote past, made when the municipal boundaries were in a certain form, which becomes unchangeable after those boundaries alter.

I do not think I have to dwell upon the anomalies that exist right within the city limits of the city of Toronto proper, where two areas of the city, because of some ancient decisions, are dry areas. I do not think that the residents of the areas are any drier than the residents of any other areas. They just go to other people's neighbourhoods to get a few drinks, but they scrupulously keep these terrible institutions, which they themselves are often willing to patronize, off their own main streets.

Hon. A. Grossman (Minister of Reform Institutions): Is the hon. member talking about Bill Temple, the former CCF member?

Mr. Bryden: I was not talking about anybody.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: He strongly supported that view.

Mr. Bryden: Many people have different views. There are many different views on these questions.

I am suggesting to the government that although it is fine to retain the local option principle, it should make sure that in doing so, it does not entrench anomalies of that kind in the future. It should try to consider the principle in terms of up-to-date municipal boundaries. I do not think I have to belabour the point; I think we are all familiar with the anomalies existing in Toronto. I hope the government in the development of its legislation will try to avoid that sort of problem in the future.

Mr. Speaker, in conclusion may I say that we in this group support this bill with the exception of one section to which I have made reference. We will deal with that section again when we come to it in committee. Otherwise, we support the bill, indeed one could say that this bill and Bill No. 163 are two pretty innocuous documents. It would be hard to whip oneself into an attitude of opposing them.

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): Mr. Speaker, I am a little disappointed that when the hon. Provincial Secretary went on his tour of discovery, which involved his finding that there was such a thing called Canadian justice, he did not find out that it was perhaps against the ideals of Canadian justice to allow the continuance of arbitrary decisions from administrative boards without appeals. To complete his exercise in his voyage of discovery he could have and he should have brought in a system of appeals from the decisions of the liquor licence board and the liquor control board.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that as we see the government stand up clothed in this self-righteousness, talking about discovering Canadian justice, we have to look at some of the basics of Canadian justice. There is nothing more arbitrary than leaving the important decisions that can affect the livelihood of individuals to the arbitrary, unreasoned decisions of the administrative boards. The simplest thing that could have been done in both of these Acts would be to write in sections which would compel written decisions in connection with each determination made by either the liquor licence board or the liquor control board.

Second, provision should be made for appeal from these decisions to other bodies. When the appeal system is from Caesar to Caesar, when one appeals from the liquor licence board to the liquor licence board, or from the liquor control board to the liquor control board, there can be nothing more arbitrary, there can be nothing that is more obviously a denial of Canadian justice. I just wish that the hon. Provincial Secretary had continued on his voyage of discovery, if he really was on one at all. I suggest that his approach in his presentation—that he has suddenly discovered Canadian justice—means very little, because the government has not struck at the roots of justice and equity in continuing to grant these arbitrary powers to the two boards.

Mr. E. W. Sopha (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, I heartily endorse this bill because to me it is a vindication of some remarks that I made in this Legislature during the first session when I had the privilege to sit in it, in respect of the appeal provisions that have been drastically altered in principle in this statute.

I am going to deal with that just a little bit later, but I want to digress to say that the problem of alcohol has been a very vexing one and one fraught with great anxiety among governments in this country, and a problem indeed, sir, which, as you know yourself, has been attended with much human misery and suffering. It strikes me that many of our approaches to the problem of alcohol within our community give all the earmarks of being somewhat in the category of panic measures. We recognize the breadth and scope of the problem and it always strikes me that government is attempting frantically to deal with it.

I noted with interest the comments of the hon. Minister of Health about his new scheme for the handling of alcoholic people who are taken into custody. He made the remarkable statement that whether this new system works or not, it does not really matter in respect of our trying it, because certainly the one that we had before did not work at all. I think he used the phrase, if I quote him correctly, "Anything would be better than the former system, which was based upon custody."

I think that gives proof to what I say, that our approach has been anything but scientific and it has been a frantic grasping after some panacea that we hope will do something to mitigate the evil effects of the force of alcohol and its impact upon our society.

I listened to a psychologist a year or so ago, who had made a study of the history of alcohol in North America. I will not go into the details of his account of it, but he pointed out very significantly that the impact of the reformed and non-conformist churches on North America was such that alcohol was looked upon by the adherents of those churches as being an evil per se, with the result that there had developed in North America an attitude toward alcohol that was completely different from the attitude of central Europeans. He summed it up this way:

Central Europeans, through their cultural folkways in the handling of alcohol, meet and drink; North Americans meet to drink.

That "meet to drink" is summed up by the oft-quoted phrase that you hear among North Americans: "You get the hotel room and I will get the booze."

It is my own opinion that we can never reach the Everest of conquest of the problems of alcohol until we change the attitude of our citizens, particularly our young citizens, toward alcohol.

I said that three or four years ago, and I recall one March 17 when we had a day-long debate on the problems of alcohol and the government approach to it. I think, beyond question, the government intended to lower the drinking age to 18 years, because so many respectable organizations and so many clergy could not have got that impression if there had not been a germ of truth to it. Some of the reformed churches made very frantic and emphatic protests to the Prime Minister of the province until finally he gave his assurance that there was no intention of lowering the age to 18 years.

I would be unequivocally opposed to lowering the age to 18 years, and I base my opposition on scientific grounds. I am told by those learned in the science of alcohol and its impact upon the human system, that if a person takes to using alcohol in excess at the age of 17 or 18, then anywhere from 15 to 20 years later, the chances are about three out of five, that that person is going to have a problem with alcohol. It is extremely likely that that person is going to become an alcoholic.

And what is meant by excessive use of alcohol? I am told by scientists that anything over one or two ounces of alcohol taken in a short period of time is excessive use. The reason is that as soon as alcohol is taken into the human system, the human body treats it as a foreign substance—a poison, in fact—and the human body wants to get rid of it. Anything the human body wants, upon intake it begins to break down into those nutritional factors that the body needs.

But not so with C_2H_5OH . The body wants to reject it immediately. The problem, of course—and I do not say it facetiously—is with the liver. The liver is the main organ that tries to break down the alcohol and get it out of the system. It works at a very slow rate. If one or two ounces is taken in a short space of time, the liver gets away behind in its task, the alcohol gets into the blood stream, courses through the system and affects the intellectual centres.

I suppose that is the reason Aldous Huxley called alcohol the "mind changer," because the alcohol gets into the cranial nerve centres and something happens in there to change a person's mind. He does things because of its effect upon the lobotomy that he would not do when sober. For that reason, I would be very loath to support any principle at any time that would lower the drinking age to below that which it is now.

I agree with the hon. member for Woodbine that if the individual parent—and I hope he is a sensible parent—wishes to encourage his children into a very continent, reasonable, sane approach to alcohol, then that is the prerogative of the parents. I wish I could feel that if we gave a licence to the whole of society to permit the indulgence in alcoholic beverages to children in their homes, it would be used in a responsible way, but I cannot even feel that assurance.

Now drinking on Sunday is a different matter. How many times have I heard Judge Robb say that what we want to encourage in this province is the consumption of alcoholic beverage with food. I am one who pays very close attention to television advertising of alcoholic beverages—only beer of course, because the liquor interests have never put forward any claims to use the electronic medium for the advertising of their wares—but I watch the television advertising of beer and I do not see much association of beer with the eating of food. More often, if I judge correctly, it is associated with the great outdoors. In other words, to be a red-blooded, healthy, masculine North American or Canadian citizen, you go into the great outdoors, of which we have so much in this country, and you cannot possibly feel content in those wilderness places unless you have a case of Carling's or Labatt's with you.

You simply will not enjoy yourself and especially, I gather, if you get in a canoe and you are shooting the most dangerous rapids on one of our larger rivers—you cannot exercise that manoeuvre with accuracy and good judgment—unless you have 12 Labatt's.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Sopha: It is like the advertisement I saw one time about Canadian Club in one of the slick magazines. The title always reads: "Wherever you go in the world you will find Canadian Club." There was a picture of a mountain climber, and the caption underneath claimed the mountain climber was 8,000 feet up the mountain and after he completed the climb, he would sit down to a drink of Canadian Club. I wondered if he had had a few shots of it before he started up so that he would be able to execute the manoeuvre with more agility or—if he fell—after a few charges of Canadian Club, it would not hurt as much.

Judge Robb has said time and time again—and I have seen Judge Robb in operation on many occasions—when a person comes and wants an extension of the facilities which he is operating—the very first question the judge asks him is, "How many meals did you sell last year?" That appears to be the basis, the cardinal rule, for Judge Robb's consideration of whether these extended facilities will be granted.

Therefore, if we want to encourage the consumption of alcoholic beverage with the taking of food, I would be in favour of the sale of alcoholic beverages in good restaurants with meals on Sundays. We have been condemned from many a corner for the puritan aspects of our Sundays, and I would think that this would be a step in the right direction.

Again, with the lowering of the age of consumption of alcohol to 18, the sale on Sundays was one of the things bruited about the community, and it was thought that the government was going to take that step. Unfortunately in this bill as it is before us, the government has not summoned up sufficient courage to take that step, and I, for one, regret it.

Now, my hon. leader spoke the truth when he referred to this business of "Canadian justice," and it is strange that this morning I should say that I am very suspicious of any concept identified as "Canadian justice." I would want to look that one over for a while, because, with my experience of the law, I prefer British justice, to "Canadian justice." I prefer the thousand years of jurisprudence which is now crystalized in the decisions of the British courts and in the development of the common law, to any concept of "Canadian justice." And knowing, as I do, that many of the judicial occupants of the bench have not got the time under our system to write reasons to support their decisions, I would prefer to keep the reliance on the decisions of the Court of King's Bench, the Court of Chancery, the House of Lords, as we do, and which after all, forms the great body of the common law, of which we are the inheritors.

So I suspect this concept that the hon. Provincial Secretary has discovered of "Canadian justice."

To go back to my earlier assertion, and I say particularly to my hon. leader, through you, sir, that we should be joyful that they have in this bill taken out those sections relating to appeals from convictions under this Act, and a principle, which—and I measure my words carefully—bastardized one of the most important principles of the criminal law. Nowhere in any other statute, in any other jurisdiction, did I ever see the vicious principle inherent in section 140 of The Liquor Control Act which has now come out.

These people who talk about compulsion, that are against compulsion, have enshrined in that statute a feature of compulsion which, if you were convicted of an offence under the Act, before you could appeal and get a re-hearing and a review by a superior court you had to swear a solemn affidavit—under oath—to say that you had not committed the offence with which you were charged. So gone was all the jurisprudence relating to the burden upon the Crown to prove the guilt of the accused. Gone too were all the procedures of the criminal courts and the protections given to the accused. If the accused wanted to appeal on a matter of procedure; if he wanted to tell the appellate court that he did not receive a fair trial in the court of first instance; if, indeed, he was denied the right to cross-examine his accusers, then before he could take that miscarriage of justice up to an appellate court he had to swear an affidavit saying that he did not commit the offence.

Even The Opium and Narcotic Drugs Act, relating to poisonous substance which does far more harm to the individual—though not to society—than alcohol, did not have the appeal provisions in it that were in The Liquor Control Act, and which this government left enshrined there for 22 years. Indeed, in the session 1961-62, after much pressure had been brought to bear about appeals from the liquor licence board in respect to the cancellation of licences, this government lifted the appeal provisions out of The Liquor Control Act and, by the enactment of section 43a of The Liquor Licence Act, said the appeal provisions of The Liquor Control Act shall apply to The Liquor Licence Act. So before a person who had his liquor licence cancelled could appeal, he also had to swear an affidavit to say that he had not committed the offence. Again there was a denigration, if not a mutilation, of the well-tried principle of the criminal law that the burden is upon the accuser to prove that the accused committed the offence—and to prove it beyond a reasonable doubt.

So it is a matter of great joy to me, because I recall that I raised this point during the estimates of The Department of the Attorney General in the session of 1960. So, five or six years later, one sees fruition of the things that one sought; after all, that is not really too long a period to wait in terms of human affairs, I suppose.

With the abolition of the appeal procedures, the hon. Provincial Secretary and his advisers have gone through the Act and they have removed many other features that were in violation of well-established rights. For example, they take out sections 111 to 115, which gave fearsome powers to the police if they sniffed alcohol. All the police had to do was sniff the odour of it and then, under section 112, they could come in your house, your motor vehicle, your automobile, vessel, boat, canoe or conveyance of any description and search for liquor.

Then they have removed the one that shifted the burden of proof from the Crown to the accused, section 133. So, having accomplished that—having cleaned up this statute—and I am looking at the hon. Attorney General (Mr. Wishart), then let us turn to The Securities Act, which is the other great offender against well-established principles of the common law and the criminal law. Let us take the arbitrary features out of it, some of which are far worse than this one. Then you will, in the community, be able to hold up your head and say: "We are against compulsion in any form."

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: Mr. Speaker, just a word or two. On the occasion of the introduction of the liquor control bill and the liquor licence bill, I did take—with your indulgence and the indulgence of the hon. members of the House—some time in a very thorough explanation of all the principles which ran through the two bills. It is not my purpose, at this time, to review them.

I think, with respect to the remarks made by the hon. leader of the Opposition, that the point of view of the Liberal Party and the point of view of the government is—as he is wont to say—on the record. The people, in due course, will make their future decisions on the basis of what has been said in the course of these discussions. However, there are one or two points which hon. members have raised which I should like to touch upon.

The hon. member for Woodbine did express his support of the principle of liquor with food and in this he was concurred with by the hon. member for Sudbury. This, in fact, is, and has been, one of the very basic principles which has underlined the licensing policies of the liquor licence board throughout at least the last half dozen years—if not the past decade. As proof of this, I would draw to the attention of the hon. members of the House a pamphlet which I have here, called Guide to Good Eating in Toronto, issued with the compliments of a utility corporation—which I shall not name. You can, I believe, pick up copies at the entrance of the Legislature from The Department of Tourism and Information attendants. In this pamphlet there are listed the names of some 97 restaurants, as such, they are really first-rate dining places. I suggest to the hon. members of this House, that these 97 can scarcely be duplicated in any city around the world.

Toronto is becoming a very cosmopolitan city, one of the great cities of the world. In this list you will find dining places and dining rooms, the facilities, food and service of which are equal to that of London, New York, Mexico City, Tokyo and any of the other great cities of the world.

The interesting thing about it is that prices, compared with what any member of this House, who might pay $10 or more per person in any of these other cities, are within the reach of the ordinary man in this city of Toronto.

I should like to take this opportunity of stressing the fact that it is the combination of food and liquor, the consumption of food and alcoholic beverages, which has underlined the basic attitude of the licensing board—as is evidenced by what it has licensed in Metropolitan Toronto. This has been duplicated to some degree throughout the rest of the province, in those urban areas where the community will supply a sufficient number of clientele to warrant the capital investment of the type of facility that I am speaking of.

I direct the attention of the hon. member for Woodbine in this regard. As a matter of fact, those in the list that are not licensed have really not been licensed by virtue of the fact that they do not wish to be licensed, have not been in operation for a sufficient length of time to be licensed, or came under the provisions of a local option bylaw. If there is any dining place which has a standard, which is of a kind that the hon. member has described, they either have been licensed or probably could be licensed in the very near future.

With respect to the question of alcoholism, and in this I want the hon. members of the Legislature to know that in the course of the study that has been going on, all departments that have had an interest in the consumption of alcoholic beverages have had a liaison and have been in contact with each other.

As I stated in my opening remarks, just as we execute the will of the people in meeting the needs of the second half of this century, so, too, we have been aware of some of the problems that are created in this field. I suggest that the hon. Minister of Health has announced that this is not something that is springing from nowhere. The alcoholism and drug addiction research foundation has already won for itself a reputation around the world, and in this field the province of Ontario has led.

With the programme that the hon. Minister of Health has announced, we will be far in the forefront of other jurisdictions that have been held up as examples in Europe and other parts of the world. This is a bilateral approach to this matter.

I would point out one factor though—for the hon. leader of the Opposition has criticized this fact in relation to the income derived from the sale of alcoholic beverages—that the federal government derives even more across the country. To my knowledge, not one single dollar of this is expended by it in any way, either in education or in combating the effects of alcoholism. Just think, and I suggest this to the hon. members of the House, when the hon. Minister of Health has announced a programme which envisages the expenditure of some $18 million in the course of dealing with this in a programme over the next few years, what a wonderful thing it would be if the federal government said to the provinces, "Because we derive revenues from this exact source, we will provide a matching dollar." The province of Ontario would then have $36 million for a programme of this kind. I would like to see the hon. leader of the Opposition take the opportunity of rapping his desk to indicate his firm approval of this approach having been taken.

The hon. member for Woodbine did raise the point of the local option section and supported it, but he brought out some of the problems he saw in the expansion of municipalities, and the problems that arise when one municipality, with one set of liquor laws by virtue of its previous determination under the local option privileges, will have a set of laws different from the annexed or to-be-annexed area. It is interesting to note that this has had some widespread discussion throughout the province in the last two years. One of the municipalities passed a resolution to this effect, and it was followed by some three dozen municipalities that subscribed to its resolution.

The problem, as I see it, is that those who have supported this resolution seem to have looked at it from the point of view of a so-called wet area annexing a dry area. Then, accordingly, by adoption of that resolution, the dry area would take unto itself the wet laws of the annexing municipalities. This would, in effect, do away with the principle of local option privileges within the annexed area.

I point out to those people, however, that the other side of the coin is that there are municipalities in the province of Ontario that are dry, and which in the course of annexation proceedings, would annex areas which are to some degree wet or wetter than the annexing municipality. One can well imagine that if this situation arose and if we were to adopt the principle as expounded by the hon. member for Woodbine, we would then be injecting into the proposition of annexation of municipalities, this rather extraneous item:

Rather than people being concerned, sir, with the merits of the annexation as such, and whether the community would benefit by having an enlarged municipality in this regard—and this, by itself, has been a controversial subject in some communities in the past—we would be injecting a very highly emotional item upon which people have some very strong opinions. They would be basing their support or opposition to annexation not on the merits of annexation and the enlargement of municipalities, but on this, what I call, extraneous item.

It is true that this has created difficulties in the past. I think the city of Peterborough, by virtue of certain annexations of portions of townships which surrounded it, at one time had at least four or five sets of laws in the municipality after all the annexations had taken place. However, by virtue of procedures worked out by the city clerk and by the chief election officer, who has supervision of this, a vote was taken and the matter was settled to the satisfaction of the whole community.

It is my feeling, both that of myself and others who have made studies in this field, that this procedure, which we have accepted in the past, will continue. Even in the areas which were referred to as the west Toronto area and north Toronto area, procedures are in the process of being carried out in order that the people might give an expression to their opinions under the local option bylaws.

Mr. Singer: Utter nonsense!

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: Mr. Speaker, I listened with a great deal of interest to what the hon. member for Downsview, whose chief word in his vocabulary in the exercise of his function as a member of the Opposition seems to be "utter nonsense"—

Mr. Singer: It applies so well to the hon. Provincial Secretary, I cannot think of a better word.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: The people of the province will decide this.

Mr. Speaker, when the two Acts, The Liquor Licence Act and The Liquor Control Act came to me by way of reporting to the Legislature on behalf of the boards, I went through them very thoroughly. I acquainted myself in detail with the various sections and at that time became intimately aware of the sections in which the principles to which I have referred to as the principles of Canadian justice seemed to be in conflict. It became a personal study of mine, and a very thorough study of the responsible authorities and of those others who participated. I am very proud indeed, as I pointed out to the hon. leader of the Opposition, that I have the responsibility for introducing the bills that bring about these changes.

I was very much interested in those remarks.

I wish to point out to hon. members of the Legislature as they go through the sections, that we have provided for appeals from the decisions of the liquor control board in respect of the cancellation of licences. This has been introduced earlier in respect of the licence board in this House—and I will refer to that in greater detail in a moment. We have provided for appeals by way of a stated case in respect of all items, so that we have provided for appeals in all those fields which are necessary for the welfare of the citizens, concomitant at the same time with the discharge by the two boards of the responsibilities assigned to them by this Legislature in carrying out the administrative functions of these two boards.

There is just one item on which I want to conclude. I am going to take this opportunity because I have listened to lectures on law from the hon. member for Sudbury for some time—and today he got into the field of health. I was very interested when the hon. member appeared before the commission on civil rights to speak on behalf of himself and not the Liberal Party. He went into quite a diatribe—that is the word he would use—on the shocking proceedings and arbitrary actions of the liquor licence board. I quote here from the Toronto Daily Star:

The liquor board may deprive a man of his licence, ruin his financial investment of hundreds of thousands of dollars, drive him into poverty and the courts cannot even inquire whether the board came to a just conclusion.

Now, I think he has learned something in the interval. Today he referred to the fact that in 1962, this Legislature—of which he was an hon. member—introduced a section re appeals against the decisions of the liquor licence board. That which in 1965 he accuses the board of being able to do was put an end to in 1962. No man can be deprived of his licence without the right of appeal to the court of appeal and that right has been had since 1962.

I am afraid that the hon. member for Sudbury committed what is considered in practice as an almost unforgiveable sin. Even the most fledgling law student would not be forgiven if in reference to a statute, he went to the Revised Statutes of Ontario, 1960, and did not read all the statutes that came in between. I am afraid that is just what happened to the hon. member for Sudbury. He read RSO, 1960, and did not read the Statutes of Ontario, 1962.

I say to the hon. members of this House, no man, and indeed no corporation, after this bill will have been introduced, can be deprived of a license without an appeal to the courts of this land.

THE POLICE ACT

House in committee on Bill No. 123, An Act to amend The Police Act.

Sections 1 to 5, inclusive, agreed to.

On section 6:

Hon. A. A. Wishart (Attorney General): Mr. Chairman, I move that subsection 2 of section 6, be amended by striking out the words "first day of July 1965" in the third line, and inserting in lieu thereof "first day of January 1966," so that the subsection shall read as follows:

Section 23 of The Police Act as re-enacted by subsection 1 does not apply in respect of acts of members of police forces occurring before the 1st day of January 1966.

The purpose is quite clear, I think, to extend the time, the effective date of the coming into force of that provision.

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): Mr. Chairman, section 6 is the section which involves, in principle, the inclusion of civilian employees within the police bargaining unit, and makes applicable all of the provisions of The Police Act to civilian employees. The mechanics in the garages, the clerks, the typists, the people who maintain and clean up the police stations and that sort of thing, all now become a part of the police bargaining unit. As a result of that, I think that these persons are put into a very difficult position. I can see no reason or logic in it at all, and I know in fact that the police organizations are not interested in this, either.

We have taken away from policemen the right to strike, as we should. We have taken away the right to strike from the firemen. But if the garage mechanic in a police station wants to go on strike, why should he be put into that position? Why should the typists? Why should the clerks? Why should the maintenance staff of the police stations be put into that position?

There was a decision, I am sure, Mr. Chairman, that the hon. Attorney General is aware of, that came down fairly recently, that the garage mechanics working for the Windsor police commission did not come within the police bargaining unit, and as a result of that we are getting this amendment here. Surely all of these groups should have their independent right to bargain. I suggest, Mr. Chairman, what is being done is that the government is taking away through the back door, this right of theirs to organize and to bargain collectively themselves, and I do not think this should be allowed.

I can see no reason at all for the inclusion of section 6 here. Why should the civilian employees of police forces be put into the same position as police are, insofar as their negotiations with their employers are concerned? I think this is a bad section and I wish that the hon. Attorney General would take it back and have another look at it. I can see nothing that is going to be achieved, other than the infliction on this group of people of an untenable position insofar as they themselves are concerned.

It is too bad that in Windsor this type of dispute arose. Surely the garage mechanics in Windsor should be able to work out their own salvation under the provisions of the pertinent statutes, and because they won a victory in the courts, now the government is taking it away by legislation.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, I would like to make it clear that I submit there is no denial of the right of bargaining, and working out of arrangements of this nature. These people will be treated, however, as members of the police force.

The reason for policemen, constables and members of the police force being denied the right to strike and go off duty in a dispute of that kind, is so that we may maintain law and order. The garage mechanics, the persons who run the telephone switchboards, and all the people who work with the police force, could very well put it out of commission by refusing to go to work. The police would be immobilized, the communications could break down; these people are, when they take on that responsibility and that work, in effect, members of the police force.

I submit, and I think quite clearly, that it was always the intention that that should be so. The court decision reached an opposite judgment and said these people are outside the police force. It was never intended that they should be. Those who work with the police force, are part of the police force, and the Act just simply makes that clear. But the police do not complain of the denial of the right of bargaining and of being improperly treated in all labour matters, and in all matters which deal with all the features of their employment. These people will be no different.

It being 12.30 o'clock, p.m., the House took recess.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

Hon. A. A. Wishart (Attorney General): Mr. Chairman, I have to pray the indulgence of the House in connection with Bill 123 which is before the House now. I overlooked an amendment which I proposed to make in section 4 and also one which I had intended to propose in section 5. They are both the same, actually, and I would now, with the consent of the House, move that we might consider these. I move that:

Subsection 1 of section 13 of The Police Act, as contained in section 4 of the bill, be amended by striking out the words, "and assistants" in the fourth and fifth lines, and inserting in lieu thereof the words, "assistants and civilian employees."

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): Oh now wait, Mr. Chairman.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, if I might, before the hon. member speaks—and this is on the subject we were discussing when the House rose—the amendment on section 5 is in the same tenor, and if I might read it it has to do with the matter we were discussing in section 6. I move with respect to section 5, Mr. Chairman:

That subsection 2 of section 19 of The Police Act, as contained in section 5 of the bill, be amended by striking out the words "and assistants," in the fourth line, and inserting in lieu thereof, "assistants and civilian employees."

I might say, Mr. Chairman, that in effect, these two amendments are the same, and they are complementary and in the same tenor as the language of section 6 which we were discussing when the House rose.

I regret I overlooked those two amendments and I now bring them before the House.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Mr. Chairman, may I speak on a procedural point for one moment? I wonder if it would not be just as well to stick to section 6 where we were debating the principles of this issue. If it is resolved here, presumably it can apply to both cases.

Mr. Chairman: I was just going to suggest that. We will go on with section 6.

Mr. Singer: My hon. friend for York South suggests that we stay on section 6; actually, the amendments now brought in by the hon. Attorney General to section 4 and 5 make the intent that much more obvious.

I was not satisfied at all, Mr. Chairman, with the hon. Attorney General's explanation for this. He said it was always the intention of the Legislature, in his mind, that civilian employees be included as members of the police force, but suddenly the Supreme Court of Canada came along and said, "No, you never said that."

The legislation speaks for itself and the Supreme Court of Canada is the last word. I would suspect, Mr. Chairman, that this is only a matter of comparative novelty, that for the first time there have been organizational efforts made, and perhaps successful organizational efforts made, among the civilian employees of police forces. You are not going to make anyone believe, Mr. Chairman, that if the maintenance men who look after the lawns around a police station want to go on strike it is going to endanger the enforcement of justice; you are not going to make anyone believe that if the clerks who write the letters, who are civilian employees, decide that their working conditions are not satisfactory and they cannot make a satisfactory bargain with their employers and they decide—as is their right, as is the right of everybody in the province of Ontario—to deny their work to their employers, that the administration of justice is going to collapse.

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that we are embarking on a brand-new principle; and the principle is a bad one, a very bad one. My hon. friend says that if the mechanics in Windsor went on strike that possibly the cruisers would not get out on the road. By the same token if General Motors wants to go on strike and there are no spare parts I suppose that would endanger the administration of justice. By the same token, if the milkman who supplies milk to the police chief goes on strike and he is not able to go to work because his child is sick, that would endanger the administration of justice. How far along the line do you extend this principle?

If the police forces want to have this sort of control—and my understanding is, Mr. Chairman, that the police forces do not want to have this type of control; there may be a few members of police commissions who do, but the police forces themselves do not want to have to bargain for the non-police personnel—if this is their desire, then bring these people in and put them in uniform, the same as was done in wartime. You can have police clerks in uniform, you can have police mechanics in uniform. If they are policemen, make them policemen; but I suggest that this section as it is before us is a real invasion of the right to bargain collectively and a real invasion of the privileges that are granted in The Labour Relations Act.

If people, having gone through the legal steps that are laid down, cannot agree to agree, then they can agree to disagree and it is within their power and their privilege to withhold their labour. I suggest that the attempt to take this right away is a real infringement on the right of organized labour to organize and to bargain together collectively. It is nothing more or less than that, Mr. Chairman, and any suggestion that the whole field of the administration of justice is going to be slowed down or harmed by the fact that the situation is allowed to continue as the Supreme Court of Canada says the statutes are written is, I think, an attempt to draw a red herring across the trail.

I do not think that the first part of section 6, should become a part of the law of the province of Ontario.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, I was unavoidably out of the House when we began the debate on this before the noon adjournment and I do not want to repeat anything that the hon. member for Downsview has said about the general background and the principles involved here, but I do want to add a word by way of general plea to the hon. Attorney General and to the government with regard to what they are seeking to do in these amendments.

What has distressed me about this government is its capacity, on the one hand, to pay lip service to the principle of granting collective bargaining rights and its willingness—indeed, on occasion, its eagerness—to limit the full exercise of those collective bargaining rights. We have had many debates in this House on a related matter—section 89—related in the sense that the government grants collective bargaining rights generally under The Labour Relations Act and then it ends up its Act by a sting in the tail, so to speak, with a concluding section which grants the power to certain people, namely, municipal councils and bodies thereof throughout the province of Ontario, to take away these rights.

Now, you cannot, on basic rights, grant them and then give somebody the power to take them away. In my view, collective bargaining rights in the second half of the twentieth century are a basic civil right of people in a free society.

You did it in section 89. You did it a year or so ago in regard to the Crown agencies, by accident. You brought in an amendment expressly for the purpose of relieving Crown agencies of certain tax obligations—these would be the federal authorities—and then you discovered that the lawyers could interpret this as bringing Crown agencies, or the employees of Crown agencies, into the categories of civil servants so that they could be deprived of the right of collective bargaining.

What has this government done? Did they come in and say that this was an unexpected development; “unwittingly, we have deprived these people of their rights”? No; they were quite willing, they were almost anxious, to perpetuate an unwitting denial of full collective bargaining rights to people, who in the first instance, by their own words, did not want or seek to take away these rights.

We have another example of it here. The hon. member for Downsview has put on the record that there were cases across the province which gradually built up to the kind of situation which has provoked the introduction of this amendment. The last case and the most illuminating one was the case with reference to the Windsor situation and the garage mechanics. The garage mechanics in Windsor were members of what was known as the Windsor civic local, with a separate contract. Following merger, they got into difficulties in resolving their contract and they sought conciliation from the Ontario labour relations board. The board refused to grant conciliation services and so the case was taken to the courts and in the highest court of the land—the supreme court—it was decided that these people should not be deprived of their rights.

On occasion we in this House have had to cope with circumstances in which the court made a decision that was technically accurate in terms of the law and therefore we sought to correct the law so that you would not have to have this kind of decision being made by the court with a denial of certain rights flowing from it. But in this instance, you have a court establishing the rights of these people, saying that these people have these rights and they should not be taken away from them.

What does the government do? Do they accept this decision of the courts which bolsters and confirms the rights of these people? No; now they are going to come in and change the law so that the courts cannot protect the basic rights of these people for full collective bargaining. It seems to me that this is a pretty indefensible procedure by people who like to pay lip service to principles and then in the next Act deny the right of people to be able to realize these principles in everyday existence.

This, in essence, is the situation before us. As the hon. member for Downsview said, this government has had to cope with the problem of where you draw the line in essential public services for arbitration procedures. We have tried to draw the line so that we do not classify any and every industry, on flimsy excuses, as being so essential to the public that we have to have arbitration. The same kind of an argument is used by the hon. Attorney General: Because the clerks may not be able to type the letters that would assist the police forces in doing the job they have to be described under the Act as members of this police force and therefore have their right to qualify. The same applies for garage mechanics, the same for anybody else; anybody who becomes associated with the police force, notwithstanding—and I emphasize this once again, as the hon. member has done—notwithstanding the fact that the police association, made up of the policemen themselves, not the commissions, are not anxious to have all the civilian employees brought in under the restrictive arbitration procedures that have been laid down for coping with differences in labour-management relationships in this field.

I think this is an important principle and I am shocked and disturbed to find the government once again being willing to violate this principle. It underlines what we have said, and usually it has provoked outbursts of protest from the government side of the House, that whenever you have a situation which will permit it, you will come up with an anti-labour decision. You will restrict as much as you can the full collective bargaining rights, and that is what you are doing in this instance.

For that reason, Mr. Chairman, I want to bring this matter to a head and I move that:

Subsection 1 of section 6 of Bill 123 be amended by striking out the proposed new section 22 of the Act.

Mr. Chairman: Mr. MacDonald moves that:

Subsection 1 of section 6 of Bill 123 be amended by striking out the proposed new section 22 of the Act.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, there is a clear and simple principle at stake here, and as I have said earlier in discussion of this section, I am satisfied—and I think anyone who looks at the legislation in The Police Act would be satisfied—that the intention was that anyone who was a member or employed in the operation of a police force should be subject to the provisions of The Police Act, one of which is that members of police forces shall not be entitled to strike.

There is what appears to me to be a very confused situation here when hon. members get up and say, "But you are depriving the people of collective bargaining rights." This, let me make clear, is not so for one moment. There are several sections in The Police Act, beginning, I think, at section 26 under the heading, "Bargaining and arbitration," and those sections run through the Act, up to and including section 35, all having to do with the right of members of police forces to bargain and to have their bargaining subject to arbitration. I think you will not hear, and I have not heard, members of police forces complain that they are badly dealt with.

The principle is that persons who are charged with the protection of the public, protection of property, enforcement of law and maintenance of order, should not have the right to walk off the scene on strike—that is firemen and police. In this Legislature this session there are certain restrictions being discussed on the right of strike with respect to hospital employees. Perhaps that is an encroachment, but the principle, however, has long been established and long been clear, that in these areas where protection of persons, prevention of damage to property, enforcement and administration of law, the persons responsible should not be permitted, should they have a desire to strike. But their rights to bargain are maintained and the Act is very specific and clear. All we are saying here is that any person employed by a police force is a member of the force.

Mr. MacDonald: That is the violation.

Mr. Singer: That is the violation, surely.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I consider it no violation. It is all very well for the hon. member for Downsview to say "Put them into uniform." What does that do for them?

Mr. Singer: Then you are making policemen of them.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Stop and think a moment. What difference does it make whether a man is dressed in blue or grey, or civilian clothes or a blue uniform?

Mr. Singer: It makes an awful lot of difference.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: If it was going to help the situation, I would be glad to put him in a uniform, but I do not see that that changes the basic facts of the matter for one moment or one iota. Why dress a man up in blue and say, "That takes care of the situation?" It does not. His rights are not going to be changed. He is a member of the police force and let me say to you, that with the communication system we have today, with the mobile type of forces we have today—radio communication, telephone communication, Telex, motorcycle squads—and the maintenance which is necessary for our police vehicles and on the switchboards which run those very fast and efficient communication systems, if those people—and I think they are very loyal and capable employees, but I say they are part of the police force, part and parcel of it—were to walk off, they could cripple the whole administration of justice.

All we are saying is, when you come on the police force as a civilian employee—call it civilian if you like, and I say again it makes no difference to call them constables or give them a rank or put them in a blue or red uniform, they are members of the police force—those persons who perform those very essential duties in the maintenance of law and order shall not strike, shall not cripple the force, shall not endanger your protection and mine and the protection of the public, person or property. They have all the rights to bargain which are left in the Act in the sections I have mentioned.

It is true that this will perhaps be a new departure and that the police may or may not want to adopt them with open arms and assist them in their bargaining. But they may bargain by themselves, if they want to form a separate little group, or they may bargain with the police—the constables and the men and the officers up to the rank of inspector on the force—and they would be in a pretty good group.

The hon. member for York South says that because a court decision has brought this to our attention we should not now bring in legislation. There are numerous cases all down through our legislative history where a court has interpreted a section of the Act to indicate that the intention of the Legislature was not expressed or was not clearly expressed or the subject perhaps was not in the mind of the Legislature, and the Legislature has sprung to action and met the omission and stopped the gap by legislation. This is clear time after time. It seems to me this morning a member, perhaps it was the hon. member for Sudbury (Mr. Sopha), mentioned that a court, a magistrate or a judge, had indicated that The Liquor Control Act had expressed itself in such a way that a person could not drink a bottle of beer in his back yard, and that this having come to light in the courts, the Legislature came into action and cleared it up.

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): It was quite clear that was their intention.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: That was their intention and that is what I have said to this House. I am satisfied that it was the intention, in simple language, that anyone who is a member of a police force is a member of a police force. That is all it means. And he shall be subject to the rights and rules and regulations which affect everyone employed in that union. That is the principle that I must ask this House to accept.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, the hon. Attorney General is apparently of the opinion that he can read the intention of people who sat in this House a good many years ago. I was not in the House, nor was he, at the time legislation was passed making special provisions with regard to labour relations affecting police forces and fire fighting forces, providing among other things for compulsory arbitration as applied to those forces.

I was not here, but I know a good many people who were here at that time and it was not their understanding or intention that this would apply to anyone except the people who were in uniform. The Supreme Court of Canada has ruled, and I do not think we can challenge it to that extent, that no such intention was disclosed in the actual legislation. The argument the hon. Attorney General is now putting forth that we are merely formalizing what has always been the intention, is a specious argument. It may always have been his intention and understanding, but it certainly was not the intention and understanding of a great many other people. It was not an intention that the Legislature disclosed in the words of the legislation they passed. I would find the hon. Attorney General a little easier to follow—if not more convincing—if he came right out and said that, in the past, civilian members of police forces have not been treated as members of the force and have had the same rights in labour relations as other employees. Now the government has decided that it is going to change that situation. Why does he not come out and call a spade a spade? That is what is happening. The government is changing a situation that has existed in the past and that has been understood by most people to exist.

This, I may say, causes real alarm to us in this group because, as my leader pointed out, this is just another little chip taken from the whole fabric of the rights of employees in this province. Every year almost, we have another piece of legislation brought in to circumscribe the bargaining rights of a group of employees, or indeed to deny collective bargaining rights to employees altogether. My leader pointed out that a few years ago there was a bill brought in here, passed through this House, called The Crown Agency Act. He takes a more charitable view of what happened than I do. It was explained in the House that this legislation was designed only to deal with certain matters of taxation but we found that, in fact, the only effect it had was to deprive large groups of employees of any collective bargaining rights at all; employees such as those of the workmen's compensation board, the Ontario hospital services commission and other large groups.

I discovered during this session, in the public accounts committee, that that Act has had no effect at all with regard to taxation, as was purported to be its intention. It is a complete dead letter as far as its original alleged intention is concerned, but as far as denying people collective bargaining rights, it has become a very effective piece of legislation. Yet the government keeps it there. Personally, Mr. Chairman, under these circumstances, I can come to no other conclusion than that it was the intention from the very beginning to deprive people, quite illegitimately, of collective bargaining rights.

This has happened in other fields. Compulsory arbitration was imposed this session on employees of hospitals. Now it is to be imposed on civilian employees of police forces; so the process goes on. If it keeps going this way, we will soon find that the traditional democratic rights of association and of free collective bargaining will be eroded away.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Collective bargaining is not touched.

Mr. Bryden: Collective bargaining certainly is touched. The hon. Attorney General is a first-class lawyer, but he knows absolutely nothing about labour relations. His statements today exposed his ignorance in a most remarkable fashion. If the hon. Attorney General does not think that the right to strike is part of the total process of collective bargaining, and the total rights involved in it, then he knows nothing about collective bargaining at all. It does not follow that strikes usually occur in collective bargaining relationships. Indeed, contrary to the impression one might get from the newspapers, they rarely occur. But the point is that the right to strike, the right to resort to the ultimate instrument, is inherent to the whole concept of democratic collective bargaining.

The hon. Attorney General has argued, and I am not going to argue against him at this point, that there are certain instances where these basic accepted rights have to be circumscribed to a certain degree. He says—and I think this is probably the most obvious place—that they have to be circumscribed with regard to sworn police officers. Well, that is already in the law of the province; none of us is questioning that point now. But what I would like to convey to him is that this sort of procedure is completely exceptional. It should be resorted to only under the most unusual circumstances.

One can argue that almost any form of employment is, to some degree or other, essential to the welfare of the community. There is no absolute standard by which one can say that this job is essential and that one is not. It is a proposition in which there is no clear dividing line. I would like to suggest to the government that one resorts to this extraordinary type of legislation only in extraordinary cases, where the situation is clear beyond all possible doubt, as in the case of sworn police officers. This we can agree to. But as soon as one starts extending the principle, first to hospital employees and now to civilian police employees, where will it end? The next thing we know it may be employees in meat packing plants or employees in steel plants. After all, steel is pretty essential to a community too. Before we know it, there will not be any democratic collective bargaining at all.

We would perhaps be a little less alarmed about this section if it were not part of a total pattern, which we can see unfolding itself on the government side of the House. We would still oppose it, because we think it is wrong in principle. It becomes particularly alarming in the context of that pattern now unfolding before us. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that the hon. Attorney General has not made a case for applying the extraordinary type of procedure that now applies to police officers, to the civilian employees of police forces. I submit to him that a police force would not collapse if, in quite unusual circumstances, civilian employees in some particular context decided to go on strike. I submit to him that it would be still possible to carry on the essential police functions.

It would be difficult, but work stoppages—whether strikes or lockouts—always cause some inconvenience. They would not be of much use as instruments in collective bargaining if they did not cause inconvenience. I have no doubt that police commissions—who no doubt face many difficult problems in any case—would like to reduce the inconveniences they may have to suffer. On the other hand, I think we have to look at the basic principles involved, and I think they have to run the very small risk that may be involved in a strike occurring of civilian employees in some police department. They must run that risk in order to protect the basic rights of collective bargaining.

I would submit to the House, Mr. Chairman, that the section now proposed has no place in our law. It is not necessary to the point where it is completely inescapable and it would only be in those circumstances that I would agree that we should circumscribe free collective bargaining. That being so, I think we should vote in favour of the motion of the hon. leader of the New Democratic Party and delete the proposed new section 22.

Mr. A. E. Thompson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Chairman, I am drawn to my feet really by the—I say this with due respect—almost flippant attitude of the hon. Attorney General from the point of view of collective bargaining.

I might not have heard him correctly, and if so I know he is thoroughly capable of getting on his feet to rebut what I am going to say. As I understood him, he kept saying that the members of the police force have all the rights of collective bargaining. But surely he must recognize—and if he does not recognize it it is unfortunate that the hon. Minister of Labour (Mr. Rowntree) is not here so it could be explained to him—that when you have compulsory arbitration you are emasculating the very force of the collective bargaining; taking away the historic rights of the group in order to bargain with the fact that they will have some kind of bargaining force behind them.

I think that the hon. member for Downsview has shown indeed a concern which all of us in this House should have, and I am hoping that we will hear from the hon. Minister of Labour; that he will be coming back to express his concern in connection with this proposed encroachment on the rights of people, whether it may be a cleaning woman at the police force, a gardener and so on; and that it is not going to imperil peace, order and good government if they try collective bargaining and do not get it through collective bargaining, to decide to go on strike. We cannot really say that if the cleaning ladies were to go on strike that this would change the whole course of peace, order and good government. In view of the pay that cleaning women get in some government establishments, I would say if they were to go on strike, in some cases God bless them. This is a right that they should have, but with a great sweep—

Hon. H. L. Rowntree (Minister of Labour): Do you approve of civil disobedience?

Mr. Thompson: I do not approve, sir, of taking away from the people the right of collective bargaining in that they can go on strike if they want to. I hope that the hon. Minister of Labour will stand up to enunciate that principle, because I am sure—in view of the remarks that he has made in the past about the rights of labour—that he, with us, was deeply shocked when he heard the cavalier approach of the hon. Attorney General when he said that they have collective bargaining, all the rights of collective bargaining, and then as an afterthought he said, of course we do have compulsory arbitration.

I say, again with due deference, that I have real admiration for many of the personal qualities of the hon. Attorney General, but I have come to the conclusion that he does not have sufficient knowledge of collective bargaining—the deep essence of collective bargaining. I hope the hon. Minister of Labour will point out to the House that to suggest you can have an all-embracing approach in connection with cleaning women and so on, that they are going to be drawn in on this picture, and yet they can be forced to compulsory arbitration is a very dangerous precedent.

Therefore, we will support the amendment. We would certainly have let this section go, and I appreciate that the hon. member for Downsview stood firm and said that there was not going to be this sweeping approach which would bring everyone under police discipline.

Mr. R. Gisborn (Wentworth East): Mr. Chairman, the hon. members preceding myself have made our point fairly clear. But I want to put another aspect on this amendment.

The hon. Attorney General has stated that what necessitated this amendment was to prevent strikes in the police force, and he gave some of his reasoning. But he remembers also, Mr. Chairman, the debate in the House and opposition to the compulsory arbitration for the hospital workers. I submit that, as much as we were opposed to that legislation, this amendment is even worse.

In the arbitration bill in relation to the hospital workers, at least they had the right to join what union they wished to join, the union that was conducive to their type of operation. I submit this amendment forces the civilian employees of the police department either into the police association, if, in any event, the police association would accept them.

What happens if the police association says: We want nothing to do with your groups. We do not know what your problems are, and we are not going to bargain for you? They are then left out in the cold. I would think that if the hon. Attorney General was going to do anything, he would at least have given them the right to join what union they wished to join, even if they were under compulsory arbitration.

Take for instance the group in television and radio. Maybe they would want to join the communication workers; the clerks and traffic ticket processors might want to get into the clerks and technical office workers union; mechanics might want to get into the automotive mechanics' association, a group that understands their problems and would be conducive to their needs in the collective bargaining field.

So, I submit, as much as we oppose this amendment, it is even worse than the hospitals' arbitration bill, inasmuch as it does not give these employees the opportunity to join at least the union of their choice.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, I think before we vote I should be permitted a further word in winding up the debate. I hope I did not appear flippant to the hon. leader of the Opposition, I did not intend to be. I certainly think I understand the principles of collective bargaining, and I am quite sure that the provisions in The Police Act take away the right to strike. In order to make it amply clear that I am aware of what the Act says, and so that this House may know what it says, the section in question is section 26, and the way it reads is:

A member of a police force shall not remain, or become a member of any trade union, or of any organization that is affiliated directly or indirectly with a trade union.

Now, that is the prohibition.

Then go on to the other sections, and this is all under the portion of the Act headed "Bargaining and arbitration." I am quite aware that once you take away the right to join a trade union you have cut down, by a very considerable quantity, the right of bargaining, but all I said was there are these sections in the Act which do retain certain wide rights for bargaining.

I would draw to the attention of the House that last year by an amendment to section 27—the first section which follows the one I read—we enlarged very considerably the bargaining rights, spelled out very specifically all the things that must be in any agreement to be bargained for. And we added a further section to provide that in addition to the persons mentioned in subsection 3 a bargaining committee may be accompanied by one legal or other counsel, and we spelled out the rights of a lawyer to attend and assist.

Mr. Singer: That was on my amendment, and after great representations by the police associations in committee.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Well, I must say that I supported this and—

Mr. Singer: Yes, the hon. Attorney General did, eventually.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: —brought this legislation forward. We enlarged the bargaining rights, and extended to a very ample degree the power of these police associations deprived of the right—if we want to put it briefly—to strike, or the right to join a union. We enlarged to a great extent their powers in the bargaining area.

So I was not unaware of what those rights consisted. The whole crux of the matter is this, the section which I read, section 26, says "a member of a police force." The whole question turns on what is a member. The hon. member for Woodbine keeps referring and repeating the expression "a civilian member of the police force." Nowhere is the term used in the Act. A member—

Mr. Bryden: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, I might have used that expression inadvertently, but I think what I said most of the time was "a civilian employee"—a civilian employed by the police commission.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Very well, I will accept that, but I did take down the expression "a civilian member of the police force." Now, the Act speaks about a member of the police force, and all I am asking this House to do is say that everyone employed by the police force is a member of the police force, and that is it.

Mr. MacDonald: That is where we disagree.

Mr. Chairman: All those in favour of Mr. MacDonald's amendment, say "aye."

Those opposed, say "nay."

In my opinion the "nays" have it.

Call in the members.

Mr. Chairman: All those in favour of Mr. MacDonald's amendment, please stand.

All those opposed to Mr. MacDonald's amendment, please stand.

Clerk of the House: Mr. Chairman, the "ayes" are 24 and the "nays" 52.

Mr. Chairman: I declare the amendment lost.

Section 6, with the amendment to January, 1966, agreed to. Now, about those two earlier ones—

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, sections 4 and 5 were passed by committee of the whole House. It is my understanding of the rules that unless there is unanimous consent, they cannot again be dealt with. I, for one, do not propose to be part of the unanimous consent.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: I would point out that when the House opened this afternoon at two o'clock, the hon. Attorney General asked the consent of the House to revert to clauses 4 and 5, and there were no objections raised. He proceeded to read his amendment to clauses 4 and 5, and then it was indicated that it might be desirable, having in mind the sequence of the debate immediately before the House rose at noon, that he should continue and complete item 6 in the knowledge of what had been said on items 4 and 5, and, thereafter, having dealt with clause 6 that we would revert and deal with clauses 4 and 5.

I think the consent has already been given.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, I would point out that an hon. member has indicated to you that he does not give consent, so it follows that there cannot possibly be unanimous consent. As far as this group is concerned, we would have been prepared to give consent, but I think the rules should be enforced. I do not think a member has to be "hot on the spot" and jump right up the second the thing is mentioned to say he does not give unanimous consent. Before the question is dealt with he can indicate his unwillingness to give consent, and that settles the matter as far as I can see under the rules.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Acquiescence!

Mr. Chairman: Well, I took it that if it carried on 6 it endorsed the whole principle.

Mr. Bryden: We suggested from this group, Mr. Chairman—I am in no position to commit anyone else—that we thought it would be better to deal with 6 first and then revert to the other matter. But there was no agreement, that I understood, that we could proceed with 4 and 5; that matter really did not come forward.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, I pointed out in my reference to the amendment proposed to sections 4 and 5 that the wording "and assistants and civilian employees" was the very question we would be debating in section 6; and that the three sections are really complementary in the sense that it would be inclusion of civilian employees on police forces that would be the whole subject matter of these amendments. So, for whatever that was worth, I pointed it out at the time. I would now say, Mr. Chairman, that we did debate the principle of this whole question in section 6.

Mr. Chairman: I took it just as the Attorney General explained it a moment ago; that when we endorsed section 6 we carried the whole principle of the others.

Mr. Bryden: But, Mr. Chairman, surely the rules are quite clear that before the House can revert to a section that has been already dealt with there must be unanimous consent, and it is obvious that there is not unanimous consent. The rules are—

Mr. Chairman: We had unanimous consent—

Mr. Bryden: No, sir, it was never asked for from the chair, and that is the only place where it counts. There was never an opportunity for a member to stand up and say that he did not give consent. We still have not reverted, and it has been indicated that there is not consent. As far as I am concerned, our group would be willing to give consent, but I still think we should pay some attention to the rules of this House. Certainly, we on this side have to work hard to find ways to operate within them, and I think it is time the government started to act according to the rules, too.

Mr. Chairman: I maintain that unanimous consent was given when he moved his motion to revert to sections 4 and 5.

Mr. Thompson: Did you rule on unanimous consent at any time? Have you already ruled on it?

Mr. Chairman: I am ruling on it now.

Mr. Thompson: But you had not previously, so you are safe in—

Mr. Chairman: I took it as before.

Mr. Thompson: For what reason, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. Chairman: We took it because I said when we went into number 6, we understood that the other principles would be carried along with it.

Mr. Bryden: No, sir. There was never a formal request from the chair to revert to those sections. We are only now coming to the question of reverting to those sections.

Mr. Chairman: We reverted at 2 o'clock in the afternoon.

Mr. Bryden: The rules are enforced only against this side.

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Chairman, if I could say this, that surely there may be many private hon. members in this House who often wish that there was unanimous consent, but there is not unanimous consent until the Chairman rules on it. I suggest, with deep respect to you, sir, that you had not asked the House for unanimous consent.

Mr. Chairman: The Attorney General asked for it and no one objected.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, it is a very simple proposition; if I get up and ask for unanimous consent, the Chairman, the Speaker, or whoever is in the chair, asks the House if he has unanimous consent. You do not automatically get unanimous consent until the person in the chair requests it. You are requesting it now for the first time.

Mr. Chairman, may I just say this: If the government is unhappy about this situation it has made its bed and is now lying in it, because yesterday we had an inversion of the rules in this House—with no announcement to the Opposition—which suited the government's position. I have not yet had an opportunity to explain our position. It came from the chair, I grant you, but we will have a chance before we get finished with that bill. If you are going to use the rules of the House to make might become right, then on occasion we are going to use the rules of the House to protect our position.

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Mr. Chairman, perhaps I should say a word. I was not in the House at 2 o'clock, therefore I accept your ruling of the facts as they occurred when the House sat at 2 o'clock. However, I would like to say—during the time I have been in this House, and in this chair—there have been many occasions when the procedures of the House have been changed by unanimous consent and I have yet to hear a vote taken on it. It is the Chairman or the Speaker, in the instances that I recall when this has been done—for instance, I believe that one of the hon. Ministers in the last 48 hours has asked to change the rules of the House to revert to introduce a bill—there was no vote taken as to whether there was unanimous consent. The person presiding, either the Chairman or the Speaker, assesses whether the House agrees or disagrees; and this is the way it has always been.

As I say, as far as the actual events of 2 o'clock this afternoon are concerned, I have no comment, as I was not here; but I will accept whatever the chair says.

Mr. F. R. Oliver (Grey South): Mr. Chairman, I think the hon. Prime Minister would agree that the hon. Attorney General or any other hon. member of the government has the right to ask for unanimous consent; but he has not the right to assume that he has received unanimous consent until that question is put to the House by the presiding officer—be that the Chairman of the committee of the whole or the Speaker of the House. Surely my hon. friend cannot ask for, and get in one breath, unanimous consent. If it is put by the Speaker, and then if there is unanimous consent, the member concedes but this is quite irregular, and my hon. friend knows that too.

Hon. Mr. Roberts: I can only repeat, Mr. Chairman, that I cannot recall a vote being taken on such occasions. Once again it has always appeared to me that if whoever is presiding—whether the Chairman or the Speaker—felt that unanimous consent was there, then he proceeded on that basis. I cannot recall ever having a vote taken as to whether there was unanimous consent—

Mr. Oliver: We are not talking about votes!

Hon. Mr. Roberts: No, but I am only talking about an expression that whoever is in the chair feels, because if it is not there, it cannot happen. This is the whole point. If whoever is presiding is not aware that there is unanimity in the House then, of course, it is an impossibility—

Mr. Bryden: How can you read the minds—

Hon. Mr. Roberts: I will adhere to the Chairman's ruling.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, may I point out to the hon. Prime Minister and the House that, in the normal course of events, unanimous consent is given and it becomes rather a routine proceeding in which we do not often observe the forms, but I think the forms require that the Speaker or the Chairman ask if there is unanimous consent. Now, when it is obvious to the hon. Prime Minister that in this case there is not unanimous consent—

Hon. A. Grossman (Minister of Reform Institutions): There was at the time.

Mr. Bryden: Well, whether or not, as long as opposition is registered before we actually revert, then it is properly registered.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: That is your ruling.

Mr. Bryden: No, sir. That is the rule.

Mr. Chairman: Order!

Mr. Bryden: I submit again that it was never asked. An hon. member took advantage of the opportunity when it arose and the government made no—

Mr. Chairman: Order, order. After 2 o'clock the Attorney General asked for the unanimous consent of the House. Now there was not a word. I asked: "Will this motion be concurred in?" and they said: "We shall go on to number 6 or section 6."

Mr. Bryden: The matter was not dealt with.

Mr. Chairman: Now, wait a minute. At that moment the Attorney General went back and read the amendments that he wanted to bring in on number 4 or 5—section 4 and section 5. Then we reverted, and then we reverted back again, because they said the whole thing was all tied up in one parcel—the whole principle. Now that is the principle; and I say that unanimous consent was given as far as I am concerned, and that is my ruling.

Bill No. 123 reported.

Clerk of the House: The Honourable the Lieutenant Governor recommends the following:

That, where a payment into the public service superannuation fund is made pursuant to The Pension Benefits Act, 1962-1963 with respect to the unfunded liability of the public service superannuation fund, interest shall be credited to the public service superannuation fund out of the consolidated revenue fund at the rate of 5 per cent per annum from the date of such payment in any year to the end of the then current fiscal year, as provided in Bill No. 124, An Act to amend The Public Service Superannuation Act.

Resolution concurred in.

THE PUBLIC SERVICE SUPERANNUATION ACT

House in committee on Bill No. 124, An Act to amend The Public Service Superannuation Act.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, may I ask before we proceed with these sections, are these amendments that have been considered by the joint council and have the support of the civil service association?

Hon. J. N. Allan (Provincial Treasurer): These amendments have to do entirely with the administration of the Act. There are two sections of importance and the main amendment is the doing away with the retirement fund and handling of the funds through the superannuation fund. The other is an amendment which is in one of the other sections of the Act, to provide for the fringe benefit arrangement. It, too, has only to do with the administration.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, may I ask another question? To what extent are casuals included, or is that great group of casuals still excluded from this?

Hon. Mr. Allan: It is exactly as it was. This matter is receiving consideration but there is no change.

Mr. MacDonald: The hon. Provincial Treasurer means that the matter of including casuals is receiving consideration?

Hon. Mr. Allan: Yes. It is not a part of any of these amendments.

Sections 1 to 10, inclusive, agreed to.

Bill No. 124 reported.

THE PUBLIC SERVICE ACT, 1961-1962

House in committee on Bill No. 125, An Act to amend The Public Service Act, 1961-1962.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2:

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, let me ask the hon. Provincial Treasurer, if I may, what exactly does this mean?

This strikes me as being an extraordinary power: "The commission may exclude any position in the classified service from that service for such period as it determines." In other words, I come back to the question I asked a moment ago, and perhaps I was doing it on the wrong bill: were these powers that you are now putting into The Public Service Act subject to negotiation and discussion by the joint council or is this another unilateral and arbitrary action by the government?

Hon. Mr. Allan: Mr. Chairman, it is not a unilateral action in that it affects, generally, the public service. There are a few positions where it is necessary to pay a salary higher than the salary that is in the classification that covers that particular position. This enables that particular position to be taken out of the civil service and to have a salary paid on a casual basis for the purpose of obtaining some particular person.

Mr. F. Young (Yorkview): Might I ask a question? Would the recent raising of the scale of teachers in the reform institutions come under this kind of a clause?

Hon. Mr. Allan: No.

Mr. Young: This is not the intent?

Hon. Mr. Allan: No.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, I have no doubt that the explanation given by the hon. Provincial Treasurer expresses the government's current intention. I notice that proposed section 4 (a) is written in terms of "any position" and I take it that what the government has in mind is that only a single position, or perhaps three or four positions, might be affected. The only trouble is that as now stated it could include anything. It could be so broad as to cover a couple of thousand employees. I will say, Mr. Chairman, that we have slowly, over the years, developed an attitude that we would like the government to say precisely what it claims to intend, because we find that bills which are capable of a broader interpretation than the announced intention often get that broader interpretation. Then there is nothing that anyone can do to get the government to revert back to the status quo ante. So I would suggest to the hon. Provincial Treasurer that this should be more carefully drafted to make clear precisely to whom it is to apply. It could, as it now reads, apply to the entire civil service.

Hon. Mr. Allan: Oh, no!

Mr. Bryden: It could under the wording! Why do you not put in the words to express: what you mean? Then there would not be any danger that on some subsequent date this section might be given a much broader interpretation than the currently announced intention.

Mr. MacDonald: Let me add, before the hon. Provincial Treasurer replies: We have already had a debate this afternoon on differing concepts of collective bargaining. I can say with assurance, though I have not had the personal experience of collective bargaining in a genuine trade union, that if at some stage along the way management, by its own decision, without any discussion with the employee through the joint council, were to come in with amendments like this it would be a serious departure.

And this is the case. These have not been discussed by joint council at all, you are taking this action on your own. If, for example, Stelco, the steel company, and local 1005 were suddenly to arbitrarily take unto itself the right to begin to take people out of the bargaining unit or put people into the bargaining until in that sort of a fashion, it certainly would not be acknowledged as a normal procedure in collective bargaining. This is precisely what you have done.

I repeat the comment of my hon. friend, the member for Woodbine, vis-à-vis the hon. Attorney General: your concept of collective bargaining is a very strange concept of collective bargaining. In addition to the vagueness of the phraseology, whatever the hon. Provincial Treasurer may say, he is a kindly man and he knows what he wants now and he perhaps would only do that, but some sharp lawyer on the government side of the House who wants to achieve something else in another department, for another objective, takes a look at this wording, which is wide open, and proceeds to use this for his purposes. That is the reason, quite apart from the fact that this has not been discussed in the appropriate agency where it should be discussed, quite apart from that you have the validity of the argument of the hon. member for Woodbine that your phraseology is wide open.

Hon. Mr. Allan: Mr. Chairman, I am sure that the hon. member misunderstands what we are trying to do. In the first place, this legislation refers to a person, not to a class of worker. I think the hon. member would agree that if you are going to appoint an assistant to the president of the Steel Company of Canada that it would not be considered something that should be negotiated. This is a similar matter. I am sure the hon. member who mentioned this must realize that one of the responsibilities of this government is to have an excellent civil service.

Mr. MacDonald: It does not say any "person;" it says "any position."

Hon. Mr. Allan: Well, a position.

Mr. MacDonald: If it is in the classified services, it then is not a single person.

Hon. Mr. Allan: No; this is exactly as I have outlined it, and regardless of whether this is as tight as it should be surely no one is going to feel that a government is not going to do the things that are going to enable them to obtain and maintain an excellent civil service, which is exactly what we are trying to do.

Mr. Bryden: I would suggest, Mr. Chairman, that we do not get into that argument. We had a few things to say about it in the estimates of the civil service commission and I do not think the government has shown very much intention of trying to maintain excellent relations in the civil service. I think we fully understand what the hon. Provincial Treasurer's intention is with regard to this section, but what we are looking at and what we have to look at is what the section says. The section as it is worded is capable of a much broader interpretation than the hon. Provincial Treasurer has indicated.

It says that the commission may exclude any position; if they can exclude any position, they can exclude all positions. There is no limit on what they could do under this section as it now stands. As far as I am concerned, Mr. Chairman, I think the government should reword the section so that it expresses its intention exactly and not put through this broad an authority as now appears to achieve what is stated to be a fairly limited sort of objective.

Mr. Chairman: Carried?

Mr. Bryden: No.

Section 3 agreed to.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, we did not agree to the carrying of section 2. We said no, when we were asked to carry it.

Mr. Chairman: The majority did.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: You are outvoted.

Mr. Bryden: There was no vote taken.

Mr. Chairman: All in favour of section 2 becoming part of the bill, say "aye."
All opposed, say "nay."

In my opinion, the ayes have it.
Call in the members.

Mr. Chairman: Those in favour of section number two being included in the bill, please stand.

Those opposed, please stand.

Clerk of the House: Mr. Chairman, the yeas are 49, the nays, 20.

Mr. Chairman: Therefore it is carried!

THE ONTARIO WATER RESOURCES COMMISSION ACT

House in committee on Bill No. 128, An Act to amend The Ontario Water Resources Commission Act.

Sections 1 to 3, inclusive, agreed to.

On section 4:

Mr. Young: Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask a question regarding this section. I am not clear as to what powers are outlined here. In the House on April 13 I asked a question of the hon. Minister (Mr. Simonett)—it occurs on page 2235—I asked at that time whether the OWRC had the power to order certain work being done and I was assured by the hon. Minister it had. Now we find section 4 giving certain powers “that the commission may order whatever is necessary to implement the report to be done at the expense of the municipality and the commission may recover the expenses incurred in doing it, with costs, by act of a court of competent jurisdiction as a debt due to the commission by such municipality.”

Now, did the commission have this power before and is this to make clear certain ramifications of that power? Does this mean that the OWRC will go ahead and do the work and then recover? And what is the relationship of the Ontario municipal board? Can that order be made even though the OMB may not agree to the enlargement of a debt which may be incurred by the municipality?

I wonder if the hon. Minister would make this clear to us.

Hon. J. R. Simonett (Minister of Energy and Resources Management): Mr. Chairman, I understand that they had the power before. This is just spelling out that they now can recover any expenses—actual expenses of the OWRC—if they do put down an order. It only has to do with the costs.

Mr. Young: Recovering the costs?

Hon. Mr. Simonett: Yes.

Mr. Young: Well, could I ask the hon. Minister about the second part of my question? How does this relate to the powers of the Ontario municipal board?

Hon. Mr. Simonett: Mr. Chairman, I am sorry, I cannot answer that. These are the powers that were given to the Ontario water resources commission which they have had since the enactment of their Act as far as an order is concerned.

Mr. Young: But if this order is given and the OMB decides that this—

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Mr. Chairman, I think I might be able to assist in this question which has come up before in relation to the function of the OWRC, and particularly as it may relate to education where you have requirements on both hands, with the Ontario municipal board saying that the municipality is not able financially to carry the financial load that may be required. I can assure the hon. member that this section does not give the Ontario water resources commission power to overrule a decision of the municipal board. That decision, in the broad function of the municipal board, is maintained.

What in fact happens, is that there is very close co-operation between the Ontario water resources commission and the Ontario municipal board in order to ensure that what the board may order to be done is within the financial capability of the municipality to do. The water resources commission confers with the municipal board, in fact, before issuing any such order. So in the situation that the hon. member envisages, that aspect of the matter is dealt with before the order is made.

Mr. Young: And consultation would overcome any of this difficulty?

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Oh, yes, it would, because the water resources commission would ascertain the facts from the municipal board; it is part of the administrative process of developing a project under the powers of the Ontario water resources commission to find out if the municipal board, in fact, can fit the cost of it into the overall financing being studied in the municipality.

Mr. Young: But this still does not overcome the situation if there is a serious menace to health; if a serious pollution is taking place and certain works need to be done and the board considers they should be done and the OWRC agrees, yet the OMB says that the municipality cannot stand the capital cost. Where do we go here? This is a matter of health.

Hon. Mr. Roberts: I would say, Mr. Chairman, that in such a situation you have reached a bit of an impasse, and we have to look for extraordinary remedies for extraordinary situations.

MEDICAL SERVICES INSURANCE

House in committee on Bill No. 136, An Act respecting medical services insurance.

On section 1:

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Chairman, on section 1 of the medical insurance Act, we have had a discussion of principle in connection with that bill and I think that it was clear that although the government believed in the Ontario hospital insurance commission and have been satisfied that this is a good vehicle by means of which people can get free hospital care on paying a premium, they felt that for medical services there should not be one government body, one carrier.

I, sir, have listened very intently to the discussion on principle. I had hoped, frankly, that there would perhaps be more detail; and I still hope that there will be more detail when this bill is discussed, because there has been an enormous amount of investigation on this matter across Canada. With all respect, I think that the Hall commission report is probably the most comprehensive study that has been done in the history of Canada on health service needs. The Hall commission came out very strongly and very clearly; no matter what the hon. Prime Minister may say about how you can look in the Bible and can interpret it in whatever way you want, Chief Justice Hall made it very clear that he believed that the approach to be taken to provide medical services and health services—

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Mr. Chairman, I am going to submit to you, sir, that this is once again a debate on one of the principles of the bill that was decided on second reading. On a point of order, I would submit that the hon. leader of the Opposition is out of order.

Mr. Chairman: I am afraid I will have to agree. Under Rule No. 49, the subject matter being decided upon, it cannot be debated further.

Mr. Thompson: I certainly respect your ruling, Mr. Chairman. I was talking about the first section of Bill No. 136. I perhaps have a peculiar way of working towards the point I want to make and I may have veered off a little on this.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Mr. Chairman, I should in all honesty say I am aware of the point the hon. leader of the Opposition wants to make, but I am just trying to see that he stays within the rules of the House as he makes it.

Mr. Thompson: I appreciate that the hon. Prime Minister is aware of the point. I am sure most of the country and of Ontario are also. It gets down to this: Those of us who will not be subsidized by government do not know what premium we are going to have to pay.

I can appreciate that the hon. Prime Minister has been concerned when we say Saskatchewan. Why should he not be? The way they are approaching it in Saskatchewan, you get not only medical care, but you also get hospital service for $36; and a family gets medical care plus hospitalization for $72. I think this is one of the details in which we are going to be interested.

We are going to be interested, on the basis of using private carriers, whether they are going to be able to supply it as cheaply to the citizens as they do in Saskatchewan.

I am convinced that when the hon. Minister of Health (Mr. Dymond) tells us what the premiums are for a standard coverage, in no way will it be equal to the fee which has been asked of the citizens of Saskatchewan.

We want to know the answer to this. Why, in this province, are you suggesting that it is more efficiently run by private carriers? Why are we going to have to pay something like $180 just for medical services, and on top of that hospital services, when in Saskatchewan they get both medical care and hospital care for $72 and for $36?

Hon. Mr. Roberts: Mr. Chairman, once again on a point of order, I would like to know where the hon. member finds the right to mention this? He is in fact once again debating something that has already been debated. The financial background of the scheme and the principles of this bill have been accepted by this House when it had second reading, and I suggest this is not further debatable.

Mr. Chairman: The matter was endorsed on second reading. You will have to stick to particular sections as we go along.

Mr. Thompson: Well, sir, I did not think that under principle we were saying whether it was $26 for the premium or $180. I notice that has been avoided in principle.

Hon. Mr. Roberts: That is not a principle you want adopted!

Mr. Thompson: I suggest that is some of the detail, and I suggest the reason that is some of the detail is because—I am coming to my point now—under section 1, clause b, carriers, I am suggesting that with the definition of carrier which you have here, that it is of necessity going to mean that we are going to be charged a great deal more in premiums than if you had one carrier. It is for that reason that I move that;

Subsection b of section 1 shall be amended to read as follows:

Carrier means Ontario hospital services commission which hereinafter shall be called Ontario health services commission.

Mr. Chairman: Mr. Thompson moves that: Subsection b of section 2 shall be amended to read as follows:

Carrier means Ontario hospital services commission which hereinafter shall be called Ontario health services commission.

I am afraid I will have to rule this out of order, because it changes the principle of the bill from what we agreed on second reading.

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Chairman, one of the things I have not learned of the government, do they consider that the hospital services commission is compulsory? If they do not consider it is compulsory, then I am applying the voluntary aspects of this, and it is not against the principle. But if they will admit that groups of 15 employees or more must by compulsion belong to the plan, then it is compulsory.

Mr. Chairman: I would say that this is outside the scope of this bill entirely, this amendment.

Mr. Thompson: On the basis that is a compulsory aspect, which was against the principle previously, Mr. Chairman?

Hon. M. B. Dymond (Minister of Health): The hospital services commission—its bill, its Act, or its function, is not under debate in this bill. It is not even mentioned in this bill. I would submit to you, sir, that the amendment is completely out of order since it bears no relationship to what we have under discussion.

Mr. Chairman: I will have to rule it out of order.

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask you again to give us the reasons for your ruling. I am making an amendment to the effect that instead of a variety of carriers, they have one carrier, using the hospital services commission, which would now be called the health services commission.

Hon. Mr. Roberts: Mr. Chairman, this is part of the amendment voted down in the second reading of the bill.

Mr. Chairman: It is outside the scope of this bill entirely. I have to rule it out of order.

Mr. Thompson: I would like, sir, to have your ruling on why it is outside this scope. I am suggesting you have one carrier, I am suggesting that according to the very enlightened and flexible definition by the hon. Minister of Health, this is a voluntary carrier, in spite of the fact that 15 employees or over have to belong to the commission, yet he still says that it is voluntary. That indicates to me a very flexible and agile mind on his part. If this is a voluntary commission, then I do not see that it is against the principle of the bill. I think that it is order. Instead of a variety of carriers, I am moving an amendment to say that you have one carrier.

Mr. Chairman: I have made a ruling that it is not in order and, therefore, the ruling of the Chairman is not debatable, so if you challenge the Chairman's ruling, it is quite all right.

Mr. Oliver: Well, I think we will have to challenge this, Mr. Chairman. You read in section (b):

Carrier means a person, firm, group, association, society.

In the judgment of our hon. leader, we do not agree that these are the only carriers there should be, and in our judgment, we believe it should be a different carrier. Surely, that is a proper amendment. It is not at all a negative amendment to the bill. Rather than the carriers in the bill, we substitute for that the carrier named by my hon. leader. Surely, that is an amendment and nothing else? How could it be anything else?

Mr. Chairman: This is the same thing that was voted on.

Mr. Oliver: Well, I agree, but I think that is the only substance you have in your ruling, Mr. Chairman, with all due deference, certainly, so far as the amendment being in order had something not transpired before. I mean, there is no question in my mind, and I do not think in yours, that the amendment itself, as such, is in order. What has gone before I am not arguing at the moment.

Mr. Chairman: I quite agree with your argument, but the fact remains we voted down the very same amendment on second reading. Therefore, I cannot alter it.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, we are placed in a very difficult position, an almost impossible position. I think the reasoning you advanced is correct.

We put a resolution on the order paper which members were given an opportunity, within the framework of the rules of this House, to discuss this situation, and by specious reasoning it was thrown out—

Mr. Chairman: Order!

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Mr. Chairman, there was an appeal from the Speaker's ruling on that, I believe, and I do not see how it can be debated either.

Mr. Chairman: That cannot be debated either.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: This is the situation. The Speaker in the chair considered the motion and gave a ruling. Now, under another bill, and under another procedure, apparently we are going to proceed—if the hon. member has his way—to discuss the merits of the Speaker's ruling when he ruled the motion out of order. I just maintain, sir, the committee simply is not in order in considering this.

Mr. Chairman: The Speaker's ruling is not debatable. If you want to challenge it, it is all right, but it is not debatable.

An hon. member: Put the question then.

Mr. Chairman: Do you challenge the Speaker's ruling or the Chairman's ruling?

All those in favour of the Chairman's ruling will please say "aye."

All those opposed will please say "nay."

In my opinion the "ayes" have it.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2:

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, with regard to section 2, there is a matter on which I would like clarification from the hon. Minister relating to subsection 2 of the section, and specifically clause (b), which provides that:

The Minister may (b) exempt licensed carriers from the requirement of providing standard medical services insurance contracts.

This is a matter that arises at various points in the bill, and this is the first place that it arises. I would like to ask the hon. Minister exactly what the intention is with regard to the exemption of licensed carriers? Presumably he envisages some situations where it may be necessary to exercise this power. On the other hand, I assume that he does not envisage a widespread exercise of the power, otherwise the bill would become a nullity. I wonder if he is in a position to clarify the matter for the House.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: First of all, exemption would only be considered by the Minister on recommendation of the medical services insurance council to whom application must be made under the law. There are a few instances, I am told, where exemption could be considered. In one case, it might be a small organization doing a limited type of work, but doing it well. And having done it over a period of time would find it financially impossible to carry on. They might not have the reserves that the superintendent of insurance insists on, and would insist on under this bill. Yet they are quite capable of carrying on in the small limited area in which they now operate. This would be a possibility, but all of these are only hypothetical possibilities.

Secondly, there might be a type of programme permitted under the Act which would call for the complete revamping of an organization now in the field. Again, this would very likely apply to small and very limited organizations.

Then there might a type of organization which would not lend itself to offering the standard contract, and yet they, too, would be performing a useful service.

All these three hypothetical cases are really variations of one, they refer to some small organizations which have been carrying on, have been doing a good work and could continue to do a good work provided they were not called upon, as they might be under the Act, to go into the widescale offering of the standard contract with all the administrative and other demands that would be put upon them.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, would it then be fair to conclude from the hon. Minister's explanation that exemptions would not be contemplated in the case of any carrier that purported to carry on business in the whole of the province or a substantial part of it? Would it be fair to assume that you would not contemplate exemptions in those cases?

Hon. Mr. Dymond: That is right, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Chairman: Shall section 2 form part of the bill?

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask about the designated open enrolment period. Could the hon. Minister tell us roughly how often these enrolment periods would be? Is the hon. Minister thinking of them once every three months, or does he think it might be advisable if this were actually designated in the Act?

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Mr. Chairman, at one time we did contemplate designating it, not in the Act, but in the regulations, but then we recognized that, if you were to designate the open enrolment period, of course, you would nullify its value.

There will be a substantial open enrolment period at the beginning of the proposal, that is prior to June 1, 1966. After that, they will come at intervals, and it would be quite unwise—unbusinesslike, actually—to advise much in advance of the onset of the open enrolment period, since the great advantage of enrolling during the open enrolment period is, of course, that there is no waiting period, except for pregnancy and such other limitation as are outlined in the bill. But they will be reasonably spaced, and I think that you will have to accept our word for this, because we must look at the business end of the operation as well.

If we were to say in the Act that on such-and-such a date there will be an open enrolment period by law or by regulation, those who might want to come in would wait until such time and, therefore, they would not have a three-month waiting period. I suppose one could say that the waiting period is something of a penalty for not coming in during an open enrolment period. I think we would defeat the purpose of the bill if we were to designate, or lay down by the Act, or by the regulations, when the open enrolment periods would come.

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Chairman, if I could be excused for making this remark, it seems to me there has been a great deal more emphasis on the aspect of business than there has been on general coverage for people across the province. I still think that there are people who may be justified exemption in the sense that they had not enrolled during the period—men who perhaps have served in the armed forces or something. I admit they have coverage while they are in the armed forces, but they have been out of the country and when they come back they have to wait until the discretion of the hon. Minister to have an open enrolment period. Others might have gone down to the U.S. to study or doctors who have gone over to take some special kind of tour around the hospitals in Europe—I am just throwing out a variety of situations—and through no fault of the individual at all, he comes back and finds that he is not covered and then he has to wait.

I suggest there should be some means by which a person could come before a board of appeal in order to express his case. I know under the hospital services commission that the hon. Minister has been, I think, very reasonable in some cases. I can think of one case where the mother was becoming senile and had forgotten to look after the premium. This was brought to the attention of the hon. Minister and, in his compassion, he arranged for this to be overcome. There could be a number of other cases where this could be done. Business is all right and this sort of hard, systematic approach may have some justification; but we are still talking about the health of people and I would hope that some means where the extension could be given consideration could be reached. Is this something the hon. Minister is considering?

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Yes, Mr. Chairman, this is quite true and it is a very good point. Some of the cases which he presented as possibilities would actually have no difficulty because there is provision in the Act for moving from one plan to this without loss of benefit. I would also assure you, Mr. Chairman, that the very same rules will obtain in this case as now obtain in the case of the hospital services commission where there is a committee to consider all these unusual cases on their merits. In fact, the Act states that the medical services insurance council can hear all complaints. All of these things would automatically go before them and we would act upon their recommendations.

I can assure the hon. leader of the Opposition that while it may sound as though we are putting emphasis upon the business aspect of it, our main concern and our main intention, of course, is to provide the best possible coverage we can. Nevertheless, one must be realistic and must understand that money does not grow on trees, and I am afraid it would hurt me dreadfully if I had to spend it wantonly or foolishly. Nevertheless, it will be spent with an eye singled to our concern for the people first.

Section 2 agreed to.

On section 3:

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, section 3 in my view, is one of the most important sections of the Act because we are now dealing with the medical services insurance council, which is the body that is going to guide the destiny of this plan.

On the basis of the experience we have already had with this government's choice of so-called public representatives, and then discovering that by strange coincidence they all had the same point of view, I think we should be alerted here. For example, in the Hagey committee that the government established, there were some 13 or 14 members on it and when all their views had become sorted out we discovered that there was one person who was in favour of a public Medicare plan; and that was the one who was designated as a representative on behalf of the Ontario federation of labour. All of the others had either links with the associations, or were themselves personally convinced that private Medicare was the kind of Medicare that they were going to recommend. This was the term of reference in which the whole committee had to operate.

Now let us see what we have here. It is a proposal that there will be a committee of nine members: five representative of the public, two representative of the medical profession nominated by the Ontario medical association and two representative of the licensed carriers nominated by the corporations. In other words, the only two bodies that this government has seen fit to give the right to make certain that their views are represented by somebody whom they have absolute confidence in are the medical association and the insurance carriers.

They are going to be four of a group of nine. Conceivably, when you choose a chairman, you are going to have a 4/4 split in the council under normal circumstances. In my view, Mr. Chairman, this is not a representative body of the kind that should be responsible for the basic decisions in the operation of the kind of plan that the government is taking its famous "first step in the direction of."

Therefore, I want to present to the hon. Minister—and I shall do so by way of an amendment—proposals that this body should be broadened to include genuine representation of the public. The right that the government is going to retain rather exclusively for the Ontario medical association, or for the licensed carriers, should be broadened to other groups in the community who have indicated during the course of the public debate on this issue in the last two or three years that they are people who have intelligent views, well-substantiated views that are a reflection of a good many people in this province.

Also, if you move to section 2, subsection 2, you will note here that the Lieutenant-Governor in Council shall designate one of the members of the council as chairman. Now, quite frankly, I think when you are establishing a council to operate a scheme of this nature that it should be clearly indicated in the Act that the man who is going to be chosen as chairman is not going to be representative of the vested interests in the field up until now, namely, the insurance carriers or the medical association; but somebody who can be as an impartial chairman, representative of the public and get as good a balance as possible among all of the various views that may emerge.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I want to move that:

Section 3 of Bill 136 be amended by striking out subsections 1 and 2 thereof and substituting the following:

1. That there shall be a medical services insurance council which will be appointed by the Lieutenant-Governor in Council and which shall be composed of 11 members as follows:

i. 7 representative of the public, one of whom shall be nominated by the Ontario federation of agriculture; one by the Ontario farmers' union; one by the Ontario branch of the Canadian association of consumers; one by the Ontario federation of labour, one by the Ontario welfare council; one by the Canadian association of social workers, Ontario division; and one from the Canadian council of churches from among its members in Ontario.

ii. 2 representative of the medical profession, nominated by the Ontario medical association.

iii. 2 representative of the licensed carriers, nominated by the corporation.

The Lieutenant-Governor in Council shall designate one of the members representative of the public as chairman.

Mr. Chairman, you will note that, in the organizations that we have suggested should be given representation, you have bodies which have indicated an intense interest in this whole issue. I cite, for example, the council of churches. You have had many of the churches playing a very active role in the public discussion and presentations to the Hagey commission and, subsequently, presentations to the government. All of these bodies, I think, have had their say and should form a part of the broader public representation and that, from their ranks, the chairman should be chosen—rather than leaving it open for the chairman to be chosen from either the representatives of the Ontario medical association or the insurance carriers.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Mr. Chairman, I would have thought the hon. member for York South would rather leave it since there might be the possibility of one of the representatives of the profession, the so-called vested-interest people, being present. Having said the chairman would be in the position of having to cast the deciding vote on occasions, it would seem to me that this would automatically let one out.

However, this was never contemplated, I can assure you, and I would point out to the hon. member that the section states that the council shall be appointed by the Lieutenant-Governor in Council. While it is laid down in the Act also that the representatives of the profession and the representatives of the carriers shall be nominated by their own bodies, it is not laid down in the Act that they shall accept the nominations. One, I suppose, would expect that this would be done, but this is not inherent in this section of the Act and this is very often done. We ask those who are concerned in these matters. Of course, the profession is going to provide the services and the carriers are going to carry the insurance coverage on four-fifths of our people, and naturally they have a deep and abiding interest in these things, Mr. Chairman.

I cannot say I am overly enamoured of the proposal that we single out representatives of particular groups. The hon. member has mentioned seven groups, all of them good, but they do not embody all of the people of the province of Ontario, nor do they represent all of the people of the province of Ontario.

I so well recollect, sir, when the former Prime Minister spoke in this House about setting up the Ontario hospital services commission. He was very meticulous in pointing out that it would not be representative of any particular group or interest but that the members would be chosen to represent the people of the province of Ontario.

Whether my hon. friend believes me or not I can assure him that so far as I was concerned, and the hon. Prime Minister can speak for himself, from the intimate knowledge I had of this matter of the Hagey commission, neither one of us, I am quite sure, had any ideas of the views of these people. We did expect that a representative of labour would have a certain view and, of course, he did, because he never made any secret about it. I had spoken to Mr. Simon on previous occasions and knew his views. On the other hand, I looked upon him as a man of sound intellect and broad vision. I had some very interesting chats with him and was very interested in some of his views.

I would therefore say, sir, that I could not willingly accept this proposal that we tie down by law a stipulation that our representation must come from these organizations. Not all the churches are involved in the Canadian council of churches, or at least as far as I know. What about the women's institutes? What about the IODE? What about all of the service organizations? What about all of the fraternal organizations and the great many other bodies, all of them deeply interested in matters of this kind and all of them concerned about their own welfare and the welfare of their fellow men throughout the province? Why would we pick out representatives of seven special groups? We have always believed, at least as I understand it, that all of our people have equal status in the province.

I therefore submit to you, Mr. Chairman, that it would be far better to leave this provision as we have it, so that we have free rein to choose the representatives of the public from the population at large. If we find on experience that our wisdom has not been sound, and that the belief of the hon. member is better, then I am quite certain that this Legislature in its wisdom at a later date will give further consideration to it. But who is to tell whether my thinking is better than the hon. member's or his better than mine? I believe mine is better, I believe mine is reasonable, and he has the same right to believe likewise of his own. But I believe that this is a sound way. We did not agree with the recommendation of the committee, we added to the public representation, and I believe that this can work.

I would point out, too, sir, that I think the hon. member believes the council has greater powers than it actually has. Further on in the section it will be noted that the council is an advisory body. It is not responsible for the day-to-day executive operation of the plan. It is an advisory body to the Minister on all of these various things.

Mr. J. B. Trotter (Parkdale): Mr. Chairman, I just want to say a few words in supporting this amendment. I am quite willing to admit that there are weaknesses in having seven certain groups on such a board, but the amendment suggested by the hon. member for York South is much in preference to the very narrow basis which the present section gives to this council. This council, in effect, leaves the control of the operation of the health scheme in the hands of doctors and insurance companies, because if you have two representatives for the doctors and two for the insurance companies there are four on one side already; all they need is one out of five in order to swing any vote their way.

This goes to the heart of the bill, section 3 and section 4. In essence we are making a strong vested interest that much stronger, and if we take this false step we are going to have an extremely difficult time in the history of this province in order to get a health scheme back up on the proper rails. Again, as is said so often, this is a sellout to two particular strong groups and we are going to have an extremely difficult time to break the vise-like hold that section 3 and section 4 give to these two groups.

I may question this matter of someone from the Canadian council of churches being on this, but again we know this, that the Canadian council of churches has supported broad views in health services. I would want to see someone from labour on it, because labour today in its large unions is highly articulate and well trained. The unions have views that help not just organized labour but are more or less for those people in the lower economic groups in our province, so that the amendment gives a far broader suggestion and far broader interest to this council than the present section.

The weakness which I think is going to be a very serious thing for the future of all health services in this province, is that you have given the control to two groups that are already far too strong, particularly insurance companies.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, the hon. Minister put up quite a smokescreen in opposing this amendment. He argued that the government has not in the past, and should not now, adopt the policy of giving recognition to special interest groups in a matter of this kind. How can he make such an argument in face of the section that is right in front of us, I do not know. The section in front of us provides specifically that there are two special-interest groups that will be specifically represented on this council. So he cannot say that he is treating all people equally; some are obviously more equal than others, namely, the medical association and the—

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, I would point out to the hon. member that I thought I had made it eminently clear that the two groups were the two groups very much involved. There are three groups actually included in the council—the three groups much involved—the consumers, represented by five; those who provide the service represented by two; and the third party, which pays for the service through the insurance it collects, is the insurance carriers. This is the only differentiation or specification laid down within the terms of the clause.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, the comment really makes no difference to the point I am proposing to make. There is no indication of where the public representatives are to come from. That is the first point. Second, I would suggest to the hon. Minister that though the interest of the Ontario medical association and the licensed carriers should certainly be given full recognition; the basic principle should be that paramount over everything is the interest of the public. Under this council it is most unlikely that primary consideration will be given to the interest of the public.

We proposed in our amendment that there should be seven public representatives or that there should be a council of 11, with seven of them public representatives. Of those seven one would be chairman, so that the other members would split six for the public and four for the special-interest groups, whose interests are quite legitimate and we agree should be recognized.

The hon. Minister has suggested that the particular bodies we designate as having the right to nominate members to the council, does not represent the entire public. One of the difficulties, of course, is always the problem of finding a way of getting genuine representation of the public. I suggest to the hon. Minister, however, that if one takes the seven organizations suggested in the amendment, they directly or indirectly represent the overwhelming bulk of the public in this province. Unquestionably, the farm organizations, the central federation of labour, the consumers' organization, the welfare council, the churches and the other bodies together, represent the public.

Hon. Mr. Grossman (Minister of Reform Institutions): What about the synagogues?

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, I was just coming to another point, which the hon. Minister has now precipitated. If the government feels that there are other organizations that should properly be allowed to nominate people for this council, we would not dispute the point. I think the hon. Minister of Health made a fairly good point when he mentioned the women's institutes. We would be quite happy to see this as a 15-person council, with three or four other organizations designated.

We do insist, however, Mr. Chairman, if certain bodies are to have the right to nominate members, then the thing will be in very bad balance if the others are merely to be chosen from the ranks of good Tories, or according to some other principle that this Legislature knows nothing about.

That is the normal way it has been done, and we can only go on past experience. The problem is, Mr. Chairman, that up until now the hon. Minister has listened to absolutely nobody except the Ontario medical association and the licensed carriers. He is now proposing to set up a council to advise him, in which the voices of those organizations will predominate. Thus we not only will have legislation which really only reflects their viewpoint, and the viewpoint of very few people beyond them; but we will also have the administration reflecting their viewpoint. I presume that the hon. Minister—since he sees fit to set up the council—will consider its advice very carefully, and it is natural that he will be greatly influenced by its advice. We would like to see some other voices coming to his attention and to the attention of the government for a change. All of the bodies that we have listed, and others that we have not listed here, are large, widespread organizations, or else organizations with a very special contact with the consumers of medical services—such as the welfare council. All of these bodies have advocated a different type of approach to medical care insurance than the government is putting before us in this bill.

The two bodies that are specifically entitled to nominate members of this council have advocated even a narrower approach. It was only under public pressure that the government went slightly beyond their approach, but very slightly. But the other bodies—the federation of agriculture, the farmers' union, the federation of labour and the welfare council—all of them proposed universal medical care insurance.

There is one other reference I would like to make during the course of the debate on second reading. I am not going over that debate but one interesting new point came out; that was that the government regarded this bill as merely the first step of a first step for comprehensive health insurance. In the past, when we had a bill of a similar nature before us, the government stated that it was the be-all and the end-all; the final solution to the problem. Now it has changed its opinion, and under the circumstances, I welcome that change of opinion. I think that under the circumstances we should do everything possible to ensure that the government's clear voice—

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, would the hon. member tell us from what fact or source he got the statement he just made, that a previous bill we introduced was stated to be the be-all and the end-all?

Mr. Bryden: This was going to solve the problem. That was your position, not only in this House, but the position of the Tory party in the election campaign—

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Mr. Chairman, I asked on my point of order, if the hon. member would quote his reference.

Mr. Bryden: Well, I could certainly get you lots of evidence. I do not have them here—

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Mr. Chairman, I asked if the hon. member would quote his reference.

Mr. Bryden: I suggested that this was the position that the government took, and more particularly that the Tory party took in the election campaign—

Mr. Chairman: Order! Order!

Mr. Bryden: Let us leave it at that, I think the public can decide for themselves what position you took.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Bryden: If it was really that important, I would be happy to go back and dig up the files on what your party said in the election campaign and what you said in the House.

Mr. W. D. McKeough (Kent West): Stick to the amendment.

Mr. Bryden: Well, he was the man who diverted the matter.

Mr. McKeough: You were away off the point.

Mr. Bryden: No, no! The trouble is that the hon. member for Kent West—I had better make sure I get the direction right—the hon. member for Kent West is most of the time away off. He occasionally comes up to hear what is going on, but he does not hear it in its context, so he sometimes gets confused.

Mr. Chairman, what I was on the point of saying, when the hon. Minister challenged the accuracy of my remarks, was this: If the government is now prepared, as appears to be the case, to treat this as merely a first step that will be enlarged, that will in time I hope, cover more people than will now be covered, that will lead to universal medical care insurance and ultimately to complete health insurance, then I think it is very important that it should hear from the people who believe in that concept, in carrying on the administration of this bill.

We all know that administration can make a big difference to a bill. It can broaden or contract its import. I am in favour of the principle of broadening as we gain in experience. I think that is probably in line with government thinking. So let the government hear from the people who want a broader approach. Let them not hear only, or mainly, from the people who want the narrowest possible approach. My feeling is the government should hear all sides of the question, and therefore should accept our amendment or something similar to it. We are not wedded to the specific words. We would be quite prepared to consider an alternative that would accomplish the same basic purpose. If the government would accept that, then I think we could look forward to a gradual broadening of the administration of the Act, and ultimately to legislative amendments that would put in a genuine medical care insurance programme in this province.

As my leader, the hon. member for York South said, this is really the central clause in the whole bill. How this council goes, the positions it takes and the advice it gives to the Minister will have a great influence on the future development of medical care insurance in this province. I believe the government should accept the amendment, with such modifications as appear reasonable—accepting the spirit of it in place of the clearly unsatisfactory section that is now in the bill; a section that unquestionably is going to give a dominant voice in the future to two interest groups, the same interest groups as have had the dominant voice in the past.

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Chairman, I would like to speak on this proposed amendment and I would agree that, in principle, it is trying to get a broader section of the community to be advising concerning health services. I think this is completely commendable. To me, in the construction of this bill—as has been said by others—there has been far too much closed-shop thinking on the part of the hon. Minister of Health. It was during the Hagey commission, the studies by the commission and the representation that you found the aspirations and the wants and the needs of the people being expressed. Unfortunately, they were not listened to.

But I bring up another point why it should be widened. I think that there is going to be grave concern that the people throughout this province should be aware of exactly what you are offering. They will want to know about the enrolment date. I suspect, frankly, Mr. Chairman, that there are a large number of people who, at this point, believe that the intentions of the government are to provide complete health coverage by this bill. They are going to be bitterly disillusioned when they find out that they still have to pay for prescription drugs and for a number of other services. In fairness to them, I think that if you have a board of representation on your council it may be able to suggest to you that people really do not know what this bill is all about, or what is being offered in it, and that there should be a much more massive campaign by means of advertising.

After the amendment is spoken to, I hope that the hon. Minister will tell us something of the approach that is going to be taken to get across to the people just what services are being provided. Are social workers going to be used? Or doctors' offices? Just what is going to be used?

I appreciate that, in discussing this amendment, it is not the time to raise these points, but I hope the hon. Minister will clarify for us how this bill is going to be explained to the public.

Mr. J. Renwick (Riverdale): Mr. Chairman, what we are asking the government to do is to recognize the preponderant public interest in the whole plan and scheme which the government has put forward in this bill and in this particular section. Surely, it is not unreasonable—just as the government felt that it was not unreasonable that they could not accept the Hagey commission report, which would have reduced public representation to three, with two each for the carriers and for the Ontario medical association. The government raised this by its own volition to five to four in the council—surely, it is not unreasonable to ask that the public be properly represented.

The hon. Minister has stated that for some reason or other the Lieutenant-Governor in Council is not going to have to accept the nominees of the medical association or of the carriers. That is quite contrary to what is stated in the bill. The Lieutenant-Governor in Council, when this bill is passed, will only be able to appoint to this council, persons who have been nominated by the Ontario medical association and by the carriers.

There may well be a way in which the government could deal with persons who had been put forward by suggesting that they were not acceptable people. But ultimately they have to have persons on the medical council who are, in fact, nominated by those two organizations. What we are saying here is simply why not take a broad spectrum of the associations in the province of Ontario which represent the people of the province of Ontario. We have made our suggestions as to which those associations should be. Let representatives be appointed from those organizations as representative of the public.

Then we make the further point that the bill should be specifically clear that the chairman of the council, regardless of any change in the government views from time to time, must be a member representative of the public.

I am certain, Mr. Chairman, that the government must recognize why we take this position, that is because we have no confidence in the government because of the way in which they appointed the members of the Hagey committee. The Hagey committee was not in any way representative of anywhere up to 50 per cent of the people of the province of Ontario that this bill is designed to assist, and yet the government purported to suggest to the people of the province of Ontario that in some way this was a broadly representative committee which dealt with this bill.

The government knows, as well as we know, that had that committee been a committee representing a wide spectrum of the associations of people throughout this province, it would not have come up with that particular kind of report.

Now we are faced with that report. The principle of the bill was approved by this House, and now what we are asking is that the government will recognize the very important interests of the people of this province. They are far greater and far more important than the interests of either the medical insurance carriers or of the Ontario medical association.

We recognize that they have an interest, but we do not recognize that they have an interest which, on a mathematical calculation, is somewhere in the ratio of five to four under this bill. We think the amendment put forward by the hon. leader of this party is eminently reasonable, eminently sensible and would, and must, appeal to the people of the province of Ontario. And it must appeal to this government.

We would ask that the government, for once in this debate, recognize the merit of at least one of the proposals which are being put forward to this House. It is not an unreasonable request. We ask the government seriously to consider accepting this as a recommendation, and if necessary, adding other groups so that, as I stated at the outset, the preponderant public interest in this whole plan would be recognized clearly by the government. Then as this plan develops, if there is a small opening toward the left in the way in which a medical plan should be carried forward, there will be a council and a vehicle which would lead us eventually to a comprehensive scheme.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, I would like to add two points in conclusion on the debate on this amendment.

There is one basic factor in the approach to medical insurance that we have apparently not succeeded in conveying to this government. Medical insurance is not for the doctors. Medical insurance is not for the insurance companies. Medical insurance is for the people, and even when you get to the body which is going to be advisory, you should have a clear preponderance of representatives of the people.

At least I give the hon. Minister of Health marks for being consistent. When I was revealing two or three months ago the nature of the committee that he established back in 1962 to advise him—a committee which had 24 doctors and 11 spokesmen for the insurance company on it—he said quite frankly—and it is in the record—“I asked the people who I thought could give me the most help.” In other words, the doctors and the insurance companies! Now, what about the representatives of the great mass of people for whom medical insurance was being established? That is my first point.

The second point is that the hon. Minister of Health got into a bit of an argument on what exactly he had said in the last election campaign. The significant fact, and it was nowhere more emphatically underlined than in the concluding words of the hon. Prime Minister when he ended the debate on second reading, is that until two years ago, this government was completely and irrevocably in support of exclusively private medicare. Now the pressure of events has driven it away from that position.

Today you have a bill which is a real philosophic mongrel; it is public medicare for a million people; it is mixed public and private medicare for 800,000 people and it is purely private medicare for the other 75 per cent of the population. It is a complete mixture of everything, and the hon. Prime Minister concluded his comments on second reading by saying—

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Mr. Chairman, are we once again debating second reading of this bill?

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, I wish the hon. Prime Minister would not try to play the role of obstructionist—

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Chairman: Order. We must keep to the amendment.

Mr. MacDonald: We are talking, Mr. Chairman, in this amendment before the House of the nature of the body which is going to guide the destiny of the organization, and how representative this should be. I was drawing attention to the fact that the hon. Prime Minister, in the concluding part of his remarks, said that he agreed and sympathized with those on the other side of the House, and that they were going to move toward it, they were taking the first step.

Mr. Chairman, the council, as the hon. Minister of Health has indicated, is the body that is going to be advising him. Are you going to have a group of people whose advice will take you back to the private medicare from which you have been driven by public pressures, or are you going to have a group of people, genuinely representative of the province of Ontario, who will persuade you to move in the direction the hon. Prime Minister professes he is interested in going slowly—“in the fullness of time.”

The object of this amendment is to broaden the representation of that group. As hon. members in the Liberal Party, and some of my colleagues have conceded, let the government take it, make it 15, bring in the women's institutes, bring in all groups that you think will make it as nearly as possible representative of the people of Ontario, because I repeat, medicare is for the people and not for the doctors and the insurance companies, no matter what this government persists in believing.

Mr. Chairman: All those in favour of the amendment moved by Mr. MacDonald, say “aye.”

Those opposed, say “nay.”

In my opinion the “nays” have it.

Call in the members.

All in favour of Mr. MacDonald's amendment, will please stand.

Those opposed, please stand.

Clerk of the House: Mr. Chairman, the “ayes” are 20, the “nays” 54.

Mr. Chairman: I declare the amendment lost.

Section 3 agreed to.

On section 4:

Mr. Trotter: Mr. Chairman, I want to say a few words in regard to this, and the administration of Medical Carriers Incorporated as set forth in section 4. It is much similar to section 3, and in this again we find that the corporation is completely in the hands of the licensed carriers, except of course for the chairman. When you have a board of directors consisting of seven and just one chairman, who is appointed from some area other than the licensed carriers, it is obvious that the licensed carriers, in effect, are going to control the whole system of medical insurance having to do with the public over and beyond those who are receiving their insurance free or subsidized. After all, the licensed carriers are literally going to control 75 per cent of the market for medical insurance here in the province of Ontario.

What is even worse, Mr. Chairman, it is going to hinder the expansion of health insurance throughout the province of Ontario, because if there is any single group worse than the present Tory government in dragging its heels in bringing in any kind of insurance to protect the people of the province, it has been the licensed carriers, with the one exception of the non-profit groups.

But it is obvious that the real power, the real control, is going to centre again in the hands of a vested interest. Even through such groups as the physician-sponsored groups it intends to be dominated again by the Ontario medical association, and this is proved over and over in the last year or 18 months. Let us bear in mind that even the Ontario medical association includes only half of the number of doctors in the province. We can see that again it is a very tightly controlled group which is going to have the real economic control of such a system.

Therefore I would like to bring in an amendment to this section. In that amendment I am going to suggest that the seven directors be appointed by order-in-council for that reason. I do not specify that they belong to any particular group in the community; I realize in this there is the danger, as was pointed out by the hon. member for York South, that the council could be loaded with one political party. This is true in so many of our appointments. Even despite this fact we have a good opportunity of getting a broad spectrum of the public, and at least we should not be dominated by one single group.

I realize, as the hon. Minister of Health said, if you name a number of groups to appear as directors on this particular corporation you may leave out some who would be annoyed. It was proved, even in Saskatchewan, that when they started out the council got too cumbersome when they tried to name too many groups to the board. It is wise to keep the board of directors on this corporation small.

The paramount consideration should be the public, and the directors should also lay out the ground work for the future of medical insurance, and, over and above medical insurance, health insurance. If, again, we leave it in such control where doctors obviously dominate the chiropractors, the osteopaths and the dentists, all of these groups are going to be found to play a secondary role, a very much secondary role in that they hardly have a voice. It would be hoped that when you do appoint a board of directors, you bring in such groups as the labour unions who have shown such a wide experience.

Bearing this in mind, I am going to submit this amendment, Mr. Chairman:

That section 4, subsections (1) and (2) be amended to read as follows:

(1) There is hereby established a corporation without share capital under the name of "Medical Carriers Incorporated," whose membership shall be composed of the licensed carriers, and seven members to be appointed by the Lieutenant-Governor in Council.

(2) The board of directors of the corporation shall consist of seven directors all of whom shall be representative of the public and shall be appointed by the Lieutenant-Governor in Council; the Lieutenant-Governor in Council shall designate one of the members of the council as chairman.

Mr. Chairman: Mr. Trotter moves:

That the board of directors of the corporation shall consist of seven directors all of whom shall be representative of the public and shall be appointed by the Lieutenant-Governor in Council. The Lieutenant-Governor in Council shall designate one of the members of the council as chairman.

That section 4 be amended to read as follows:

(1) There is hereby established a corporation without share capital under the name of "Medical Carriers Incorporated," whose membership shall be composed of the licensed carriers, and seven members to be appointed by the Lieutenant-Governor in Council.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Is this not redundant to the bill itself? Does this not change the principle of the whole bill, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. Trotter: No, it is administration. When we argued the principle we opposed that the carriers be members of the corporation; we did not want the licensed carriers ever to be part of the corporation—that was the principle.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: The principle was carried.

Mr. Trotter: All right, we lost on that. Now we are suggesting a change in the administration; it is not an argument on principle.

An hon. member: Let us vote on it.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Mr. Chairman, I think my hon. friend from Parkdale has very obviously not read this section of the Act. First of all, the setting up by law of this Medical Insurance Carriers Incorporated has nothing to do with the control, or otherwise, of medical services insurance, or health insurance. This corporation is established for the business of running the insurance function only.

It would be absolute folly, Mr. Chairman, to accept this amendment which the hon. member has made. This would be tantamount to saying to the board of directors of the Toronto General Trusts that by law, "we are going to state that no person who has any interest in your business can sit on your board of directors." This is really what this is.

This is a business corporation. Its main function is to administer the combined business of the carriers and nothing else. It is quite true that the corporation has the right to make certain recommendations to the council, but its most important function is the pooling of the high-cost risks. This is a matter which must be done by those who are experts in the field of insurance and know what they are talking about.

If we were to accept the amendment which the hon. member has made, I submit to you, Mr. Chairman, we would have to go out and find persons expert in the business of insurance to administer this and that would be ridiculous to the point of folly. I suggest, therefore, sir, that this amendment should certainly not even be considered.

Mr. Chairman: All in favour of the amendment please say "aye."

Mr. Young: Mr. Chairman, I was waiting to see whether you were ruling this in order or not, and I presume you are ruling it in order.

Mr. Chairman: In order!

Mr. Young: Mr. Chairman, I want to make some remarks regarding it. I would prefer to see some other method used in amending this section but we will support the amendment.

I think what the hon. Minister says makes some sense, that this is an organization of the carriers, and therefore should be dealing with their business. If it is that and if we are to maintain that that is such, then it seems to me that these powers that are spelled out—the various sections (a), (b), (c), (d), (e), (f) and (g) of section 5—are powers which should not be given in legislation. Certainly section 6, which says:

(6) The corporation shall establish and administer a system for the pooling of standard risks—

—is logical and proper for this kind of organization. But when it comes to the matter of recommending changes and benefits, subscription rates, and the enrolment periods, these are matters which should be dealt with by the council and I recognize the council has the final say.

This is a pressure group which is going to make recommendations, and the members are going to recommend for the benefit of the carriers, not for the benefit of the citizens themselves. What we are giving here is legal status to a pressure group, to a lobby. These people will lobby anyway, they will make their representations to the council, but I see no reason why they should be given the legal status in legislation to do this job.

The council should have this responsibility; it can listen to whatever representations it wishes but they should be informal representations. These people in this corporation will have a direct interest in the matters which are spelled out here and therefore they should not deal with them in an official capacity at all. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that this matter should be kept as it is, that is, as far as the corporation is concerned, although we are quite willing to go along with the recommendation or the amendment because of the fact that we cannot make the other one at the present time. But we certainly would like to see this legal status to a lobby removed. We do not object to the lobby being there—this is a normal practice of democracy—but if we are not going to cut out subsection 5, I think the only answer is the answer which the hon. member for Parkdale has given, and make the directors people who represent the public rather than the carriers.

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Chairman, I would just like to re-emphasize the remarks of both of the previous speakers. I am sorry, I exclude the hon. Minister of Health from that and the hon. member for Riverdale. I do not infer that they did not speak but I naturally do not support their remarks.

I would say on these grounds that under 4 (c), which says:

(c) pass bylaws governing the qualification, classification and regulation of its members;

I think it is very obvious to us that any group that had self-interests, any group that had profit motivation above community motivation, could exercise it. As the hon. Minister of Health has said: Why not have profit motivation in connection with health; I am all for this! I paraphrase you, sir, but this is pretty much in a nutshell what you had mentioned.

This profit motivation may be the main purpose, and I do not say it is, of all the schemes. But what a field day they will have with this section where they can decide among themselves what are the necessary qualifications for their closed group. Why, they may stop any other groups from coming in; sitting among themselves they may decide about the co-operatives, "We are not overly happy about them because they do not have the profit motive aspects to the same extent as we have them; they do not rancor their blood in the same way, so let us work out some bylaws to exclude them."

I say, sir, that you have given a closed shop to a group of insurance-company carriers, you have given them a complete licence to go ahead and set up the kind of regulations whereby they can put a large fence around themselves, and if they want to, they can have a field day sending out standard policies, and so on, arranging what the standard policies will be, and cutting out people. Just let me read section 3:

—pass bylaws governing the qualification, classification and regulation of its members.

It seems obvious to me that this is surely giving the decision of who can be enrolled to a group of private insurance companies themselves, and I say this is dangerous and it is abhorrent, and therefore I concur with the amendment.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Mr. Chairman, I did not intend to say any more on this, but I really stand aghast at the shallow thinking of my hon. friend, the leader of the Opposition. I had believed that he could do a more penetrating analysis of a piece of legislation than it is obvious he did. How in the name of common sense can this "carriers incorporated" rule out anybody? First of all they must be licensed under one of two Acts, The Insurance Act or the P.K. Services, or whatever the name of it is under The Corporations Act. They must first be licensed to sell this type of insurance in the province of Ontario, and then they become licensed under this Act. If they are going to continue in the business they must belong to Medical Carriers Incorporated, this is inherent in the setting up of the corporation. So how in the name of common sense can Medical Carriers Incorporated rule out any of the 190—in fact there are over 200 indemnity carriers, 44 prepaid or nonprofit plans and I do not know how many self-insurance plans, all of them now operating in the province. That certainly cannot even be imagined under this section.

Now, the hon. member for Yorkview had some fears about the first two, but I would point out to you, Mr. Chairman, this only gives them the right to recommend. As the hon. member said, if a group is disposed to lobby they will lobby anyway, whether you give them the right to do it legally or otherwise. I do not know whether lobbying can ever be considered legal or illegal, but they will do it in spite of anything you do. By giving them the right to make recommendations to the council, which in turn shall make recommendations to the Minister, who in turn will submit them for final decision by the Lieutenant-Governor in Council, I do not see that there is very much basis for fear. As the hon. member pointed out himself quite clearly, if this is to be interpreted as lobbying, the insurance carriers will lobby in spite of anything we do.

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Chairman, I would simply like to say through you, sir, to the hon. Minister of Health, that I will just throw out one regulation which could be a means of causing groups to be omitted. I hearken back to the discussion we were having in the Legislature, I think yesterday, in connection with a group who are in the health field, and they are deciding that you cannot advertise the price of drugs. Under this situation I see no reason why—the hon. Minister either has a greater faith in profit-making institutions than I have, or profit-making agencies—when you say how on earth could they in any way exclude a group, do you have section saying: "pass bylaws governing the qualification, classification and regulation of its members"? Why is this in if you say that the membership is already screened and decided on through two other processes? Why do you have this group making qualification, classification and regulation of its members?

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Mr. Chairman, the only right that this group has is to pass bylaws governing qualification, classification and regulation of its members with respect to Medical Carriers Incorporated. It does not have any right to interfere with any other part of the operation of the Act. It only refers to this corporation, which is going to run its own affairs, and nothing else.

Mr. Bryden: Well, Mr. Chairman, it is a little more than, I think—

Hon. Mr. Roberts: Mr. Chairman, may I interrupt the hon. member? I made a commitment that at 5 o'clock we would deal with other public bills and orders. We will return to this debate in due course.

Hon. Mr. Roberts moves that the committee of the whole House rise and report certain resolutions and certain bills without amendment and certain bills with amendments, and ask for leave to sit again.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Chairman: Mr. Speaker, the committee of the whole House begs to report certain bills without amendment and certain bills with amendments, and asks for leave to sit again.

Report agreed to.

Clerk of the House: The 57th order. Resuming the adjourned debate on the motion for second reading of Bill No. 32, An Act to provide for the appointment of a commissioner to investigate administrative decisions and acts of officials of the government of Ontario and its agencies, and to define the commissioner's powers and duties.

COMMISSIONER TO INVESTIGATE ADMINISTRATIVE DECISIONS

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): Mr. Speaker, when I moved the adjournment of this debate the last time this matter was before the House, I had begun to outline some of the reasons why I believe that we should have an ombudsman in Ontario. I am not going to go back and repeat what I have already said, but I will carry on with the remarks that I originally intended to make.

As to the actual power and authority of the commissioner, I know as you have read the bill, sir, that you will realize that he has no power to make anything in the nature of an executive order or decision. He cannot give a judgment. He can make a recommendation to the appropriate Minister in the department or agency concerned and request that the department or agency notify him within a specified time of the steps, if any, he proposes to take to give effect to this recommendation. If, within a reasonable time after his report, no action is taken, which seems to him to be adequate and appropriate, he may at his discretion send a copy of his report to the Lieutenant-Governor in Council and may thereafter make such report to the Legislature on the matter as he thinks fit.

The bill that I present to the House provides that no report under it that is adverse to any person shall be made unless the person has been given an opportunity to be heard and unless the person has been given—when being heard—an opportunity to be represented by counsel. While it may be suggested that this procedure might work theoretically, and there may be some criticism addressed to it because the ombudsman has no power to make any orders, it would seem to me that the decision of such a commissioner should not be anything more than a recommendation; the action in respect of which must be determined by government—by the government of the day, in fact. The ultimate sanctions of publicity in Parliament and of public opinion are those to which government departments and agencies are especially responsive, as we all know. I would be very surprised if many, or in fact any, cases would be likely to arise where any governmental official, be he elected or appointed, would be likely to discard out of hand the sort of recommendation made by the ombudsman. Provided in my bill is a statutory provision for persons in custody, or those who are inmates of private sanatoria or mental hospitals, to have the privilege of communicating directly with the commissioner and that no one shall have the right to censor such correspondence.

You know, Mr. Speaker, this matter has already been the subject of some discussion in this sitting of the Legislature. I am not suggesting for a moment that the ombudsman is the complete answer to all of the problems of administrative justice. He is only one weapon, but quite a good one, too, and I think that the appointment of such an official would be a real attempt by the Legislature of the province of Ontario to ensure equal treatment for all of our citizens by this vast machinery of government.

What I am suggesting, sir, is really something quite new in this country and on this continent. The official whose appointment I urge would not be a part of the judicial system nor a part of the administration. He would have to be an officer of the Legislature. I do not believe that the office should develop the formal tradition and trappings of a court, if so, it would fail in its object. By the same token, if it came to be regarded by the people as another arm of government administration, it would also fail in its object. The ombudsman must carve and tread his own particular path, being careful to maintain his independence of both the executive and the judiciary, so as to be able to build a tradition of strong and impartial criticism of government administration on the one hand and of helpfulness to citizens in their dealings with the administration on the other hand.

If this can be achieved, justice will be better served and efficient and humane administration will be promoted.

Some might ask why the problems I have outlined cannot be handled by our courts and our judges. It is my opinion that judges, as a whole, tend to be extremely cautious in dealing with the administrative field of law. There has been a climate in Canada which regards the judge as a danger in the political field, that he wants to second guess the tribunal or the civil servants. The judges, to prevent this criticism and to keep from feeling that fire, have tended to withdraw. By and large, I have found that our judges, in this particular field, have been most cautious and generally unwilling to interfere.

I do not think that I could sum up with more effect, the reasons for the necessity for this office in the province of Ontario, than to quote from Lord Shawcross's introduction to the Wyatt report, which was a report made to the House of Commons in England. He says:

In every growing complexity of the modern state, the interventions of central and local government into the lives and affairs of the ordinary citizen inevitably multiply. For the most part, no doubt, these interventions are for beneficent purposes and have beneficent results, but the nature of governmental and local governmental activity is now such that large areas of discretion are created in respect to all sorts of matters affecting the rights and lives of ordinary people in varying degrees.

The general standards of administration in this country, I think, are high, probably indeed higher than in any other country.

But with the existence of a great bureaucracy there are inevitably cases, insignificant in number, when, through error or indifference, injustice is done or appears to be done. The man of substance can deal with these situations, he is near to the establishment.

I think Lord Shawcross's words have particular application to the situation here in Ontario.

He enjoys status, or possesses the influence which will ensure him the ear of those in authority. He can afford to pursue such legal remedies as may be available. He knows his way around, but too often the little man, the ordinary citizen, is incapable of asserting himself. The farmer with four acres and a cow would never have attempted to force the battlements of Chichel Down.

Well, Chichel Down, Mr. Speaker, is, as you know, a well-known English administrative case, evolving around the government having acquired during the war, a piece of land from a wealthy farmer. At the end of the war, the government gave it to another of its agencies and that agency was going to erect some public housing on it. Well, this gentleman was quite offended, and being a wealthy and affluent person, he was prepared to take on all of the majesty of government, and eventually got before the courts and, after several appeals, was able to get his land back.

But it was only a man of this position and this substance, who would have been able to attack all of the majesty of government, and to quarrel with administrative decisions, these nameless and faceless civil servants that I have been talking about.

The moral of the story, of course, must be quite obvious to us. We have had our Fred Fawcetts, our John Blanks, our Robert Roberts and others, who have benefited from aroused public opinion expressed both in this Legislature and by our news media. How many hundreds of thousands of others are there whom an ombudsman might have been able to help, and from whom we have not heard, or about whom we are not aware?

We do need in this province, this little man's helper, this parliamentary commissioner, not to deal with the things that are headlines in the newspapers. We are able to cope with those reasonably well here and the news media are able to cope with them well.

Mr. A. H. Cowling (High Park): Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Singer: Yes, sir.

Mr. Cowling: How does the hon. member think that a man called a commissioner would hear from the people, if nobody else heard about it? How is this one man going to hear about it?

Mr. Singer: I am suggesting, sir, that he will if it becomes knowledgeable to the community—and I think it will very quickly—that there is an official who is neither a part of the government nor a part of the judiciary; a servant of the Legislature who is available, who will have time to investigate the complaints. The complaints may not be as dramatic as that of Robert Roberts, or Fred Fawcett, or any one of the others that catch the news headlines or are of sufficient news value that the great newspapers of the province of Ontario can afford to put their star reporters on for days and weeks, writing headlines and keeping on public pressure. They may be important enough to interest various members of the Legislature, to bring here. But my point is that we need a public official who will look after the little man. The complaint may not be the dramatic thing, it may not be the Robert Roberts who is being sent to jail.

Mr. Cowling: Are we not doing that now every day?

Mr. Singer: No, sir, we are not.

Mr. Cowling: I am.

Hon. A. K. Roberts (Minister of Lands and Forests): Mr. Speaker, I have a comment or two. I am wondering what effect this sort of thing might have on the new project for legal aid, which is a pretty broad project.

Mr. Singer: I do not think legal aid is the same sort of subject. I think legal aid is a method of bringing matters before the courts. What I am looking for; what I think the people of Ontario are looking for; what is necessary in states that have the administrative machinery of the type we have, is not another legal procedure, but a method of dealing with administrative procedures. We need a method of getting at the whole civil service, the whole administrative red tape. We must allow an individual to come before somebody, some official who is impartial, and to say, I believe I have been improperly treated, would you please investigate.

Hon. Mr. Roberts: The hon. member has gone through all the legal—

Mr. Singer: No, sir. If my hon. friend would look at the bill, if my hon. friend had examined the bill closely, he would see that I am not suggesting that the ombudsman step in where there is any legal remedy. That is specifically prohibited. He should only make his services available where there is no other remedy. He should work where there is an administrative blank wall, where a complainant cannot get an answer, where he is pushed from department to department, from civil servant to civil servant, where he is told, well that is the system and what can we do about it. That is the sort of thing. The sort of incident I raised with my friend, the hon. Minister of Highways (Mr. MacNaughton), when his estimates were before the House, the man who lives beside Highway 401, whose walls and foundations were damaged by the rumbling of trucks in front of his property. When he appeals to the hon. Minister of Highways, the hon. Minister of Highways says: "Well, we hire a main contractor and we force him to have an insurance policy." So the man goes from the hon. Minister of Highways to the insurer of the head contractor and the insurer of the head contractor says, "Too bad, we're the insurers, but there are seven subcontractors, you have to tell us which one of the seven subcontractors is responsible."

I would think that in this sort of a case—and the hon. Minister of Highways sat and said: "Yes, I agree, if I was in this citizen's position, I would be very unhappy"—I would think if we had an ombudsman's report, and a commissioner's report before the House, a strong positive statement that this is no way to treat the citizens of Ontario, I would think sir, that government would be moved into action. And I would think the experiences in other jurisdictions have indicated this.

I am going to deal very briefly with some of the experiences in Sweden, and I am sure my friend, the hon. Minister of Lands and Forests—

Hon. Mr. Roberts: Would my hon. friend allow me to interrupt again on the point? When he led me into the criminal field, when he talked about these causes célèbres that he referred to certainly they were in the courts. He now moves into another field and says he wants somebody to go into all these administrative departments. Well, what are the hon. members for here in the House, if it is not to protect that kind of thing?

Mr. Singer: I am not satisfied that the hon. members have either the time, the inclination or the resource to sufficiently investigate to do this job properly. The hon. member for Woodbine (Mr. Bryden) says we do not have access to documents. One of the things laid down in this Act, if it becomes law, will be that the parliamentary commissioner can get into the departments, can ask for the files, can bring people before him.

The hon. member for Sudbury (Mr. Sopha), if he has a cause célèbre—and there is not a better investigator in the House than my hon. friend—all he can do is examine and research it to the best of his ability which is substantial. But he cannot summon anyone before him. He cannot ask civil servant "X" to come in and say why did you do this. He cannot ask for the files. He cannot ask for the correspondence. And I do not think that an individual member of the Opposition should have this power.

This is why I am suggesting that an independent person, a person who is responsible only to this Parliament, be given this power. In this way he would be able to protect to a far greater extent, and in a much broader scope, the sort of things that need protection. He would be able to act for the little man. I do not think we have this setup in the province of Ontario.

Hon. Mr. Roberts: The members are supposed to do right by the little man.

Mr. Singer: Well, my friend the hon. Minister of Lands and Forests still is suggesting that that is what the member is supposed to do. I do not think I can make it any clearer. The member, sir, is limited in his time, in his capacity and in the resources that he has available to him. He has no right other than to ask questions. He can ask questions until he is blue in the face. I put a whole flock of them—a hundred and some-odd—on the order paper, and there are still some seven or eight there that have not been answered. I believe that a few of those seven or eight, perhaps all of them, are not going to be answered because the government in its wisdom has seen fit not to answer them.

Well, they will have to take their chances on that. But, Mr. Speaker, if there was a parliamentary commissioner, and he felt that this type of an investigation was worth pursuing and he was given the powers that I outlined in my Act, he would be entitled to get those answers. He would be entitled to summon those civil servants, to put them on oath if necessary and be able to get at the facts and to bring them before the public. That is what is important about this idea and this theory that we are advancing.

As I was saying—to go back to my text—we do need this little man's helper, this parliamentary commissioner, not to deal with the things that are headlines in the newspapers, but to deal with little petty annoyances that creep in despite even the best of Ministers, even as good a Minister as my friend, the hon. Minister of Lands and Forests. And the best of deputy Ministers.

Hon. J. W. Spooner (Minister of Municipal Affairs): What about me?

Mr. Singer: Oh, and the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs. They are all a great bunch of fellows.

It is all very well for the courts to administer law, but to my mind there is an area—and this is what I was getting into in answering the hon. Minister of Lands and Forests—in which the courts are not competent to deal, and that is the area which I have been attempting to define. It is where a person complains of grievances which are not causes of action, which he cannot really get before the courts at all. This is where the ombudsman comes in so that, in addition to the preservation of our personal liberty through the administration of the rule of law, we need to have a feeling of fairness; that our society is built on fairness as well as pure law. We need all the safeguards we can think of to preserve that which we desire in our ordinary society.

Perhaps, Mr. Speaker, you have had an opportunity to read a recent article in the New Yorker magazine, the issue of February 13, 1965. This was written under a Stockholm dateline, and is a most fascinating article dealing with a gentleman, Mr. Alfred Bexelius, the ombudsman for Sweden. Quoting Mr. Bexelius the author says:

The ombudsman has another thing on his side—his annual report.

Mr. Bexelius referred to his latest report which ran to 591 pages.

Each year the ombudsman has to prepare a report for Parliament which covers the activities of his office and provides details of the year's important cases. About 4,000 copies of this report are printed and distributed to all courts and to all governmental agencies.

In Mr. Bexelius' opinion, this is the ombudsman's real weapon, because you can see no one wants to have his name in that book. It is a kind of "Who's Who" in reverse of public officials and civil servants. To keep their names out, and people and the courts and the agencies are likely to be a little more careful about the way they do their work. There you see an important thing—perhaps the most important thing about the ombudsman's office—its very existence prevents any number of faults and abuses of power.

One of the matters referred to by Mr. Bexelius was the submission by him of a rather long report to his government recommending that all administrative agencies be compelled to state the reason for every adverse decision they made. The government sent this report to all agencies to ask their opinion of the recommendation. Of course, all the agencies replied it would be an impossible thing to do. Mr. Bexelius concludes: "I think the government will pass such a law before not too long."

It was a great disappointment along the same line to my hon. colleagues and myself when the bills amending The Liquor Licence Act and The Liquor Control Act were introduced. They went through committee of the whole House this afternoon, with no changes insofar as allowing an appeal procedure and a statement of reasons relating to the denial of licences.

We would have thought that this sort of statutory provision would be a most reasonable and a most logical one. The Gordon committee recommended this sort of thing many years ago when it made its report on administrative organization in the province of Ontario. We would have thought that the government would have recognized the value of this sort of appeal procedure and set it out in the statutes and made it clear. We would think, sir, if the government has yet failed to recognize it, that such an official as a parliamentary commissioner would be very quick to point out, that we need appeal procedures, and that the appeal body cannot be the same body who sits and gives the original judgment.

We would think it would make abundant good sense that there be reasons for decisions by these administrative boards. We would think that a parliamentary commissioner would again make this abundantly clear, probably in his first report.

Could there be any stronger argument for this type of office than the all too frequently heard complaint that these boards act within an atmosphere of secrecy, so that the ordinary citizen is unable to find out the reasons for their decisions?

In Sweden, the ombudsman not only investigates complaints by citizens, but initiates cases on his own, and I think this is an interesting thought, too. Most of these result from an annual inspection trip that he makes of provincial courts and government offices. He visits the prisons, inspects the courts, examines at random files dealing with civil and criminal cases to see if there have been violations, either in the spirit or the letter of the law. He uses a similar method in checking an administrative agency. He says that in Sweden—

Hon. A. Grossman (Minister of Reform Institutions): That will eliminate the need for an Opposition.

Mr. Singer: Well, it might. It would certainly do a great deal to bring the government up on its toes, to get the Cabinet Ministers doing what they are supposed to do, and their deputies. These people—

Hon. Mr. Grossman: That is what you are supposed to do.

Mr. Singer: These people, perhaps, are not the real target of this idea. It is the myriad of civil servants—how many do we have in the province of Ontario? Perhaps the hon. Provincial Treasurer (Mr. Allan) has the figure—20,000, 30,000. We have thousands, anyway, of civil servants.

An hon. member: Forty thousand.

Mr. Singer: My hon. friend says 40,000 civil servants.

An hon. member: Forty-five thousand.

Mr. Singer: Well, 45,000. Anyway, we have an awful lot of civil servants. The importance of this office, Mr. Speaker, would be to have an official—a servant of this Legislature—who would have the ability to inquire into the actions of these people insofar as they affect the rights of citizens. And this, I think, is the importance of it. We can deal with our friend, the hon. Minister of Reform Institutions, reasonably well here in the House.

Mr. E. W. Sopha (Sudbury): He is easy.

Mr. Singer: But it is important that there be a bit of machinery, that there be an instrument by which the rights of the little man can be protected against the mass of administrative authority.

Mr. Bexelius says that in Sweden all public officials must be polite and helpful. If they are not, and they have committed a public fault, they can be prosecuted and he has prosecuted such cases.

Mr. Sopha: All these would be in jail!

Mr. Singer: He has laid complaints against such persons as judges who have been impolite to witnesses; the chairman of a child welfare council who dealt unfairly with a father who had been lax in contributing to the support of his child; a public prosecutor for failing to inform the court during a criminal trial that a state's witness had committed perjury; even the members of the national board of civil aviation who took a freeloading trip to Paris at the expense of one of the airline companies with which they had to deal.

Mr. Sopha: These should all be on Devil's Island!

Mr. Singer: I would think, sir, that this sort of breath of fresh air directed at the affairs of the government of Ontario would be one of the most salutary things that could ever happen.

Mr. Sopha: Is there anything there about failure to answer letters?

Mr. Singer: Mr. Speaker, I know it will be suggested that the matter that I have been attempting to deal with here, is part of a subject of an inquiry being conducted by Mr. Justice McRuer. I know that many representations along these lines have already been made to him. In fact, my submission to him, on behalf of the Liberal Party of Ontario, put forward a similar suggestion. I know, as well, that Mr. Justice McRuer is most sympathetic to this type of suggestion. He personally expressed to me the thought that perhaps an Ontario ombudsman could, in addition to the duties I have referred to, be charged with the responsibility of investigating that myriad of complaints which arise as a result of municipal administration.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: The hon. member means that he has made up his mind already.

Mr. Singer: No, I will repeat it for my hon. friend. I said that Mr. Justice McRuer has been listening to it. In his remarks he has been sympathetic; he has discussed his views on this subject publicly; he has discussed them with me privately, but in casting about as to the possibility of recommending this type of office and what is going to be in his report, I have no idea.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: It sounds better since the hon. member fixed it.

Mr. Singer: No, this is the way I said it. I will send the hon. Minister a copy of the text. He was wondering whether or not, if the office of ombudsman was created, he could not as well have the duties of investigating the multitude of complaints addressed from municipalities insofar as municipal procedures were concerned, and I think that point deserves some investigation.

However, I think if we are going to wait until we can draft a perfect Act, then we are not going to take any action. I think we would be taking on too much all at the one time. I think there would be an ample job here, and I think in light of the experience that we have read about and that we have seen—the experience in New Zealand and in the Scandinavian countries and other places—this is a step that the province of Ontario should presently be prepared to take.

Finally, sir, in conclusion I would make my plea to the government: Do not adjourn this debate. I think this debate at least could go to an approval of the second reading of this bill. Let us approve it in principle; let the government then wait, for a year or a year and a half, let us see Mr. Justice McRuer's report, and then do the same as with the medical plan or with two or three Acts that were brought in. Then in a year or two, let us bring back a final draft, or a better draft. Let us state, Mr. Speaker, in a meaningful way that we want to help the people of Ontario.

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): Mr. Speaker, the reaction of the government supporters in the House to the speech of the hon. member for Downsview was an excellent demonstration of the travail suffered by the Tory mentality when it is forced to consider and even to comprehend a new idea. Apparently this is new to those hon. gentlemen over there. It is not a new idea on the face of the earth—

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Speaker: Order! I would like these interjections to stop. The member who is speaking should speak to the bill that is before the House and he should be given the courtesy of making his remarks without too many interjections.

Mr. Bryden: I see that the hon. Minister of Reform Institutions cannot take it.

No doubt, Mr. Speaker, ten years from now, if, as is most unlikely, the hon. gentlemen opposite happen still to be there, they will bring in a bill precisely like that which is now before us and claim that they invented the idea. It will never have been heard of on the face of the earth until that moment! No doubt that is what would happen, except that they will not be there, so no doubt we will get legislation of this kind sooner.

I was amazed at the reaction of the hon. Minister of Lands and Forests, who has held the portfolio of Attorney General in the government—

Hon. Mr. Roberts: Mr. Speaker, let me say this: I was asking some questions of the previous speaker to try to draw out any good reasons for this if I could. The same thing would apply in the hon. member's remarks, if he can show something, but first of all, are there any extant cases that he knows of that are crying out for this kind of reform? If there are, why does he not put them on the record?

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Speaker, I would never hope to be able to devise the kind of logic that would persuade the hon. Minister of Lands and Forests of anything. I would merely point out to him that this idea is a well-established idea in the democratic world. It is not something new and not something that the hon. member for Downsview thought up all by himself as a novel, untried idea. It is a well-established principle in Scandinavian countries. The idea is working well in New Zealand.

In those countries where it has been tried, it has been well demonstrated that the office, which has been described as ombudsman or parliamentary commissioner, or whatever you like, serves an important and useful function in a modern, complex democracy. Let us bear in mind, Mr. Speaker, that our democratic society is now exceedingly complex. It is exceedingly difficult for the average man to know where to turn when he gets into difficulties with the vast organization of government.

I am not complaining about the size of the organization of government. I think it is inevitable if we want to achieve in our society the objectives we have in mind. We have to have a large government organization and it is going to grow. But let us bear in mind also that any large organization can become impersonal and inhuman, that the right of an individual can be completely ground to pieces in the machine of a great organization. That is where the role of the ombudsman comes in.

It is idle to say that the private member of the Legislature can do the ombudsman's job; that is an old saw of the government. I have no doubt that all members of the Legislature do useful work in representing their constituents before various government agencies, but the problem has now reached the proportions where there should be a formal method of dealing with it. After all, we have courts because there is a role to be performed that cannot be performed by members of the Legislature or anybody else.

We are now in an age when a vast amount of ministerial discretion is given to Ministers of the Crown, and frankly, I think too much is given. I think that in many cases statutes which give Ministers discretion to do this, that or the other, or to decide this, that or the other, do not need to do it. It is often just a piece of lazy draftsmanship on the part of the government or whomever is sponsoring the legislation—I am not speaking now specifically of this government, but of governments generally. Sometimes the government is too lazy to sit down and think out exactly what it wants to accomplish. So the easy way out is to give the Minister discretion to do certain things.

You will find that our statutes and the statutes of all jurisdictions are simply loaded with discretionary provisions of that kind. In actual practice it is not the Minister who necessarily exercises the discretion. It may be somebody far down the line from him who is exercising the discretion given to the Minister in the statutes. Such a person can either maliciously, or quite innocently, exercise that discretion in an arbitrary and unfair way. This can happen.

In the famous Cichel Down case that the hon. member for Downsview referred to, a proceeding had gone on for a long time in which a private citizen got a real run-around and was most unjustly treated. The Minister of the department did not have the vaguest idea that all these things were being done in his name.

And this is inevitable in a large organization. Things are done every day in the name of a Minister and he cannot possibly know about everything that is going on. So even if he would not himself approve arbitrary conduct, there still is insufficient check at the present time to ensure that it cannot happen on the part of some other official down the line somewhere in this hierarchy of the Ministry.

The jurisprudence on the matter, as I understand it from such books as I have read, makes it quite clear that the courts are most hesitant to intervene in regard to an exercise of discretion that is conferred by a statute. The court, I understand, takes the position that if Parliament or the Legislature sees fit to give his discretion then it is not for the courts to question it, as long as it is exercised within the powers that are being given. The method, the actual exercise of the power, whether apparently just or unjust, is not a matter that the courts will normally interfere with.

That is where the parliamentary commissioner or ombudsman can come in. An aggrieved person, or anyone who thinks he is aggrieved, can go to the ombudsman. The ombudsman, under a statute such as is being proposed in the House here now, would have powers that no member of this Legislature has—and which, I think, could not reasonably be given to anybody except a person in the very special position of the ombudsman. He can go right into the department, look into the files, interview anybody he wants under oath or otherwise; he can get right to the root of the matter.

When he looks into the files he is not at liberty to disclose them to the world at large. There may be confidential information there which should not be disclosed. He has taken an oath of secrecy that he will not reveal information unless it is proper to do so, but the point is that he can get to the information, and nobody else except the people involved in the administration can do that. Thus it is possible for a third impartial party to get in and find out exactly what has happened. There is no procedure available at the present time whereby that type of thing can be done.

Yet, I would submit, Mr. Speaker, that in view of the great and necessary growth of ministerial discretion, it is desirable that there should be a procedure of this type. I have not studied in detail, or to any extent at all, the operation of the ombudsman system in the Scandinavian countries where it is best established. But I have skimmed through reports of the parliamentary commissioner in New Zealand. I would commend them to the hon. Minister of Lands and Forests and anybody else who is interested in this matter. The report gives a cross-section of the types of cases the commissioner has to deal with—not revealing names, of course, but revealing the basic circumstances, and they are a most interesting cross-section.

In some cases, the matter involved, I suppose, in terms of the totality of public policy, is a very small matter, but to a particular individual it is maybe the most important thing in the world. There may be an individual, who, in a programme that is good overall, gets a raw deal and just cannot get it straightened out by his own efforts. The parliamentary commissioner steps in, he can get it straightened out, usually, by negotiation.

It should also be noted that in the great majority of the cases referred to in New Zealand, the commissioner found that the complaint had no merit. It is not that one regards civil servants as ogres who are deliberately going to deprive citizens of their rights. I think the overwhelming majority of them are most concerned to look after the rights of the individual and in actual experience that is what the parliamentary commissioner found.

However, there are always exceptional cases. It may be a dozen this year, half a dozen next year, two dozen the following year—that is what the office exists for. The question really is whether we consider that the rights of a half a dozen individuals or half a hundred individuals out of the millions are important. If they are important, then I think we should support the bill proposed by the hon. member for Downsview. If they are not important, then, I suppose, we do not support it. I think it is as simple as that.

Do we believe in the rights of even one individual who may get a raw deal and cannot by any known procedure get justice? If we consider that his rights are important, then I think we should be prepared to establish a position of ombudsman or parliamentary commissioner.

Mr. Cowling: Mr. Speaker, I move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. Speaker: Mr. Cowling moves the adjournment of the debate; shall the motion carry?

Several hon. members: No, no.

Mr. Speaker: I may say I have the member for High Park next on my list to take part in the debate. Does the member for Durham wish to speak to this bill?

Mr. A. Carruthers (Durham): Yes, I would like to say a few words.

As representative of a rural urban riding, I would like to take exception to some of the remarks that have been made with respect to the office of ombudsman or a commissioner.

Mr. Sopha: Let's adjourn the debate.

Mr. Carruthers: It seems to me as a representative of rural areas that this is a definite interference of the rights and privileges of a member of the Legislature. I think the idea of the last two speakers is that when someone comes to us as a private member, all we will have to say is: "Go and see your ombudsman."

This is not what we want. We are elected to represent the people of our riding, to deal with their problems and their appeals and to any injustices that they may have suffered. I accept it as my responsibility and I am pleased to accept it.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Carruthers: Mr. Speaker, the demand for this office is due, in most cases, to the growth of bureaucracy, and I do not think that anyone in this Legislature can say that we have despotic bureaucracy in this province. Every individual has his rights—we have appeal boards and municipal boards, we have every right of appeal for the private individual. In a small country like New Zealand—

Mr. A. E. Thompson (Leader of the Opposition): An agrarian society.

Mr. Carruthers:—where you have a population of 2.5 million people, with a civil service of around 120,000, in comparison with the 40,000 that the hon. member pointed out for the province of Ontario—

An hon. member: Utopial

Mr. Carruthers:—there you may have a bureaucracy develop. But suddenly in the vast area of the province of Ontario, the office of ombudsman would become very difficult to manage. We would only be replacing or adding—if there was a bureaucracy—to that bureaucracy with another bureaucracy. Such an office is supposed to protect an individual from injustices, the encroachments by government on his liberties and his rights. But, as I said before, we have our appeal boards. Above everything else, we have the member himself, whose right and duty is to represent his constituents if they have suffered any injustice or have thought they have suffered an injustice.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that such an office imposes a buffer or a filter between the constituent and his member, and this I say is interference in the responsibilities of appointed members and is of particular concern to myself and other members who represent rural areas. Such an official, and such an office, may tend to become simply a receptive office for crank letters. Setting up such an office, sir, would only encourage and act as an incentive to people to write in crank letters.

For example, in 1964, in the office in New Zealand we see 760 complaints. Of these 400 did not even warrant consideration, 360 were considered and out of that number only approximately 50 received any action. Now, any private member can handle that situation very easily.

I would say that such an office would only interfere with the prompt and efficient despatch of government business. I would suggest, Mr. Speaker, for example, when the St. Lawrence seaway project was being developed, does this mean that such an official would have the right to investigate all the facets as to whether a decision by a government was justified in such a development? If that is the case many of the great projects which this government has undertaken would never be accomplished.

Under Swedish penal code, a civil servant through neglect, imprudence, want of skill or disregard of his duties, according to the statutes, may be punished and the officer responsible for initiating that punishment and proceedings is the ombudsman. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that in doing so he replaces the Ministers of the Crown as a person who is responsible for sound administration. We do not want such an official and I am sure the members of the civil service do not want such an official breathing down their necks, because such a situation would only create uncertainty and a great deal of insecurity within the ranks of the civil service.

The real safeguard to democracy, the real safeguard to citizens, is a fair-minded civil service and I think we all agree, Mr. Speaker, that we have such vigilant and responsible civil service in this province and also we have in this province a responsible press which can reveal any injustices which may occur.

Mr. Speaker, if a government is a true reflection of public opinion—and I feel that I am a true representative; I reflect the opinion of the county of Durham—then it is very disturbing to think that the public must pay the cost of protecting itself against its own image. It is one of the responsibilities of a private member to represent his constituents ably and responsibly, and thereafter I say that it is his right, his duty and his responsibility to do so, and I would urge all hon. members to oppose this bill.

Mr. Cowling moves the adjournment of the debate.

Clerk of the House: The 58th order, second reading of Bill No. 33, An Act to amend The Municipal Act.

THE MUNICIPAL ACT

Mr. J. Renwick (Riverdale) moves second reading of Bill No. 33, An Act to amend The Municipal Act.

Mr. Speaker: May I ask the member if, when he deals with Bill 33, it is also his intention to touch on Bill 34 and incorporate it with Bill 33 in his remarks?

Mr. J. Renwick (Riverdale): Yes, Mr. Speaker. My remarks on Bill 33 will make it unnecessary then—

Mr. Speaker: It is agreed by the House?

Agreed.

Mr. Renwick: Mr. Speaker, just to refresh the memories of the hon. members of the Legislature about the reason for this bill, I would say the bill is simply designed to remove the power of boards of commissioners of police to pass bylaws regulating parades, and to confer this power on councils of cities and towns. The concurrent bill for the municipality of Metropolitan Toronto would accomplish the same purpose by removing the power from the metropolitan board of commissioners of police to pass bylaws respecting the regulation of parades, and to confer that power on the metropolitan council.

The hon. members will recall that the police commission of Metropolitan Toronto passed a number of bylaws, one of which, when it was finally disclosed, was a bill passed under this section of The Municipal Act which permitted the metropolitan police commission to regulate parades or processions on highways. When the terms of that bylaw were made public it was realized that the bylaw purported to grant to the police the power to determine which signs and which placards and banners could be used in processions and in parades.

We here had expressed, as other people throughout the province had expressed, the view that this was an infringement on the right of people to associate and to parade in carrying out and putting before people the views which they believed in and which they thought deeply about, and that it was not within the power of the police to determine what banners or placards could be carried in parade and to determine the kind of banner and placard that could be carried as a condition of granting a permit to hold the parade. We were satisfied that the general criminal law was sufficient to prohibit any disturbance or breach of the peace in a parade when the parade was under way, but that the permit should not be withheld simply because of the decision of the police as to approval or disapproval of any banner or placard which was proposed to be carried.

We then raised in this House the question of the referral by the hon. Attorney General (Mr. Wishart) of that bylaw to the court under the provisions of The Constitutional Questions Act of the province.

Mr. Speaker, it was quite within the hon. Attorney General's power to make that referral to determine the validity of that bylaw, but he chose not to do so. We therefore decided that it was in the interests of the people of the province that this power be now removed from the boards of police commissioners and placed where it properly belongs, namely, within the power of the elected representatives of the people in the councils of the municipalities throughout Ontario.

This briefly is the background of these two bills. We think, having regard to the incident which occurred in Allan Gardens a few weeks ago, which is not directly related to processions or parades, that the proper place for permits to be granted relating to processions and parades and to public meetings, if there is going to be the requirement of permission, is through bylaws passed by councils of the elected representatives of the people of the province.

We would ask the support of the Legislature to make the proposed amendment to The Municipal Act and to the related Municipality of Metropolitan Toronto Act.

Hon. H. L. Rowntree (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, having in mind the hour, I move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Mr. Speaker, this evening, having concluded this hour which was set aside for other public bills and orders, it is our intention at 8 o'clock to return to where we departed at 5 o'clock this afternoon, namely, committee of the whole House, to continue the business which we had in hand at that point.

It being 6 o'clock, p.m., the House took recess.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

TUESDAY, JUNE 8, 1965

The House resumed at 8 o'clock, p.m.

House in committee; Mr. A. H. Cowling in the chair.

Mr. Chairman: The amendment to the section by Mr. J. B. Trotter (Parkdale) is:

1. There is thereby established a corporation without share capital under the name of the Medical Carriers Incorporated, whose membership shall be composed of the licensed carriers and seven members to be appointed by the Lieutenant-Governor in Council.

2. The board of directors of the corporation shall consist of seven directors, all of whom shall be representatives of the public and shall be appointed by the Lieutenant-Governor in Council.

3. The Lieutenant-Governor in Council shall designate one of the members of council as the chairman.

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): Mr. Chairman, with respect to the amendment now before the committee, I would like to put it to the hon. Minister (Mr. Dymond) that he should do one or the other of two things. Either he should accept the amendment, or at least the principle of it, as proposed by the hon. member for Parkdale, or alternatively, he should strike out subsection 5 of the section.

As the section now stands, subsection 5 gives to the corporation, which is a corporation of private insurance carriers, the power to make recommendations on such vital matters as the changes in benefits, maximum subscription rates, enrolment periods and so on. I submit to the hon. Minister that a group that clearly and openly represents a special interest should not be put in such a preferred position in making recommendations on matters in which it has a direct and immediate interest, which is not necessarily the same interest as that of the public at large.

The hon. member for Parkdale has proposed in his amendment that we overcome this problem by making the corporation a broadly based body, representing all interests in the community. That would be one way of correcting the difficulty.

The other way, which is the one I would prefer, would be simply to relieve the corporation of any such powers and leave it to deal with matters that obviously are purely of interest to the insurance industry—the powers set forth in subsection 6, for example, with regard to the pooling of standard contracts. Those are matters, I think, that one could say are exclusively, or are primarily at any rate, of interest to the insurance industry. But these other matters set forth in subsection 5 are of broad public interest and I do not believe that a corporation representing only one of the interests affected should be in the preferred position that the bill proposes.

I know the hon. Minister has said that the corporation has power only to make recommendations on these matters. He has pointed out that even if it did not have such power, it would still be in a position as an interested group in the community to make representations to the government. This, I think we can take as common ground. But what I would like to point out to the hon. Minister is that in the section as it now stands, assuming the amendment is not adopted, the corporation is put—and that means the private insurance carriers—in a preferred position, as far as making representations to the government are concerned.

True, other interests—organizations representing the consumers of medical services—can still make representations to the government, but they are then in the position where they have to knock at the Minister's door, or knock at the door of the Cabinet, hoping that sooner or later they may be admitted and that in a cap-in-hand presentation they may be able to persuade the government with respect to such matters as subscription rates, changes in benefits and enrolment periods.

This they can do only by operating from the outside, but in the section as the hon. Minister now proposes it, the insurance industry is on the inside. It does not have to knock at the door. It is right inside the room, sitting at the table, with direct access to the Minister. It is obviously in a preferred position in relation to any other interest group which have just as great an interest in this matter as the insurance industry. This is what is wrong with this section as it now stands. This is what clearly cries out for change.

If you take the total picture under this bill, the insurance industry is in a preferred position at all stages. They are on the inside, able to get their recommendations to the Minister, leaving others in the position where they have to do the best they can to influence him from the outside. They also are directly represented, and in our opinion, overrepresented, on the council that the bill sets up, again getting direct access to the Minister. Then people representing the public interest have to try to compete against people with that preferred position.

I suggest to the hon. Minister that the position he is giving to the insurance industry under this bill is indefensible. He should either accept the amendment of the hon. member for Parkdale, or if he feels disinclined to do that—and I can see his reasons for having hesitation, because this corporation was really intended to be specifically representative of the insurance industry—then I say to him: restrict the powers of the corporation to make recommendations, or otherwise as to those things that are clearly of direct interest to the insurance industry only.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Mr. Chairman, there is a further factor, in addition to those that have been advanced by the hon. members who have spoken so far in connection with this amendment, that I would like to draw to the attention of the hon. Minister. It leads me to plead for some further consideration either on the amendment which is before the House or the alternative, or at least something to alter what I think is a very novel but strange twist in the operation of a free-enterprise approach to private insurance.

If I may just trace the history of this very briefly: In the committee that the hon. Minister set up in 1962, it was recommended that when this body was established, membership in the corporation, which comprised all of the carriers, would not be mandatory, it would be voluntary. In other words, that first advisory group of 24 doctors and 11 spokesmen for the insurance companies said to the hon. Minister, "You shouldn't force. This is all voluntary. You shouldn't force a carrier to have to come in on this corporation and pool risks and have to share the losses around the circle, so to speak."

When the Hagey commission came up with its recommendations, they had buried this. They said, "Oh, no, we won't concede them free enterprise, not complete free enterprise. They are not going to have the opportunity to make a lot of money or lose a lot of money. You must get in with the corporation; it is mandatory, so that you will share your risks and share your losses."

The government has now adopted the Hagey commission recommendation, so that in effect, as I understand the setup, you are going to have the most inefficient carriers protected from the results of their inefficiency, because if their inefficiencies are so great that serious losses are entailed, then those losses will be shared by all who are involved in the corporation in any case.

This is a strange way to operate a private approach, because it is really a combine in which each one protects the other from losses and the people who have to pay for the losses in the final analysis, are going to be the people of the province of Ontario, who are footing the bill for the premiums. If this is free enterprise, it is a very novel concept of free enterprise—at least novel in terms of the government legislating it and proclaiming it as the kind of thing that the government supports.

Mr. E. W. Sopha (Sudbury): Mr. Chairman, this is indeed a strange subsection and I see its strangeness against the background of the comments of the hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Robarts) when he was winding up the debate on second reading. He said that he did not understand the Liberal position in respect to this Act. Indeed, he did not understand it. Our position has been stated in the most distinct terms so that even the most unwary could understand it. We said time and time again that the giving over of the writing of insurance contracts in the health care of our citizens to private interests is a vicious principle. In that position we are supported by no less an influential newspaper than the Globe and Mail.

Section 4, of course, enshrines that principle for the first time in the Act. The Act is all right until it gets to section 4, where it hands over the writing of insurance contracts, to private insurance carriers.

Mr. Chairman, I draw your attention to that subsection 2, and the proviso in it of the character of the directors of the corporation. Two are to be appointed by physician-sponsored carriers, one by health-insurance co-operatives, and one by self-insurers and all other carriers. I inquire of you, Mr. Chairman, rhetorically, whether it would be contemplated in setting up the liquor licence board to have the requirement that before a person could be appointed to that board he would have to own a hotel. In setting up the milk industry board, would it be rational to have a requirement that members of that board own a dairy? In setting up the Ontario motor transport board, would a requirement be rational that you had to own a fleet of transport trucks? Merely to state it shows the irrationality of it.

The government would never tolerate, in any of the three boards that I have stipulated, the owner of an enterprise operating in the field being a member of the board of directors. Yet here in founding the board of directors of the corporation, Medical Carriers Incorporated, one of the foremost prime requirements is that the nominees have to be connected in a most intimate fashion with the carriers. Accordingly, to state it in the way I have stated it, the amendment offered by my friend the hon. member for Parkdale makes eminent good sense and ought to be adopted by every hon. member of the House, and indeed, the executive council itself.

Mr. Chairman, let it be said in supporting this amendment and urging the House to consider it favourably, that this is the section which we in the Liberal Party are against, and which we feel makes this statute a very vicious one.

Mr. J. Renwick (Riverdale): Mr. Chairman, I would like to speak in favour of the amendment because I cannot understand why the corporation should be permitted to recommend to the council, from time to time, changes in benefits. Benefits, under the Act, are either the payment of the fees for the services which are rendered and which are fixed by the statute as being the schedule of fees established by the Ontario medical association and, therefore, the corporation cannot have anything to do with those fees, or they can make recommendations with respect to the performance of those services, under the standard contracts which are to be made available.

It does not seem to me that the carriers themselves should be in a position to make any recommendations whatsoever about the performance of the medical and surgical services which are to be provided to the citizens of the province of Ontario. They have no business in that field whatsoever. It is a matter related entirely to the professional competence and ability of the doctors, and not related in any way to the carriers who are given this privileged position under this Act.

To reiterate again, they cannot make any recommendations about changes in the payments to be made because the government has chosen to enshrine in the statute the schedule of fees of the Ontario medical association. It seems obvious to us here that the whole concept of the Medical Carriers Incorporated should be limited to a corporation which is authorized to deal solely, and only, with its internal administrative affairs. It should have nothing whatsoever to do with the scale of benefits or the subscription rates—maximum or otherwise—which are to be charged to the people of the province of Ontario, either directly by payment of premium, or through the subsidies to be provided to certain classes of persons in Ontario.

Similarly, it seems to me that it is not up to the carriers—the Medical Carriers Incorporated—to make any recommendations about the open enrolment period, because the ability to determine the open enrolment period determines also the people in the province of Ontario who are going to be subject to the penalty of a three-month delay period if they should choose to enroll, or not be in a position to enroll at any time other than during an open enrolment period.

The hon. Minister himself has said that the three months' delay is in the nature of a penalty, and we here certainly do not think that the Medical Carriers Incorporated should be in a position to make the kind of recommendations which would ultimately impose a penalty of a three-month delay on citizens who wanted to join in the scheme, and obtain standard medical contract coverage.

Mr. J. B. Trotter (Parkdale): Mr. Chairman, in answering some of the remarks that have been made, I might agree with the hon. member for Yorkview (Mr. Young), who suggested that this amendment might have been improved upon, but after all, this entire bill could be improved on in a great many ways. But what we wish to get across is the idea of the amendment in section 4—to avoid a very serious offence against the common sense of the entire administration of this bill, of leaving the real power in the hands of the insurance companies.

The debate has only served to prove—after listening to what the hon. Minister of Health has said—that he is determined that the insurance companies are going to have their pound of flesh—their 28 cents on the dollar. Again, I repeat, this is the thing that should be avoided, and we in this Legislature do a great disservice to the people of the province of Ontario if we pass this section without the amendment.

Secondly, I say again that it restricts the whole progress of the bringing about of proper health services in the province of Ontario. Again you have entrenched an already powerful lobby. The hon. Minister of Health said that there are lobbies anyway—

Hon. M. B. Dymond (Minister of Health): I never said any such thing!

Mr. Trotter: You said there were lobbies—you certainly did—before six o'clock.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: I deny that statement categorically, and I expect the hon. member to accept my denial.

Mr. Trotter: I heard you.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Mr. Chairman, what I did say was that if the insurance carriers were going to lobby, they would lobby anyway. I did not say that there was an insurance lobby.

Mr. Trotter: You know perfectly well they lobby! You know perfectly well that the insurance companies are the most powerful lobby in the Dominion of Canada, and all you are doing is sitting there and serving their purposes and doing a disservice to the people of the province of Ontario.

In this section it is the difference between administrative costs of five cents on the dollar and 28 cents on the dollar. This is what you are doing, and to say that to sit on this type of board that you have to be in the insurance business, is silly. Do you have to own a radio station to be on the board of broadcast governors? Of course not! There are so many things—as the hon. member for Sudbury said, "Do you have to milk a cow to be on the milk board?"

So again, I say the arguments of the hon. Minister of Health are specious, and as the hon. member for Nipissing (Mr. Troy) says: "Over there they are milking the public." Again, I say, in summing up this debate, Mr. Chairman—

Hon. H. L. Rowntree (Minister of Labour): You do not really mean that!

Mr. Trotter: I most certainly do! The whole tenor of this debate—whether on principle, or debating it section by section—has been simply this: that you have to take the profit out of health insurance; that the people of the province of Ontario, and for that matter of the Dominion of Canada, cannot afford the heavy burden of the present system that is being set up; and in this section is the particular administrative system. I say that it is a shame and a disgrace the way that you are handling this whole setup of health insurance, and I am asking this House to support the amendment.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Mr. Chairman, the hon. members have completely lost the central theme of this section altogether. Three or four of them, Mr. Chairman, have made a great to-do about throwing everything in the hands of the carriers. Reading a paragraph—

Mr. Sopha: You are afraid of them!

Hon. Mr. Dymond: I am not afraid of them, nor of you. Reading paragraph 2 of the section, sir—

Interjections by hon. members.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Mr. Chairman, do I have the floor?

A reading of paragraph 2 of the section—a glance at it, even—will show that the so-called non-profit carriers are four to two. There are two representatives of the indemnity carriers and there are—Mr. Chairman, do I have the floor?

Mr. Chairman: Gentlemen, I must ask that we observe the ordinary rules of courtesy in this debate. I can appreciate that the feelings are high in this debate, but please, gentlemen, let us be courteous.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Mr. Chairman, as I said, it is readily noted that the Act states that only two representatives shall be placed on this corporation to look after the interests of the Canadian health insurance association or the indemnity companies, and there are nearly 200 of them operating in the province of Ontario, as against some 44—probably a total of 55 to 60—of all others put together and these are represented by four.

Now, the hon. member for Sudbury drew a very odd analogy—would we put hotel operators or brewers or something of that kind, on the liquor licence board? This is an entirely different thing. It would be like our setting up legislation here—as it would be in selecting the personnel of the board of the breweries and putting on it people who had no connection with the business whatsoever. This corporation has nothing to do with the programme. This corporation is only looking after the business of the insurance carriers, and the fact that one clause gives them the right to make recommendations does not put them in any favoured position.

Mr. Bryden: It does.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: It does not. The outsiders have exactly the same opportunity and right to make recommendations that the carriers have. Also the section does not give them right of access to the Minister. There is nothing in the Act which gives this. They may, and can, make recommendations to the council, which in turn, makes its recommendations to the Minister. The public has just as much chance of having direct access to the Minister as the corporation—and probably a great deal more. You will have to take my word for that.

I see no basis for the fears expressed here by the hon. members of the Opposition, Mr. Chairman, and I repeat what I said before we rose for dinner, that I can see nothing to be gained—indeed, I can see a good deal of difficulty, if we accept this amendment.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. A. E. Thompson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact that the hon. Minister of Health is answering questions at this point, I would like to ask a question under 45 (g)—4 (g), I guess it is. You ask why is the corporation allowed to designate who will offer the co-insurance contract? Why cannot any carrier automatically offer the co-insurance contract?

And while I am referring to that—because I know the hon. Minister of Health in no way would want to give just one side of the picture—I would like to mention, with your indulgence, sir, that he emphasized the report and the study that has taken place in British Columbia. The hon. Minister referred to Joan Hollobon, and he mentioned that on a number of occasions they found in British Columbia that the means test apparently was something that really was not of that much concern.

I wonder if he would have also mentioned—as was stated in Joan Hollobon's articles—that the people of British Columbia did not want a co-insurance contract; that they were not keen on this. I wonder if the hon. Minister would give cognizance to this, why has he got this co-insurance contract aspect in his bill, when he emphasized that one of the reasons for referring to these surveys was that he placed great emphasis on them.

I hope that at this point—because I know that he is a fair man and not blinded by blinkers when he sees some survey—the hon. Minister will tell us why he has this co-insurance contract in, and why he is giving the power of deciding which insurance companies can have co-insurance contracts to this corporation.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: I have no hesitation in telling the hon. leader of the Opposition, Mr. Chairman. I did read that part of the survey, and I am quite prepared to admit that the co-insurance contract is not a popular one, but there is a—

Mr. Thompson: I do not wish to interrupt, sir, but could I say that it was clear that they wanted comprehensive coverage—a universal coverage—instead of a co-insurance.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: They wanted first dollar coverage. The great majority of people want first dollar coverage, but there is, at the same time, a sizeable number who do want co-insurance—

Mr. Thompson: How do you know?

Hon. Mr. Dymond: I know from insurance corporation experience. I know from my own practice, and I know from talking to many people across the country about this, but—

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Thompson: May I say that the hon. Minister of Health has more manners than some others in this House—

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Thompson: I would like to suggest to the hon. House leader that if he could follow the example of some of his colleagues there would be a better relationship in this House.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Thompson: What kind of surveys?

Mr. Chairman: Order, order.

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Chairman, the hon. Minister of Health asked that you should take charge because of some unruliness. Might I also pray that you would do the same?

Mr. Chairman: I am trying to keep order.

Mr. Thompson: Sometimes in situations, you know, sir, people want to make noise, because they have not any sense in them.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Chairman: Order, order.

Mr. Thompson: What kind of surveys have been done, may I ask, sir? The hon. Minister says he has done a survey in his own village of Port Perry, the hon. member for Forest Hill (Mr. Dunlop) says that he wants co-insurance. What other surveys has he done on such an important question?

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Mr. Chairman, once again my hon. friend seems to read words into what I say that were not uttered. At least I have no recollection of uttering them. I did not at any time say I had made a survey of my own home town. I said that in my own practice I had come across a great number of people who preferred the co-insurance, or a deductible. Indeed, this is a very popular policy in the rural co-operatives. Almost every rural co-operative has a deductible feature, and this is one of the features upon which they have built the strength of their movement. A great many people are willing to take the risk, and in a number of the rural co-operatives the deductible is $15. A great many people are quite prepared to take that preliminary risk on their own because of the advance they gain by a much lower premium.

It would seem to me quite wrong that we should take this away altogether from those who want it. This is completely permissive, there is nothing mandatory about it. We do lay down that a certain number—a reasonable number of insurance carriers—should offer this type of contract, and that it should be the standard contract on a co-insurance deductible basis. But there is nothing mandatory about it. We believed that the insurance industry was probably the best equipped to advise us on the carriers who were geared and prepared to offer this sort of policy. That is the only reasoning behind it. There is nothing sinister, nothing underhand.

Mr. F. Young (Yorkview): Mr. Chairman, might I ask the hon. Minister a further question in this respect? Since we are being asked to vote on this clause, and the carriers are going to determine this particular aspect of policy, then I think we should have some idea of what the co-insurance policy means.

The hon. Minister mentioned that the co-ops have built a large backlog of business on the basis of $15 deductible, and I can understand that, because a $15 bill is not too heavy. But if the deductible gets up to $50, as is the case in many of these policies, then this House should know what the government has in mind as far as the co-insurance aspect is concerned. What is this standard co-insurance policy that we are supposed to legislate on here tonight? We do not know. The hon. Minister is asking us to vote on something about which we have no knowledge.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Mr. Chairman, I have had occasion to say several times, in all the time we have had this bill before the House that it is very obvious to me that the hon. members of the Opposition have not read the bill. I am absolutely positive of that tonight, because the very question asked by the hon. member is answered on page 16 of the bill, under schedule B.

Mr. Sopha: About this weird section, may I ask the hon. Minister—he did not like my analogy about these others boards—with reference to subsection 7, if he knows of any other corporation that does not hold a meeting of the shareholders?

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Well, Mr. Chairman, these are the shareholders—the directors are representing the shareholders.

Mr. Sopha: Well, does the hon. Minister know any other corporation that is not required by law to hold a meeting of the shareholders, a meeting of those people they represent?

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Mr. Chairman, I do not know anything about corporation law. I take it that the insurance carriers, as I said before, are big boys and quite capable of looking after their own interests and I am not really worried about them.

Mr. Sopha: Surely the hon. Minister knows that under The Corporations Act they are required to hold an annual meeting of shareholders.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Well, Mr. Chairman, I really could not care less. If they do not observe the terms of The Corporations Act, and I am quite certain they will, the hon. Provincial Secretary (Mr. Yaremko) is quite capable of enforcing it.

Mr. Sopha: Well, I see the hon. Minister has difficulty in understanding tonight. I will put it in more lucid terms. Can the hon. Minister tell me any good reason why the board of directors who have the right to exercise the powers of the corporation should not hold a democratic annual meeting of the people whom they represent—200 carriers?

Hon. Mr. Dymond: This is up to themselves, Mr. Chairman. It has got nothing to do with the bill.

Mr. Sopha: Well, why does the hon. Minister not make it mandatory by law?

Hon. Mr. Dymond: The hon. member is absolutely wrong.

Mr. Sopha: Why does he leave it? For all we know, and it is probably the truth, the board of directors of this corporation will meet in the National club, or the Toronto club, or the York club or the other places where real power is exercised in this province, where the establishment meets. Can the hon. Minister give me any good reason why they should not be required to give an account of their stewardship to the 200 carriers they represent?

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Mr. Chairman, once again I direct your attention to the fact that the hon. member very obviously has not read the bill. If he read subparagraph 14 of the same section he would find that the corporation shall furnish copies of the minutes of the meetings of its members and of its board of directors to the council, and, in addition, such reports and information as the council may require from time to time.

I do not believe, sir, that it is my responsibility to legislate how this corporation should look after its own business. Mr. Chairman, it has nothing whatsoever to do with the operation of this plan. This corporation is being set up to look after the business of the insurance carriers who are involved in the business of providing insurance coverage for our people. Whether they observe the terms of The Corporations Act or not could not mean a bit less to me. That is their responsibility, and if their shareholders are quite prepared to turn over the responsibility of the business to their board of directors, that I think is their business.

I, as a shareholder in a company, may determine that I am quite satisfied to let the directors look after my interest. I do not think that legislators have any business in it at all so long as the public interest is not being detrimentally affected.

Mr. Sopha: How does the hon. Minister know that?

Hon. Mr. Dymond: We are talking about a corporation without share capital.

Mr. Sopha: How does he know that? If I invest $10 for one share of Canadian Breweries I am entitled to go to the annual meeting to get an account of the stewardship of the executive, of the directors. We have 200 carriers, and the hon. Minister gets up and confesses blandly—and expects us to accept it—that he does not know anything about corporation law. Well, why he did not ask the deputy Provincial Secretary? Does the hon. Minister notice how I emphasize “deputy” Provincial Secretary? Why did he not ask him? I know of no other corporation in the province that is not required to hold a democratic annual meeting to give an account of what has been done in the preceding year.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Chairman: Order, order.

Mr. Sopha: I have my democratic rights.

Mr. Chairman: The member for Sudbury has the floor.

Mr. Sopha: The truth is that when one examines the section, the government—through the hon. Minister of Health and the draftsmen of this legislation—are decreeing the antithesis of democracy. They are decreeing that that there shall not be an annual meeting for these people to give an account of what they are doing to the 200 members.

Mr. W. D. McKeough (Kent West): Filibustering.

Mr. Sopha: Do not mistake noise for common sense, my hon. friend. Under our Corporations Act we impose democracy. It is called “dollar democracy.” The one with the most number of shares controls the corporation, but we impose the requirement of holding an annual meeting to give an account of what they have done and to allow the shareholders to question the actions of the directors. Now along comes the hon. Minister of Health, who confesses his ignorance of corporation law, and he decrees in mandatory fashion, that there shall not be an annual meeting.

In other words, all of the power shall be exercised exclusively by the directors, apparently without regard to the wishes of 200 carriers, quite a large number of co-operatives and quite a large number of physicians’ plans. There are going to be seven of them invested with sole power to administer all their affairs, and they will never be called to account.

I must confess in closing, that I know of one other corporation in Ontario that administers the affairs of a large number of people, of which I am a member, and which never holds an annual meeting. I thought it was an anomaly. That is the law society of Upper Canada, and that is the only other one.

Mr. Young: Mr. Chairman, in my question of the hon. Minister a while ago, he made his reply and schedule B is here, but it still has not fully answered the question I asked in respect to this contract. We have outlined here what the contract is, but we have not outlined what the cost is going to be to the people of the province, and I think this is the important question of the whole matter.

We are going to give the corporation a chance to regulate in this regard, and yet we are being asked to pass a bill, but we have no idea what the cost of this is going to be to the people of Ontario.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Mr. Chairman, I have already said, during the debate on second reading, that I was not in a position to tell them costs. I gave the costs that would directly affect the government of Ontario. I have already put those on the record. I can only give examples of the cost.

Now this bill, as I have stated before and I must repeat for emphasis, is not going to change the present pattern of insurance in the province. There is nothing in the bill that would lead anyone, even in his wildest dreams, to imagine that it will alter the pattern as it now exists. I can only give you some examples of what happened in the province which is quoted by some of you from time to time, the province of Alberta.

There, the maximum premium is $63, $126 and $159, the premium chargeable to people who pay their own, running at $44 per annum. This is for a single. It is $57.75 for 40 years of age and over, by another carrier; another carrier, $36 for a single individual; another carrier, $40 for a single individual; couples, $115.50; another carrier, for a couple $96 and $120, and where both persons are 65, that same carrier charges $126.

Mr. Young: Is this co-insurance?

Hon. Mr. Dymond: No, this is full payment. I have no idea what the co-insurance would be. The premium for the co-insurance is that much less, dependent upon the amount of deductible and the amount of the co-insurance.

Another carrier, for a family of three, $132; another carrier, $145.75; another carrier, $122.

These are the actual premiums charged, and this pattern has not changed one bit in almost two years of operation in the province of Alberta. Now I can see no reason—

Mr. Young: Would this be slightly different policies, or the same policies?

Hon. Mr. Dymond: They are comparable policies. They will not be exactly the same, but we have tried to equate them as nearly as possible. One may provide certain benefits, and another may provide somewhat different benefits. You will understand that it is not possible to equate these exactly, because there may be greater demand for one than for the other. But this is a pattern that was existing before the Alberta plan went into operation. This is the pattern which is existing at the present time.

Now, you may immediately wonder why the difference between these premiums and the ones that I have stated for ours. We have worked this out, and the difference between our levels of premiums is exactly 15 per cent, and the difference between the fee schedule in Alberta and the fee schedule in Ontario is 15 per cent. So our levels are exactly on a par with Alberta, having regard to the differences in the costs of medical care.

I would like again to point out to my hon. friend from Sudbury, Mr. Chairman, that the corporation which is set up here is a corporation without share capital and, as I understand it, there is not the same demand for an annual meeting. But I would like to refer to one who is learned in the law, because I do not think that I am now interested in studying law, after listening to my hon. friend.

Hon. A. K. Roberts (Minister of Lands and Forests): I wonder, if perhaps just to straighten the records here, in the normal course of all corporations here in this province, the business of the corporation is conducted by the board of directors, and then the shareholders have certain rights.

Mr. Sopha: That is what happened in Windfall.

Hon. Mr. Roberts: Well, it may have happened, wherever it happened, but that is the law, and that is the normal procedure—that the directors conduct the affairs of companies, and the shareholders have supervision at certain times.

Now, in regard to non-share capital companies, there is a part of The Companies Act which provides for them, and which provides for annual meetings, and provides for measurements. All companies, whether they are incorporated by special Act, or by other Act, or by charter, in the nature of non-share companies, are subject to the provisions of The Corporations Act.

Mr. Sopha: No, sir.

Hon. Mr. Roberts: Well, all right, just a minute.

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Mr. Chairman, if I may interrupt this for a moment. It is not our wish that this company not be subject to those, and if there is a difference of opinion between the legal people here in the House—and I suppose each one is expressing the opinion he carries from his own private practice—I would be very happy to see that this point is looked into. If a section is needed to make it applicable, it will be put in. If, in the opinion of the law officers of the Crown it is not necessary, then we can show the report to the House.

But I just want to make it clear that the assumption is that the provisions of The Corporations Act in regard to the affairs of this corporation per se, would apply. If they do not, we will make sure that they do.

Hon. Mr. Roberts: May I just infer that my hon. friend understands law when it is given to him right by verse and scripture here.

Section 100 of part 3 of The Corporations Act provides that this part, except where it is otherwise expressly provided—and it is the part with respect to corporations without share capital—applies; (c) to every corporation incorporated by, or under, a general or special Act of the Legislature, and unless there is a specific exception in this Act to that, that is the law.

Mr. Sopha: I do not want to indulge in pettifoggery, but that part you read is from the part of The Corporations Act referring to corporations without share capital.

Hon. Mr. Roberts: That is what this one is.

Mr. Sopha: This section 4 does not so identify that corporation.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: It does indeed. Mr. Chairman, section 4 says:

There is hereby established a corporation without share capital.

It is stated specifically in the Act, and I would like to advise you, sir, and through you the hon. members of the House, that the law officers of this government have already checked this bill, and they assure me that this is quite in keeping with established law.

Mr. Chairman: All those in favour of the amendment of the member for Parkdale say "aye."

Those who are opposed say "nay."

In my opinion, the "nays" have it.

Call in the members.

Mr. Chairman: All those in favour of Mr. Trotter's amendment, please stand.

All those opposed to the amendment, please stand.

Clerk of the House: Mr. Chairman, the "ayes" are 25 and the "nays" 50.

Mr. Chairman: I declare the amendment lost.

Section 4 agreed to.

Mr. Sopha: I move that subsection 2 of section 4 be amended by deleting the words—

Mr. Chairman: Section 4 is carried.

Mr. Sopha: Oh no, I can move another amendment.

Mr. Chairman: No, the whole thing is carried.

Mr. Sopha: Where is the rule that says that?

Mr. Chairman: This is the rule we have been carrying on.

On section 5:

Mr. Sopha: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, the amendment moved by my hon. friend, the hon. member for Parkdale, only impeached subsections 1 and 2. It did not impeach the principle of the bill. It is not an analogy to rule 56 which is applicable to section readings. There are altogether 14 subsections to this section, if I may have your attention.

Mr. Chairman: They should all have been included in the one.

Mr. Renwick: Mr. Chairman, on section 5, I think section 5 merits more than any other section in the bill—

Mr. McKeough: That is what the hon. member said about 3 and 4.

Mr. Chairman: Order! If we had fewer interruptions we would get along much better.

Mr. Renwick: The blatant hypocrisy of the government in putting this bill forward is in the purpose they have given for the bill—the main purpose of the bill as stated in the explanatory note—is to make medical services insurance available to every resident of Ontario regardless of age, state of past or present health, financial means or occupation. Section 5 incorporates those very words in the section which is the principle of the bill. But the strange thing about this bill, the only bill that I have ever seen in which this could be done, is that you can take section 5, remove it entirely from the bill and you then have the exact bill which this government is putting before this Legislature. You do not need section 5, either subsections 1 or 2, for the purpose of carrying out the intention of this government, so far as this medical insurance plan is concerned.

I draw your attention simply to section 6, which provides the section under which subsidies are going to be provided. Then I draw your attention to section 9 which states that standard medical insurance contracts will be offered for sale to persons who are eligible and who apply and pay the subscription therefor. Section 14 then determines the persons who are able to get that kind of a contract.

When you read section 9, section 6 and section 14, you realize that the phraseology in section 5 has no relationship whatsoever to the plan which the government is putting forward. Certainly to say in one section of this bill, which is the principle of the bill, that standard medical services insurance contracts shall be made available to residents and their dependants, without regard to age, physical or mental infirmities, financial means or occupation, is directly contrary to a section which states that licensed carriers shall offer for sale and issue standard medical service insurance contracts, and may offer for sale and issue standard co-insurance medical insurance contracts, to persons who are eligible and who apply and pay the subscription therefor.

If you have to pay the subscription therefor, it is not up to any other section of this bill to state that it is made available to people without regard to their financial means. And if you will carefully examine every section of the bill you can simply take out section 5—which incorporates the so-called principle of the government's bill—and you have a complete bill in front of you.

In my opinion, and in the opinion of our group here, section 5 is nothing but window dressing, and it was passed as the so-called principle of this bill and it has no relationship whatsoever to the remainder of the Act.

Mr. S. Lewis (Scarborough West): Mr. Chairman, I would like to offer a couple of observations on section 5. During the process of the debate on second reading, there was brought to the attention of the government the important paramedical groups against whom this bill, in the eyes of several of us, discriminated. Indeed, I would suggest not only in the eyes of the Opposition, but of some of the hon. government members who had some very strong contacts with the group to which I make reference and are equally persuaded of the validity of their claim on the medical insurance compensation. The groups are, as the House knows full well, the oral surgeons, the optometrists, the chiropractors, the osteopath—

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Mr. Chairman, with very great respect, I would suggest that this is entirely out of order. This is included in the principle of the bill, the principle which was fully debated and agreed upon by this House. I, therefore, suggest that this is not in order at this time.

Mr. Chairman: I will have to agree with the Minister of Health that this is out of order, because it was voted on at the time; definitely voted on.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, would you be prepared to entertain some alternative points of view, or were these things cut and dried before we came in here?

Mr. Chairman: Not by me.

Mr. Bryden: Well, I would suggest to you, sir, that the content of standard contracts is very much relevant to this bill. The question of whether we make a certain extension of them or reduction of them, that is surely within the terms of the bill. To say that we cannot, in any sense, suggest any extension of the type of coverage proposed in the standard contract, I submit to you, sir, is quite improper. My hon. friend is suggesting that in certain cases, certain other people besides physicians performing services that are normally considered to be those of physicians, should be recognized.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order—Mr. Chairman, and I think I have a right—

Mr. Bryden: I am speaking to a point of order.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: I am speaking to a point of order on the hon. member's point of order.

Mr. Bryden: Well, why should he get up in the middle of my speech—

Mr. Chairman: The Minister can raise a point of order on another member's point of order.

Mr. Bryden: Well, I raise a point of order on this point of order that he should sit down.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. L. M. Reilly (Eglington): The hon. member for Woodbine has the floor.

Mr. Chairman: The point of order of the member for Woodbine. He rose on a point of order.

Mr. Bryden: Yes, sir, and I was still speaking to it.

Mr. Chairman: Well, in that case, you speak.

Mr. Bryden: I was arguing to you, Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Chairman: State your point of order.

Mr. Bryden: I am speaking in regard to the point of order that you permitted me to do, that is, in regard to the point of order raised by the hon. Minister. I was making my comment that what the hon. member for Scarborough West wishes to do is perfectly in order in any reasonable interpretation of the rules.

Hon. C. S. MacNaughton (Minister of Highways): Let him speak for himself.

Mr. Bryden: What place? You might as well get it over with here.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Mr. Chairman, this is the point of order on which I rose.

Mr. Bryden: He was the one who started the argument. What we are dealing with here are standard contracts.

Mr. Chairman: Let me quote you rule 49: The subject matter which has been decided upon cannot be again proposed during the same session. Now, we have decided upon this.

Mr. MacDonald: When did we decide?

Mr. Chairman: In second reading. I submit to you there was an amendment at the time.

Mr. Bryden: There was an amendment attacking the principle of the bill. We are now dealing with a specific section, and a specific point within the framework of the bill, namely, the content of the standard contracts. We wish to propose that one variation be made in the government's proposal in relation to those contracts.

Surely, that is the type of matter that is properly dealt with in committee. The hon. Minister says it should be dealt with under another section. Well, I would say that a section dealing with standard contracts is as good a place as any to deal with the content of standard contracts.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Mr. Chairman, this is what I have been trying to say and what I must repeat for emphasis again—it is obvious the hon. members have not read their bills.

On page 15 of the bill, under schedule A, the standard medical services insurance contract will come up, and surely that is the place to deal with the content of the contracts.

Mr. Bryden: No, Mr. Chairman—

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Chairman: Order.

Mr. Bryden: I assure the hon. Minister that I have read the bill at least as well as he has, and I get the impression from some of his comments that he is not too familiar with it.

But there is absolutely nothing that requires that a matter of this kind has to be dealt with under the schedule. We believe it is important enough that it should be within the main body of the Act, and we have the option of making our proposals when we are dealing with the relevant section in the Act. There is nothing that says we have to wait—

Mr. Chairman: The member for Woodbine was up on a point of order. Now the member for Scarborough West has the floor.

Mr. S. Lewis: Mr. Chairman, I would just like to remind the House that when the hon. Minister of Health first rose in agitated furore, he said, on a point of order, that I was out of order because what I was discussing had been dealt with earlier on principle in second reading and was, therefore, not valid. He rises three minutes later to say that it is invalid because it can be dealt with under the subsection relating to the standard contract.

You cannot have it both ways. Either it is out of order totally, or it is in order totally. I strongly suggest, Mr. Chairman, that it does fall foursquare within section 5, and if I may be permitted to read the amendment that I wish to make, I think the House can be persuaded of that.

I would suggest and move that section 5 of Bill 136 be amended by adding thereto the following subsection 3:

(3) Standard contracts shall provide that, in cases where services for which fees are provided in the Ontario medical association's schedule of fees and are performed by oral surgeons, optometrists, chiropractors or osteopaths, licensed or registered under any statute of Ontario, payment for such services shall be provided under the contracts in the same manner as if they were provided by a physician.

Frankly, Mr. Chairman, the amendment, as it stands, falls within section 5. It relates directly to what should be included within a standard contract. It relates to the Ontario medical association's fees governing the amounts to be paid out under section 5. It relates to statutes that are passed in this House, and would apply, therefore, to section 5. So, humbly, Mr. Chairman, I suggest that the subsection is in order, the amendment is in order and I wish the hon. Minister would allow it to be open for debate.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Mr. Chairman, I would like to suggest that the amendment is out of order in that, I am of the opinion—and I think this is a question of judgment that must be made by whoever presides—this is one of the principles which was discussed on second reading, which was how far the benefits under this bill would extend. There was a long argument, and I do not propose to repeat it, but I think that the amendment as proposed by the hon. member for Scarborough West really strikes right at one of the basic principles that was decided when the bill was given second reading by this House.

As I say, I am fully of the opinion, and aware that in dealing in committee these matters are a question of degree. I put my opinion before the House that the degree to which, and the distance to which, this amendment goes, is certainly far enough to get right to one of the principles of the bill which was discussed in second reading.

Mr. Bryden: It goes very little distance at all.

Mr. Chairman: I will have to rule these extra services included in here were all included in the amendment by the Liberal Opposition on second reading.

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Chairman, in the first amendment that I proposed, I was taking back a number of private carriers, suggesting that it would be under one—a voluntary one—in the definition of the doctor. This was omission, you might say, and we were going back on it.

Now we talk about commission, adding to it, and you, sir, with a background in the Anglican Church, know the phrase with respect to omissions and commissions. It is a beseeching that we all make. Here we are, asking can we either suggest that there be some extension, or that there should be something pulled back. You are going to muzzle us to the extent that we can make no kind of contribution—

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Wish we could muzzle you.

Mr. Chairman: Order.

Mr. Thompson: Well, that might be your wish, but I assure you we will not be muzzled. We are quite prepared to listen, and we have done it for many years now, to the kind of raucous bullying that some hon. members would try to impose on us. But I can assure you we will not bow our heads.

I say, Mr. Chairman, that if you are going to limit us, so that we cannot talk about certain extensions in benefits, then what is the purpose of discussing this bill?

Mr. R. M. Whicher (Bruce): Mr. Chairman, I would like to say that after listening to what the hon. member for Scarborough West said, I do not think this extends the services under this Act at all. As I listened—and I listened rather carefully—it suggested that those services that can and are done in some instances by the medical profession, now also can be done by chiropractors or optometrists and that they could be included under the Act. I would suggest that it does not extend the service one single bit, but rather that some of the things done by the medical profession now can be done by chiropractors and optometrists, and so on, and be paid by the moneys under this Act. I do not think it extends the services one single bit, and, therefore, I would suggest that this amendment is very much in order.

Mr. S. Lewis: On a point of order, before the Chairman comes to his ruling. I appreciate the feelings in the hon. Prime Minister's mind, and perhaps I did not make this sufficiently clear before the hon. member just spoke. I think, Mr. Chairman, there is a qualitative difference between the Liberal amendment and this amendment which I have just moved.

The Liberal amendment referred to all services. It was a comprehensive amendment. It included all the paramedical groups, and all the services that they could dispense.

We are relating simply to the services which would be given under this bill, as of right, under the Ontario medical association fee schedule. It is precisely within the bill as designed. It simply extends payment to other groups who provide those services, to other than general practitioners, and frankly, Mr. Chairman, that seems to me completely within the accord of this bill.

Mr. Chairman: On May 25, the leader of Opposition moved, seconded by the member for Grey South, Mr. Oliver, that a comprehensive government-operated universal health programme be instituted; that patients have the right to be treated by the doctor of their choice; that doctors shall be paid on a fee-for-service basis and shall be free to practise within or without the plan; there shall be no means test; mental illness shall be treated on the same basis as other illnesses; dental and optical services for children up to 18 years of age shall be included; other ancillary medical and health care services, such as home nursing, or orthopaedic appliances, chiropractic services and so forth, shall be phased into the programme as independent health services in order that the programme shall be fully comprehensive by 1971. The bill, in its final form, shall be of such a nature that the programme can be readily integrated into a national health programme for all Canadians.

That was voted down. Now this is the same thing.

Mr. S. Lewis: I do not think it is.

Mr. MacDonald: You are missing the point.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: How many can talk at once?

Mr. Chairman: The leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Thompson: Sir, under the schedule proposed by the hon. Minister of Health, he suggests: "9. Examination of the eyes by refraction."

The question we are asking, and I assume this is in this bill, is whether the optometrists, if they do refractions, will be covered by this bill? And dental care, 2(b). Does this include dentists? These are the questions that we want to ask, whether the professional people who will be working on the outline of benefits, will include optometrists and dentists and so on, and chiropractors.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Mr. Chairman, these are exceptions. These are listed in the bill as exceptions, under the contract. They are not provisions.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to argue on the same ground as the hon. leader of the Opposition. But surely this is crystal clear. You, Mr. Chairman, are painfully aware of the fact that the medical profession has been keeping certain groups out on the fringe, in terms of full practice. Yet even the medical profession, through the Ontario medical association, has conceded that in certain instances, oral surgeons, optometrists, chiropractors, osteopaths, will have payments made under the OMA schedule of fees. So that even in the monopoly that the medical profession has sustained for years—and wants to sustain—they have at least conceded something to these groups along the way.

What we are saying is that what the medical profession has conceded up until now, and is covered at the moment under the OMA schedule of fees, is to be eliminated by this bill. What the hon. Minister is attempting to do—and I am utterly astounded that he should argue that he is not acting on behalf of the medical association and the insurance companies, is to bring in a bill that narrows the monopoly even more than the medical association has done. He wants to deprive the osteopaths, the oral surgeons, the optometrists, of payments they have been getting up until now, by concession of the medical profession and the OMA schedule of fees.

We are not asking for a wide extension, such as was included in the Liberal amendment. All we are asking is that this government be not so solicitous of the medical profession as to narrow their monopoly beyond what even they have conceded down through the years and not to discriminate against these people. That is not within the four corners of the amendment that has been voted on.

Mr. Chairman: I have no alternative but to follow the rules as set forth here, and I have to rule the amendment out of order.

Mr. Sopha: Has it occurred to you that throughout the whole of the debate the rules have been interpreted so as to stifle the Opposition?

Mr. Chairman: I do not think there is any stifling.

Mr. Sopha: The hon. Prime Minister did not want to vote against osteopaths and dental surgeons and chiropractors. He did not want to be put in the position of voting, so he stood up and said this was out of order—

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Mr. Chairman, I would like—

Mr. Sopha: —and the rules are interpreted so that we are always out of order—

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Mr. Chairman, I think the hon. member, when he calms down a bit, will realize that if amendments are made that are out of order, they are out of order. I will abide by the decision of whoever leads this House, and I always have—

Mr. Bryden: Always your way.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: I can only say it is not my fault if you persist in making amendments that are out of order.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Whicher: Mr. Chairman, I want to repeat that this does not call for the extension of any services. It allows the—

Mr. Chairman: Order. Order. The Chairman's ruling is not debatable. If you want to challenge it, that is your business.

Mr. Sopha: How can we challenge it, a mere 30 of us?

Mr. S. Lewis: Mr. Chairman, I thought I heard you say: "I think I must rule against the amendment." I thought there might, therefore, be some modest flexibility—

Mr. Chairman: No, until I got the votes and proceedings, then I had no alternative.

Mr. S. Lewis: Well, then, on a point of order, Mr. Chairman, may I ask the hon. Minister through you, at this juncture in the debate, whether we will have the opportunity under the schedule, to ask for some answers, not make amendments, only to ask for some answers relating to the questions that have been raised at this point? I am frankly mystified as to why he takes the stand he does, and rather than move a succession of amendments to extend the standard contract through the course of the debate, will the hon. Minister commit himself to answering those questions?

Mr. Chairman: You are at liberty to ask any questions you desire.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Mr. Chairman, I will attempt to answer questions to the best of my ability, as I have tried to do throughout the whole procedure.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask a question right now, then. Is it a fact that under this bill, assuming it is passed—

Mr. Reilly: What section is this?

Mr. Bryden: I am talking about the standard contracts. Under the standard contract as provided by this bill, if you wish to put it that way—assuming it goes through in essentially its present form—a person who goes to an oculist—I think that is the proper term, a medical practitioner at any rate who specializes in eyes—and receives an eye examination, will he receive coverage under this bill as it now stands?

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Not if the examination is for refraction.

Mr. S. Lewis: May I ask a further question on that, because this is obviously the point, Mr. Chairman?

If a patient is brought into hospital with a serious jaw fracture—that frequently happens—and the surgeons at the hospital, the medical practitioners deemed as such by this Act, consult together and decide—as is common practice—that the person most capable of performing the necessary operation is an oral surgeon, will that oral surgeon be compensated for that service under this Act, since it is a service within the Ontario medical association fee schedule?

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Mr. Chairman, there is a very great difference of opinion between the Royal college of dental surgeons and the college of physicians and surgeons on this matter, and they, together with the deans of the faculties of medicine and of dentistry, are studying the matter to advise me on it. I am very much concerned about this particular matter. I recognize that what the hon. member has said applies particularly in the teaching centres, is a very essential part of the teaching of dentistry and it is getting every possible attention and consideration.

Mr. Thompson: Would the hon. Minister of Health define for us in layman's terms what he actually means by "refraction," and could this not be covered by an optometrist? That is the question I am getting at. What difference would there be if it were done by other than an optometrist?

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Refraction is examination of the eyes to determine if one needs glasses and to check one's vision. It is one of the important functions performed by the optometrist. In the wisdom of the committee, where this was considered very carefully and was very thoroughly discussed, it was the recommendation that it be excluded.

I would point out to you, Mr. Chairman, that this has been done in Saskatchewan and in Alberta, and it is, with the exception of the doctor-sponsored plan in Manitoba, excluded in many contracts. It is excluded in many contracts here in Ontario, and in the doctor-sponsored plans it is a fee for benefit only and is carried out by ophthalmologists.

For the present time, it was deemed best to exclude this from our standard contracts.

Mr. Thompson: When you say that there was representation and study made of this, were optometrists asked to give their point of view to you, and did they do so?

Hon. Mr. Dymond: We did not do the study, Mr. Chairman. This was done by the Hagey committee, and optometrists made their submissions to the committee and these, together with all the others, were carefully studied.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, I do not think that the hon. Minister need bother citing the Hagey commission with a view to convincing us; not even he was very much convinced of the validity of its report. We consider that it was a totally useless effort and a waste of time—so it cuts no ice with us.

I would like to get back to the question of oral surgery. The hon. Minister said that the point raised by my hon. friend from Scarborough West is now under consideration by representatives of the medical association and the Royal college of dental surgeons, and he expects that they will advise him in due course. The only problem is that we are dealing with the legislation now. Is this legislation in such form that the services of oral surgeons can be included or excluded at the whim of the hon. Minister? My impression of the bill, as it now stands, is that the services of oral surgeons will not be covered, but if such operations are performed by a licensed member of the medical profession, they will be covered. In other words, it is straight discrimination.

The situation could be even worse, if it is simply a matter that is left to the whim of the hon. Minister. What about this? Is this clearly stated in the bill or not? Is my interpretation wrong that the services of oral surgeons are excluded from the bill?

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Mr. Chairman, the interpretation of the hon. member is wrong in so far as his charge of discrimination is concerned. This is a very difficult point, and while it is not stated in the bill, the programme does not come into effect until June 1, 1966. If legislative change is required, we will have time to make it. I believe that it can be done by regulation. There is one great difference between this service and other ancillary health care services, in that dental-oral surgery is done within a hospital. If the dental-oral surgeon has the right to practise surgery within the hospital, he is actually under the direction of the chief of surgery and this puts it in a somewhat different category.

The optometrist, of course, does not practise within a hospital, nor do those offering many of the other ancillary services.

Mr. Bryden: Nothing to break the medical guild; they keep it all under their control.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: If my hon. friend would just be reasonable. After all, if you want to practise medicine, my friend, there is no law that keeps you out of medical school, but if you want to run through the back door, you cannot expect the rights and privileges of the profession.

Mr. Bryden: Are you suggesting that oral surgeons have had a quick run through the back door?

Hon. Mr. Dymond: I am not talking about oral surgeons, Mr. Chairman; I was talking about the hon. member. He certainly is not an oral surgeon.

Mr. Bryden: What has that got to do—

Hon. Mr. Dymond: He may be a linguistic surgeon, but he certainly is not an oral one.

I only want to point out, Mr. Chairman—I am trying to make it as clear to the hon. member as possible, that this is a difficult area and somewhat unique compared with some of the other services that have been mentioned. It is still being given a great deal of careful study.

Mr. Bryden: The one thing that the hon. Minister made clear in the midst of his various irrelevancies was this: What is mainly being taken care of is, that the whole thing is being kept tightly in the hands of the medical profession. That is exactly what he made clear; he stated that if an oral surgeon performs surgery within his specialty in a hospital, it is under the control of the medical profession and therefore it might be acceptable. But actually, as the bill stands—we might as well face it right now—unless it should later be amended, the bill discriminates between two groups of professionally qualified people. On the one hand there are licensed medical practitioners—those who are defined in this bill as “physicians,” the only people who count as far as the bill is concerned. If they perform work that an oral surgeon may also be qualified to do under the bill as it now stands, payment will be made for their services under a standard contract.

If an oral surgeon, who may have considerably greater competence in that specialty, performs the operation, there will be no payment for the services under a standard contract. Now let us face it: That is what the situation is and the hon. Minister can make all the cheap gibes he wishes about me—as to whether or not I am qualified in medicine. What has that got to do with it? I am qualified to deal with this bill; I represent the public along with other hon. members. The hon. Minister of Health always forgets that they are the people for whom this legislation is allegedly designed, although it becomes clearer as the discussion proceeds that as far as the government is concerned, it is not designed for the public at all.

Mr. Whicher: Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the hon. Minister a question. Suppose a patient went to a hospital to have his teeth extracted—and, of course, the anaesthetic would be given by a medical practitioner—would that part of the operation deal with extracting of the teeth? Would the giving of the anaesthetic be covered under this bill?

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Yes, it would.

Mr. S. Lewis: Because the hon. Minister has made a special point of it, sir, I am going to pursue it for a moment longer. I assure the House that it will not be at great length.

I accept, for the moment, his distinction between the osteopaths, chiropractors and optometrists on the one hand, and the oral surgeons on the other, and I would say this, Mr. Chairman, that the other distinction the hon. Minister made is less commendable, because oral surgeons perform all kinds of complex procedures within their offices. They do so at the behest of the medical profession, to take the pressure off hospital beds. They are actually asked to do so by the medical profession and there are many instances on record—they are in the medical journals—of oral surgeons literally saving patients who had been either maltreated or ineffectively treated by general practitioners, unskilled in the art of oral surgery.

I strongly suggest to the hon. Minister, that it is not only a delicate matter, but it is a very serious one and that some provision should be made to write it into the bill as it now stands. Perhaps it could be done before we come back for third reading of this bill. I think the hon. Minister recognizes, and the House recognizes, that what we really have are highly trained professional medical practitioners against whom this bill would discriminate, unless something is done at this stage.

Mr. Sopha: There was a recent case in Saskatchewan where the words "medicine chest" were interpreted to mean that the government had to pay the premiums of Indians living off reservations. My query is in regard to these words:

Standard medical service insurance contracts shall be made available to residents without regard to financial means.

I have extracted "without regard to financial means." Does that mean that a person who is a pauper, who does not have a penny, may go to one of the carriers and say that he is entitled to be issued a contract, without payment? They can have no regard to financial means—that is what the section says.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Mr. Chairman, I think that the hon. member—if you will pardon me lapsing into the vernacular—is nit-picking—to quote my hon. friend from St. Andrew (Mr. Grossman).

Mr. Chairman, the hon. member knows full well that the provisions of this bill make it possible for a person who is without means, or even who is in receipt of an income that is not subject to income tax, to apply to the medical services insurance division of The Department of Health. He will immediately be covered at no cost to the individual.

Mr. Sopha: Under section 6 that is true, but what is the meaning of that phrase "financial" if it does not have reference to people who are in a very low income group? No one would think it referred to a millionaire; a millionaire can provide for his own health.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Mr. Chairman, if the individual, whom the hon. member mentions, went to the carrier, the carrier would refer him to the department.

Mr. Sopha: No, but it says the carrier shall supply, it is mandatory, "shall be made available." That is synonymous with "shall supply." "Shall supply to residents without regard to financial means." I just have a little urge, a little itching, that if this Act comes into force, I am going to get hold of a—maybe this will be champerty and maintenance, you would not understand those terms just as I do not understand medical terms—get hold of some fellow and bring an action against a licensed carrier, and show the court that my individual has no means, he is a pauper; and require the carrier under the terms of this section to supply a contract free. This is a very badly drawn section.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: It will be supplied free, Mr. Chairman. If the hon. member believes this is a very badly drawn section or a very badly drawn Act, I can only say to you, sir, that this Act was drawn by the legislative counsel, in whom I must admit I have far more confidence legally than I have in my hon. lawyer friends over there.

An hon. member: They do not lose them all.

Mr. Sopha: They do not try as many.

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Chairman, could I ask the hon. Minister for clarification on this point: If I have bad eyes, I now have to go to an optometrist. But someone has told me, "Now, look, if you go to an ophthalmologist you will find that you get coverage under this programme, and you will end up getting glasses prescribed for you." So then I am going to the ophthalmologist instead of the optometrist. Is this a danger in this bill?

Hon. Mr. Dymond: I do not think it is, Mr. Chairman. The ophthalmologist knows perfectly well that he is putting himself in jeopardy and could be called before the disciplinary committee of his college, because he will be guilty of fraud charging an insurance plan for service which is not provided under the terms of the contract. The examination of the eyes for glasses is not a covered service, no matter by whom it is done.

Mr. Thompson: I thank the hon. Minister very much.

Section 5 agreed to.

On section 6:

Mr. Sopha: Mr. Chairman, I have a little amendment to section 6. I might point out that in the British House of Commons—and I want to put this on record—which we profess to admire so much, the deputy Chairman of the whole House is from the Opposition. I just wanted to say that.

I move that section 6 be amended by striking out the word "classes" wherever it appears in the said section and substituting therefor the word "groups."

Mr. Bryden: Will the hon. member just hold that for a moment—

Mr. Sopha: Yes, indeed.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, I asked the hon. member if he would withhold his amendment for a few minutes, because there are a number of points under this section—and I believe that once it is formally accepted by you we can discuss only the amendment. We had another amendment in mind, but the hon. member got his in first; that is fine. I think it is a good point he raises.

There are, however, some other points I would like to raise, which do not have to be raised by way of amendment. This section is the basic section governing the administration of medical care insurance for the subsidized groups. The administration, with respect to those groups, is placed in the hands of the Minister, and there is to be a medical services insurance division within The Department of Health in order to carry out the Minister's duties in this regard.

I am suggesting to the House, Mr. Chairman, that this will create an unnecessary duplication of administrative services and machinery for no good reason at all. As far as I can see, the only reason why this section of the bill is couched in this form is simply to be a sop to the medical profession, whose unreasonableness in some of these matters is well established.

The hon. Minister told us, I believe, on the first reading of the bill, that the medical services insurance division would be located on the same premises of those of the hospital services commission of Ontario. Obviously, the efficient way of administering this phase of this bill is through the hospital services commission. Perhaps its name could be changed to hospital and medical services insurance commission, or something like that; but we already have an elaborate administrative set-up to deal with administration of legislation of this kind—evaluating claims, paying them, and so on. Yet we have to go through the nonsense of setting up still another administrative unit to do the kind of work for which we already have a huge organization.

I believe in co-operating in all possible ways with the medical profession, and with all professions in the community, but when the request reaches the point of childishness, I submit, Mr. Chairman, that we should ignore it. The medical profession has worked itself into a position where it just will not consider an independent commission administering any form of medical care insurance. Under section 6, certain claims will be dealt with by a government administrative unit; because, for some reason or other, I take it the medical profession has persuaded itself that it is all right if the hon. Minister sets up a special division within his own department to perform these services, but that it would be a terrible thing if it was done in the logical way through the hospital services commission.

As I say, Mr. Chairman, I had in mind moving an amendment along this line. I will not now take advantage of the hon. member for Sudbury, but I would suggest that the hon. Minister should eliminate the folderal from the bill at least, and provide for sound administration by providing that this phase of the programme will be administered by the commission.

Mr. Sopha: I heard the startling proposition that the bill was written by the legislative counsel. The hon. Minister, apparently at every opportunity, wants to blame this horrid statute on the legislative counsel, and I do not think it is fair to blame it on them. He should take the responsibility for it.

I think section 6 has, inherent in it, a very sinister device which should be watched with great care: That is that it is left to the regulations to provide—the regulations being under the control of the Minister at all times, of course, and the Lieutenant-Governor in Council—the groups of people—I eschew the word “classes”—provide the groups of people who will be subsidized. Accordingly, it would be a nice little device if, at election time or just before an election, regulations were made under this Act enlarging the groups of people who are subsidized and raising the income limit—a nice little election bribe that could be utilized by an unscrupulous government; could be, might be.

If, as the hon. Minister tells us, this matter of health care were studied—I wish I could feel it were studied with the same intensive study that Mr. Justice Hall addressed to the thing; I know it was not, because a Royal commission was appointed and they brought in a report wrapped in a delightful Tory blue, a royal blue, as royal a blue as you will ever see, and this document was not even referred to by the hon. Prime Minister. He did not even refer to it when he made his speech on the second reading of the bill. He just cast it aside. I take it that perhaps his copy is tucked under his desk there somewhere, where he kicks it with his feet every once in a while.

I did not see the television programme. I was busy at something else. I did not see the television programme, and I do not know—perhaps somebody will tell me—whether or not, on the television programme, he referred to the report. I did not see it and I do not know whether he told the public about the report.

But presumably, leaving aside the Hagey commission, which was not a very good commission, as commissions go—I would not stack it up against the Kelly commission, for example—it was not a very good one. But presumably the Hagey commission report was studied, and I wonder aloud, with regard to the statistical and financial studies made by the hon. Provincial Treasurer (Mr. Allan) and the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs (Mr. Spooner)—one of the eminent personages on the Treasury board—why are we not able to say at this juncture what the income limits will be, or otherwise identify the people who will receive total or partial subsidy?

Why should this be left to the regulations, for a Minister of Health and the executive council to come along at some later time and raise the level to encompass more people? Then the hon. Prime Minister, having done that, gets on the television at the next election and refers to that and says, “We promised financial assistance to more groups.” He has a suitable chart, and he checks it off—and lately I am watching these devices very carefully, and I am learning new techniques on how to win elections in this province. I have won a couple of elections myself, but I am learning more. I am learning how one uses the public money to win elections, such as by entertaining foreign potentates.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order. This is exactly the reason why I have to rise to my feet occasionally. I am reluctant to do so, but if we are going to start this I think even the hon. member who is making the speech will admit he is a long way from anything even remotely connected with this bill.

Mr. Sopha: May I ask the hon. Minister of Health, and I ask him most respectfully, why we cannot stipulate in section 6 with precision the groups that will receive total or partial subsidy, instead of leaving it to the regulations?

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Mr. Chairman, the only answer I can give is that the best advice I received was that there was no better place to put it than in the regulations. I can conceive of possibilities where we may have to change, between sessions of the Legislature, and it seems rather hard that possible hardship might accrue to groups—I defer to the hon. member's dislike for the legal word “classes”—it would be rather unfair that hardship should accrue to them just so that we might wait for another session of the Legislature.

I do not particularly like government by regulation, but there are times and there are certain types of legislation where they serve a most useful purpose. I am rather attracted to the somewhat sinister idea my hon. friend has put forth—I almost wish I had thought of it myself. I shall have to get the details from his hon. colleagues.

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Chairman, I would like to think on behalf of the hon. Minister and come to his help, because I know how deeply concerned the hon. Minister is with the fact that if you have a government-sponsored scheme you may have encroachment and compulsion and everything else implied in establishing it as part of the civil service. It seems to me, sir, that to set up a medical services insurance division for 1,000,000 people and not give a rap that it is going to be under The Department of Health, as part of the civil service, is unrealistic. In other words, he could have made this independent, as suggested by the hon. member for Woodbine, under the hospital services commission. It is certainly logical. Instead, the hon. Minister is putting it in his department, and it seems to me that this, again, shows that he is being cynical when he suggests that if there is a government-sponsored scheme there are all these great dangers. He gave that charade—almost like Gilbert and Sullivan—"I hate compulsion"; yet he is denying many of the things we thought he believed in principle.

He is bringing this right under his department. Surely, this would arouse the doctors, and surely it would rouse the hon. Minister's sensitivities as a doctor, suggesting that the medical services insurance division is going to be a part of The Department of Health.

Education is compulsory and universal, and I look on health as I do on education; they are both of prime importance to the economy and the well-being not only of the nation but of the individual.

I would suggest, sir, that you are making—I want to re-emphasize this—your medical services insurance division a part of The Department of Health—it comes directly under you and is stated right in the Act. I am suggesting that this has been one of the things that the doctors and the medical association and many others feared, that there will not be independence and that there might be a Minister—it may perchance be that you may not always be the Minister of Health—we may have someone other than a doctor and our interests will not be protected as ably as they are being protected by you. Then what happens?

I should think that this would be of grave concern to us and also to you, because you may be going back to private practice at some time. For over 1,000,000 people the medical care insurance plan is going to be under The Department of Health, a civil service operation. I point this out for those reasons, apart from all the other obvious reasons such as the fact that you have an Ontario hospital services commission set up, and I do not think that you are going to suggest to us that they are doing a bad job. We will see when the estimates come up that you will take pride in what they are doing and will resent any criticism we might make toward them.

You have a whole system set up and I ask, as the hon. member for Woodbine asked, why suddenly create a whole new bureaucracy? You have told us that you hate bureaucracy; why then follow Parkinson's law and spread it all over the place? As a Scottishman, economy should be to the fore, and for that reason—

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Scotsman!

Mr. Thompson: I am from Ireland and always refer to them as Scottishmen. I thought that that would appeal to you, if nothing else did, just on the basis of economy. Why do you not use the Ontario hospital services commission?

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Mr. Chairman, you will recall that when I submitted this bill for—oh, pardon me!

Mr. R. Gisborn (Wentworth East): Mr. Chairman, section 6 provides for the provisions of the contract on application by those who qualify. There could be groups of employees—a hundred or maybe hundreds working for an employer—who would be making wages low enough to qualify under at least (b) of subsection 1, section 6. Could the employer make application to have his group covered or would his employees have to apply as individuals?

Hon. Mr. Dymond: This Act, Mr. Chairman, does not interfere with groups nor involve itself with groups in any way, shape or form. It provides individual contracts.

I thought I made it quite clear, during second reading, that we were going to use the human and administrative resources of the Ontario hospital services commission. It was made very clear, I thought, in my submissions to the House, that the medical services insurance division would be housed in the Ontario hospital services commission building and that we would make every use of the administrative and technical resources—human and material—of the commission. They are skilled in this and are doing this work already in very large measure, and we have no intention of setting up any duplicate machinery.

The division will be under its own directors, which it would have to be any way. The only expansion that will be required will be whatever additional personnel are required to do the additional work imposed. Everyone is working to his full capacity now, but the equipment—the mechanical and technical equipment available—is there and we will utilize the supervisory people, many of whom are skilled in this business. Their services will be used by the medical services insurance division to the end that there will be no overlapping, no duplicating.

Mr. Bryden: Why do you not say so in the bill, then?

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Because I have specifically set up a division of the department where this will be completely and directly under the control of the Minister. This was done deliberately, not to hand it to the doctors or anybody else. I am not particularly worried about whether they like it or not. They have not signified any great distaste for it.

Mr. Sopha: They might hear you; be careful!

Hon. Mr. Dymond: I am quite happy if they do hear me, because I have told them this and no answer—

Mr. Sopha: They know you do not mean it.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: They know I do mean it. I do not care if I go back to practice tomorrow. I have faith, Mr. Chairman, in this government. It will be in power for as long as I will likely be practising medicine, so I will be sure that the plan will be well administered.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, the hon. Minister's actions belie his words. The bill says, and this is what we go on, that the medical services insurance division will be a division of The Department of Health. Now if, in fact, it is to be a division of the Ontario hospital services commission, why does not the bill say so?

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Mr. Chairman, I did not say it was to be a division of the Ontario hospital services commission. I said the division of the department will be housed in the OHSC building. We will utilize all the facilities there, so there will be no duplication and no overlapping, and therefore no unnecessary administrative costs.

Mr. Bryden: I heard the hon. Minister say that before, but the fact remains that this could be better integrated with the machinery of the commission if the division were subject in the first instance to the supervision of the commission, with the Minister, and the government having ultimate authority in all matters. I would suggest that would be the logical and sensible way of doing it. Failing any other, I think the explanation I gave a few minutes ago as to the reason for this curious departure from logical administrative practices is correct.

Mr. Sopha: Why should not the medical services division be a member of the corporation? Why should it not be?

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Because we are carrying the total cost of those for whom we will be responsible. Therefore there would be no call for us to be involved in the pooling arrangement. This would be the main purpose for the existence of the medical carriers.

Mr. Sopha: Oh no, do not tell me that.

Subsection 5: "The corporation shall," note the mandatory use of the word "shall." "The corporation shall from time to time recommend changes in the maximum subscription rates." They cannot leave the rates alone, because they are commanded by statute in this abominably drawn statute; they are commanded by the Legislature to recommend from time to time, changes in the maximum subscription rate.

Mr. MacDonald: You have to do it every time the OMA raises its fee schedule.

Mr. Sopha: Yes. Every time the OMA feels it is entitled to a little more milking of the public purse, they will have to change the maximum subscription rates. Therefore I would want the medical insurance division of The Department of Health, to be a member of that corporation.

The whole attitude is summed up in this way. The chief spokesman of the insurance companies for this Legislature is saying, "We in the Tory party are not going to interfere with you. We are not going to interfere with your vested right to sell, in short, your right to make a profit. We are not going to touch you. You just go off in your corner, by yourself, and you run the insurance business, and we will give you, in true Tory tradition, a minimum of interference." So subsection 4 shies away from any interference with the God-given right of the insurance companies of this province, to run the insurance business as they see fit.

Mr. Chairman: Mr. Sopha moves that section 6 be amended by striking out the words "classes" wherever it appears in the said section and substituting therefor the word "groups."

Mr. Sopha: I want to say, in reference to that, just one sentence. To me and to a good many other people in this province, the word "classes," when it is used in a sociological sense, it is one of the legacies of the Family Compact and has a connotation of opprobrium. It means that people are divided into a hierarchy of classes, and it means in this section that there is a connotation of opprobrium. I want to take out that offensive word and substitute an inoffensive one, such as "groups." So let us hear what they do in reference to that.

Mr. Chairman: Those in favour of the amendment, say "aye."

Those opposed, say "nay."

In my opinion, the "nays" have it.

Call in the members.

All in favour of Mr. Sopha's amendment, please stand.

All opposed to Mr. Sopha's amendment, please stand.

Clerk of the House: Mr. Chairman, the "ayes" are 22, the "nays" 53.

Mr. Chairman: I declare the amendment lost, and section 6 shall become part of the bill.

On section 7:

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Chairman, on section 7, I look at the fact that section 7 (1) says that "any person who is unable to continue payment of his medical services insurance subscription because of a lack of income caused by unemployment, illness or disability, may within the first 30 days of such default make application to the council for assistance during the period of unemployment, illness or disability, to continue his medical services insurance contract towards the purchase of a standard contract."

Frankly, Mr. Chairman, it is this kind of rigidity within the Act which still concerns me. We are dealing with human beings who fall ill and I am sure that the hon. Minister of Health, a doctor himself, knows that there are cases when people fall ill and could be in a coma, when they could be worried or, for a variety of reasons, are not capable of thinking about whom they have to contact within 30 days—when they do not have relatives or they are removed from their relatives in some way. No one can take care of this bureaucratic decision that they have to be in touch within 30 days.

As I have said before, I have had cases within my own riding of sick people of European background who are completely muddled by all the bureaucratic red tape and everything else that is involved. Of course, this bill is going to emphasize a lot of this, in the contracts, and standard contracts, the length of time, the open policy, when you are allowed to enroll, and all these other great technicalities. This is really going to be to many people a complete confusion, Mr. Chairman.

I notice this restriction of 30 days and I ask again, will there be special exigencies, that it was not the person's fault, that he can make an appeal so that he can still get under the 30 days ruling? Have you set up any kind of appeal situation for these kinds of things?

Hon. Mr. Dymond: This is one of the functions of the council, and I can assure the hon. member, sir, that we intend to make use of every possible means to see to it that nobody is left out. We will seek to enlist the support and assistance of municipal authorities, public health nurses, welfare authorities, social workers, doctors' offices, because we believe in the case of some certain groups mentioned in this section—people who are ill and out of work because of illness and unprotected insofar as insurance is concerned—the doctor might be the first to contact them, and recognize the difficulty and direct them towards the place where coverage can be obtained for them. Every effort will be made. This was one of the overriding considerations all through our preparation of this Act, that some system could be worked out which would make continuous coverage readily available to those who were unable to protect themselves because of unemployment or because of a host of other reasons, such as are outlined here.

Mr. Thompson: May I ask the hon. Minister of Health, assuming there is a situation—let me just take a hypothetical example, say from my own riding, where someone of European background gets hit by a car. He has come over to this country and he served a length of time to establish residence; he is in a coma, in hospital for 31 days, then suddenly we find out he has not got proper coverage. What steps should he then take in order to get the coverage?

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Mr. Chairman, I cannot tell you what the administrative details are, because frankly they are not written out yet, but I would certainly urge that the department of medical services insurance be immediately contacted and given the necessary information so that the matter could be laid before the council immediately.

Mr. Thompson: This is a kind of appeal board?

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Absolutely. This is one of the main functions.

Hon. J. Yaremko (Provincial Secretary): I am sure the hon. Minister will make sure that everybody is aware of the bill.

Mr. Renwick: Mr. Chairman, on section 7 we are concerned with the cumbersome procedure by which people who are unable to pay because of unemployment, illness or disability, would first apply to the council, and then the council in turn would make recommendations to the Minister. We think that the order of administrative efficiency would suggest that the application should be made in the first instance to the Minister to be dealt with, that it could be dealt with expeditiously, and then that the applicant, if his application has been refused, should have an appeal to the council.

I, therefore, move that section 7 of Bill No. 136 be amended to read as follows:

Subsection 1: Any person who is unable to continue payment of his medical services insurance subscriptions because of lack of income due to unemployment, illness or disability, may, within the first 30 days of such default, make application to the Minister for assistance during the period of unemployment, illness or disability to continue his medical services insurance contract, or toward the purchase of a standard contract, and the Minister shall consider and act upon such application in accordance with the regulations.

Subsection 2: Any person aggrieved by a decision of the Minister under subsection 1 may appeal to the council, whose decision shall be final and binding.

Mr. Chairman: Mr. Renwick moves that section 7 of Bill No. 136 be amended to read as follows:

Subsection 1: Any person who is unable to continue payment of his medical services insurance subscriptions because of lack of income due to unemployment, illness or disability, may, within the first 30 days of such default, make application to the Minister for assistance, during the period of unemployment, illness or disability, to continue his medical services insurance contract or towards the purchase of a standard contract, and the Minister shall consider and act upon such application in accordance with the regulations.

Subsection 2: Any person aggrieved by a decision of the Minister under subsection 1 may appeal to the council, whose decision shall be final and binding.

Mr. Young: Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that this amendment does streamline the administrative procedures a great deal. I presume that the council will only meet at regular intervals. The council, a group brought together this way, would not be in continuous session, so they might meet once a month or whatever the period might be. And at that time they would have before them all the applications, those applications will be dealt with, the recommendations made to the Minister and then the matter be settled.

It seems to me that applications directly to the Minister can be processed quickly. They would not come to the Minister as a person, but they would come to his department, and he would have responsible people there who would look into the merits of each case and would pass on them very quickly. This is a matter of routine in an office.

Then, if there is any problem here, if the Minister in his wisdom felt that a person should not be passed on, that the merits of his case were not adequate, and if the applicant felt they were, he still could appeal to the council from the decision. It just seems that this makes for quick, smooth and efficient administration.

I would urge that this amendment to the legislation be adopted.

Mr. Chairman: All those in favour of Mr. Renwick's amendment—

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Mr. Chairman, before you put the amendment, I would like to advise you, and the hon. members through you, why we did it this way. In the first instance, we considered doing it the way the hon. member proposed, except that we did not set up an appeal from the Minister's ruling by the council. After all, the council is advisory to the Minister, and it would put them in a rather difficult situation if you give them the power to overrule the Minister's ruling.

However, that apart, we did think of the possibility of more rapid action through the method the hon. member has proposed in his amendment. We decided against it because it seemed better to have the application go to the director of the division, who will be secretary of the council, and who will see that the matter is taken in hand immediately. Whereas, if it came to the Minister, there is a possibility the Minister might be out of his office for a time and the matter neglected until he returned. An acting Minister may hesitate to take a matter of that kind under consideration, and I believe that it is in the interests of more certain protection for those who will need it, that we do it in this way.

I would, therefore, suggest to you, Mr. Chairman, that the method laid down in the Act is better than the proposed amendment.

Mr. Young: Then this is the intention, Mr. Chairman, that the director act in a routine fashion, and then the matter be laid before the council. If they wish to countermand any of his orders, they can do it at that point.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: We envisage that within the council would be a small group with some executive power to deal with matters of this kind, those requiring quick and ready decisions. This is one of the matters which in our opinion, I repeat, merits, and must have, quick consideration and a quick decision.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, that is not what the legislation says, nevertheless. I think the hon. Minister and we agree that it is desirable that such applications should be dealt with expeditiously. It is just a matter of arriving at the administrative formula that would accomplish that.

But I do not believe, from what little I know of the law, that the council will have any power to delegate any powers given to it by this Act. This section as it stands states quite clearly that council shall consider applications, not somebody designated by the council, but the council.

I would assume that the council may meet perhaps once a month. It could very well happen that a person could make an application and wait 29 days before the council was in a position to meet and consider his application. By that time, they would have a raft of applications before them and they would have difficulty disposing of them. Even assuming they disposed of them all, the applications still would have to go to the Minister for action, so we would still have the problem of the Minister possibly being away from his office. That problem is not avoided here.

I suggest to the hon. Minister that the machinery set forth here—and we can only go on what is in the bill—is quite cumbersome, and will lead to unnecessary delay in an area where delay is most undesirable. If a person is unemployed and broke and worried about his medical insurance coverage, it is desirable to deal with his case as quickly as possible.

I suggest that the hon. Minister take the matter under advisement with a view, perhaps, to amending the section to make it abundantly clear that the council can delegate whatever powers and duties it has under this section to an officer of the council or to some other person. I think that this section relates to what are essentially routine applications at a very high level, and it would be very much better if some way could be worked out whereby they could be dealt with by an official within the department, and go to the higher level only in case of an appeal.

Mr. Sopha: I do not believe that this is administratively sound. Presumably there is a possibility that there will be an absolute flood of applications. I really question whether any administrative machinery can handle this efficiently. I wonder whether it will not become a case that there will be so many applications for total or partial assistance during periods of unemployment. For example, I visualize that when the lakes freeze up that there will be an absolute flood of applications from people who are working on the Great Lakes. Similarly, when the harvesting of crops is finished and the casual employees in that industry become unemployed, and those in the construction industry become unemployed, which is less seasonal than it used to be but it is still largely a seasonal industry.

We have sectors of our economy where people work for only a part of the year. A small group, and an interesting one, that Ron Haggart wrote about yesterday, were the people at the parimutuel windows at Woodbine race track who make a handsome sum over the year—an average of $95 a week—and as soon as the last horse leaves the last starting gate in the last race and the last racing day of the year, then presumably all those people will file their applications with the council for partial assistance or full assistance, as the case may be. And really—I am espousing something now to which the hon. Minister may be more sympathetic—I can also visualize that a good many people, who should not make application, will make application. If they were responsible, good citizens, they would continue to pay their premiums out of their savings; but because it is the public purse—the trough of largesse—they feel that because Jennie Jones down the street—and I do not make my remarks applicable to any living person, a purely fictional person—makes application, and gets partial or total assistance, then they should.

I think, in order to make this work, that there ought to be a more stringent test, so that only those who are really entitled to it in justice and equity should be able to apply. One of the things—and it is inherent in this section—I fear about this Act is that public moneys are going to be paid to a lot of people who do not deserve them, who should not really apply, and who should not expect the state to come to their assistance.

It is a good old Tory principle that a man should look after his own needs; and, really, I feel that in many places in this Act you are denigrating, you are militating against that principle, and you are encouraging people to come to the public Treasury and ask for a handout. In other words, this could get as bad as some of the devices in the unemployment insurance fund, and I use that for an analogy. I am told that, every time I suggest something, the legislative counsel, as if it was the great pinnacle of all intelligence in the world, has written this statute and God is in his heaven and all is right with the world.

As a lawyer I know that hundreds of thousands of dollars are spent in legal fees in taking statutes of this government to the courts—indeed, to the Supreme Court of Canada, some of them—in order to get a final ruling on the meaning of the statutes. So I know the statutes are not as perfect as we are led to believe, yet I am put in the position of being some kind of maverick who is attacking, personally, the legislative counsel in their august robes of silk and Queen's counsel collars when, in fact, I am not. I am just pleading for a bit of rationality and an admission that this statute is really not perfect.

We have seen tonight the inflexibility of the hon. Minister of Health; he will not allow a comma to be changed; he defends the statute as if it were a matter of life and death, and his reputation, and what posterity will think about him. All I have to say is that, if the Lord preserves me for a further 40 years, I know the hon. Minister of Health will not rank with Sir William Osler or Sir Frederick Banting for having moved this statute through this House. His name will not be inscribed on any statue, because it is not really a great social advance; so I would ask the hon. Minister to reserve that section and see if there might not be a possibility of writing it in such a way so that it will obviate the possible vices I have outlined.

Mr. Whicher: Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the hon. Minister if the commission would consider helping a man pay his premiums when, say, he and his wife are perhaps 66 or 67 years of age and have retired to a small town with $50,000 in bonds and their house paid for, and who have a summer cottage and drive a nice automobile, and whose entire income is derived from the $50,000 in bonds—which comes to $2,500 a year? According to the proposed regulations, this man and his wife would get absolutely free medical service under the proposed regulations. Is this correct?

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Mr. Chairman, this is correct, if they are not subject to income tax. This was the only definitive way we could devise to get away from, and I quote, “the iniquitous means test.” I would like to say to the hon. member for Sudbury that I am not placing responsibility for this section on the legislative counsel, although they couched the entire Act in proper legal language. I shall not give them responsibility for the bill, nor for the substance of the Act, but they did write the language and, of course, I accepted it. I am quite certain, Mr. Chairman, that they would be the last to claim that their work was perfect.

However, I recognize much validity in what the hon. member said and, for a moment or two, it was rather refreshing to hear him talk good, sound, deep common-sense. However, we recognize, too, that there will be those who apply for assistance who probably might not deserve it. Again, fortunately, it is not my responsibility to decide merit. If the person needs it for any one of a host of reasons, the Act states that he shall get the help. Each case will be dealt with separately. I can visualize, too, the possibility of large numbers of applicants at certain times of the year; and it would be my judgment that, at these times, it would be easier for the council to deal with them because of the large numbers coming in. It is the sporadic ones which come in now and again—as my hon. friend from Yorkview, I believe it was, suggested—when the council might not be meeting, and the machinery to deal with those promptly and expeditiously, which might cause us trouble.

The director of the division will, of course, get all the facts. He will have them all well marshalled and the case thoroughly prepared to submit to the council for consideration and decision. And I can assure this House, sir, that we will make every effort to see to it that the administrative machinery is such that it can move rapidly and expeditiously.

Mr. Young: Mr. Chairman, the eloquence of the hon. member for Sudbury raised another question here along the same line—an extension of what he was saying. He pointed out that at certain times of the year there would be a great flood of applications coming in, and we can understand that. This may mean that the council itself would have to be a full-time body, and would have to be operating 12 months of the year. Certainly there will be periods—the enrolment periods—when the large batch of applications will come. But all through the year there is bound to be a steady flow; then, at various periods, as certain industries are closing, you will get a big group coming at that time. This may well mean that the council has to be put on pretty well a full-time basis. I wonder if the hon. Minister has any advice to offer in this regard? The council, I suppose, will be paid and you will demand pretty well full-time work of it. I am wondering just what the plans of the hon. Minister are in that respect.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Mr. Chairman, we do not visualize the council being employed full time. It will have nothing to do with the routine applications coming in. They will be dealt with as routine matters by the director of the division. The council has nothing to do with them. They will be dealt with according to the terms of the legislation. It is the unusual cases—such as the unemployed person, or the person referred to by the hon. leader of the Opposition, who happens to have been caught, for reasons quite beyond his control, and finds himself without coverage—which will demand and require special consideration. The council will deal with these, but the routine applicant will not go through the council at all. He will go directly to the director.

Mr. Young: Does the hon. Minister then consider that the applications will be coming in this way—as a flood at certain times, as certain industries close; and that the routine ones will be coming in between the registration periods; and that the council can deal with these on a part-time basis?

Hon. Mr. Dymond: This would be our expectation; but again we will have to be guided by experience.

Mr. Sopha: Well, I can see what is going to happen now, and I just want to say, by way of interpolation, that on Saturday I have been invited to address a medical convention in my home town. They gave me the topic, “The advantages of a government-operated, universal, comprehensive scheme of medical care insurance.” They asked me to speak on that topic. They gave me only 40 minutes; I do not know how I am going to be able to compress it all into that limited time.

But what is going to happen is that a member like myself—and I can say this, there are not many of the press here—who has an office downtown, is going to be flooded with people. They say that too many lawyers are in politics. The advantage of a lawyer-member is that he has an office where they can find him. They will be coming in and will say, “I have applied for partial assistance for my medical care insurance and I have been refused. John Smith, down the street, he gets it and he makes $2,000 a year more than I do.”

We really will be the ombudsmen that my friend from Downsview (Mr. Singer) was speaking about today.

I can see myself a year from now, sir, I will come back here and say, “I was correct.” I will be engaged in a veritable deluge of correspondence with this medical insurance council, about refusal of assistance to people in their medical care premiums. I rue that, because already I am a branch of the workmen’s compensation board, without pay and without reward and without thanks, as far as I can see. They refused to set up an office in my community and I see hundreds of people a year who have problems with workmen’s compensation. Here you are adding another problem to members who are already pressed with problems. I listened to that nonsense from the hon. Minister of Lands and Forests today about the duties of a member.

Mr. Chairman: All those in favour of the amendment of the hon. member for Riverdale say “aye.”

All opposed say “nay.”

In my opinion the “nays” have it.

Section 7 agreed to.

Sections 8 to 10, inclusive, agreed to.

On section 11:

Mr. Sopha: How will the superintendent know whether the carrier is or is not operating in the public interest? I mean is this corporation the agent to inform him?

Hon. Mr. Dymond: It might well be, Mr. Chairman. The complaint may come from us directly, from The Department of Health. It may come from subscribers. It may come from the profession, from any source. A complaint may come to the superintendent or to the department from any source, and if in our judgment the complaint is such that it merits being drawn to the attention of the superintendent of insurance, it will be his responsibility to act upon it. Information may come to him per se, out of his own involvement with the insurance carrier. I do not know just how much, or how close involvement they have, but the information may come from any one of a number of sources.

Mr. Sopha: Well, why did you not give more disciplinary powers to the corporation to regulate the people first?

Hon. Mr. Dymond: They have got them.

Mr. Sopha: It says "pass bylaws governing the qualification, classification and regulation of its members" in section (c).

Hon. Mr. Dymond: The regulations deal with any matter relating to its technical operation.

Mr. Sopha: Would that include disciplinary powers?

Hon. Mr. Dymond: I do not know that this was specifically talked of, but I would take it, from my interpretation of this clause, that this could well lie within the sphere of their influence.

Mr. Thompson: My question, through you, sir, to the hon. Minister, is really tied to section 9, but it is still the same thing. I am wondering, under section 9 (3) and then section 10, whether you might have a situation where there were areas in the province where you would not be able to buy this standard contract from any carrier. If you read 9 (3), it says "a licensed carrier," notwithstanding subsection (1). I will not bother reading it. The hon. Minister, I imagine, is thoroughly informed about it. My point is that you might get a limitation of coverage to people in some particular region. Have you considered that the people would not have a choice?

Hon. Mr. Dymond: We have not specifically considered this, Mr. Chairman, because we believe that the province is well covered by carriers of both kinds, the non-profit plans and the indemnity carriers. There are again, a large number operating and applications can be submitted by mail. They too will carry on, I would expect, a very vigorous programme of advertising, just as the government will and I would think that surely some application forms, through newspapers, magazines, or the various other media of communication would reach almost every part of the province. Failing this, of course—again making use of community authorities, municipal authorities and all others most likely to come in contact with people—I think that most of the people can be well advised of what is available to them.

Mr. Sopha: I quarrel with subsection 2 because I am not satisfied, in all deference to legislative counsel, that those six lines they have used, which they could have compressed into three lines—I am not satisfied that the judge of the high court may deal with the case on its merits. I am afraid that language may be construed by a judge of the high court to mean that the onus is upon the appellant to show him that there was a denial of natural justice in the cancellation of the licence. I wish the language were clear, that they may have a review in the high court, on such an issue that the trial judge reviews the case on its merits and has the prerogative to substitute his own judgment for that of the superintendent. The verbiage used is obscure. We have that type of statute. One that comes readily to mind is The Funeral Directors Act and the appeal from that board from that Act—I know because I have had experience before them—is that the appellant has to show on the face of the transcript of evidence, some error, some denial of natural justice. Then we go to the other extreme, where there is no appeal at all.

This seems to me to be somewhere in the middle, and I particularly question those words, "who upon cause shown may make an order directing the superintendent." I am afraid that a judge of the high court is going to say, "You have to show me where this body went wrong, where the superintendent went wrong, where he was guilty of a denial of natural justice." I wish the language said, "Who may review the decision upon its merits and may make such order as he deems proper."

I ask the hon. Minister of Health, will he go back to the legal advisers and ask them if that might not be an employment of better verbiage, if that is what he wants?

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if the hon. member's objection is not covered by the last two words: "or may make such other order as he deems proper." As a layman quite ignorant of the law, it would seem to me that this would give the judge the right and authority to make any order, or to render any decision he chose. However, I must admit some ignorance.

Mr. Sopha: In interpreting that conjunctively with "who upon cause shown." and the judge is saying to counsel that "you have to show me before I can make another order, a denial of natural justice," I think that this is not an appeal on the merits at all. What I am getting at is that I want the judge in the high court to have the prerogative to hear the case on the facts and to substitute without any restraint at all, his decision for that of the superintendent. After all, in the case of a cancellation of a licence, it has been many times said that a judge sitting in court is just as qualified to render a decision with regard to cancellations, as a bureaucrat, an administrative official. There is no difference between them. If that is what is meant, I am merely pleading that the language make it clear.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Mr. Chairman, would the hon. member grant me this, that we pass this now and I shall undertake to have this thoroughly screened, bearing in mind the suggestions he has made? I am quite incompetent to argue this because this sounds to me like a purely legal matter, quite beyond my ability.

Mr. Sopha: I am flexible, but my friend, the hon. member for Downsview is recalcitrant.

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): Mr. Chairman, I am disturbed by this section. We have suddenly again discovered the superintendent of insurance.

Now, I do not know if the hon. Minister of Health was here when we debated the estimates of the hon. Attorney General (Mr. Wishart), but some of us have been pretty unhappy about the conduct of that office over many years. We do not think it has been anything more than a rubber stamp. There has never been any power given to that office to control anything, there has been no power to fix rates. There has been no real investigative power given to that branch, and suddenly the superintendent of insurance is being given power to suspend or cancel licences if a carrier is not operating in the public interest.

It occurs to me, and it worries me very much, it occurs to me that the superintendent is suddenly going to be given a type of responsibility that he has never had before. He probably does not have a staff to investigate in relation to the matters which are going to come to his concern and he is being given really no terms of reference. What he may think is not in the public interest may be that they do not use the right colour stationery, they might not have the proper offices, they may have their policy printed on too many pages. Who knows what is in the public interest?

I would like to know from the hon. Minister of Health what investigations or what liaison he had with his colleague, the hon. Attorney General, insofar as the use of the superintendent of insurance in this regard before this section was written into his Act. That is point number one.

The second point is: What is meant by "in the public interest"? Surely if you are giving, again to a nameless, faceless civil servant—and let us face it, that is what he is, he is not someone whom we can identify here as we can identify my hon. friend, the Minister of Health, and my hon. friend, the Attorney General, he is a civil servant who is tucked away somewhere in the back offices, called the superintendent. You are saying, "Mr. Superintendent, is this or is this not in the public interest?" What does the hon. Minister mean by the public interest? What does the carrier mean?

Let us be fair to these carriers. Is the carrier suddenly going to be faced with the sort of decision that we see from the liquor licence board: "Your licence is refused for good and abundant reasons; yours very truly, signed, chairman." Or: "Your licence Mr. Carrier, is suspended because it is not in the public interest that you carry on any longer." Or is there going to be some compulsion upon the superintendent to say: "It is not in the public interest because you are not paying your claims or because you are breaking a statute"; or because you are doing something? I get very worried, and I think we should all concern ourselves very seriously, with giving powers to civil servants over whom the Legislature has no control, powers to take people out of business for a matter that is or is not in the public interest.

What does the hon. Minister mean by saying, "It is in the public interest"?

Second, and equally important, the point that I mentioned first: What new arrangements have been made to improve the office of the superintendent of insurance so that he will be able to cope with this? On the past record of performance of that office, I am not satisfied it can cope at all.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Mr. Chairman, I may say that we had liaison with The Department of the Attorney General through the superintendent of insurance, who represented the hon. Attorney General in all our discussions and deliberations in the preparation of this bill.

Again, I cannot argue too vigorously with my hon. friend because some of these things are points of law with which again, I repeat, it is quite beyond my power to cope. But I believe—I am just checking this now—I believe that the superintendent has power to cancel licences already inherent in the law that he administers. However, I will get this verified. Then, of course, in subsection 2, the company or corporation whose licence has been cancelled does have an appeal to the supreme court, although the hon. member for Sudbury has raised some questions which are obviously in his mind concerning that section.

What is in the public interest? The first thing that I can think of is that, if a carrier licensed under this Act should say to the subscriber, "I cannot sell you a standard contract," this, of course, is completely and diametrically contrary to the Act. Or if he should do certain things that he is not allowed to do; if, for instance, he should write something into the standard contract which is completely forbidden. He must not bring anything into the standard contract. He can sell whatever additional provisions he cares to, but they must be attached as riders and not written into the contract.

Mr. Singer: I am with my hon. friend up to that point. If the carrier is in obvious breach of the statute, there should be power, that is fine.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: These are the things that we are most concerned about being not in the public interest.

Mr. Singer: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: I have just been given The Insurance Act, chapter 190, section 10:

The duty of determining the right of any insurer in Ontario to be licensed under this Act, devolves upon the superintendent, subject to appeal as hereinafter provided, but nothing in this section affects the right of the Lieutenant-Governor in Council or the Minister to suspend or cancel any licence in the exercise of his authority under this Act.

Apparently the power to cancel rests with the Minister, who in this case would be the Attorney General.

Mr. Singer: "In the exercise of his authority under this Act"; I did not hear the words, "if they deem it in the public interest."

"The authority under the Act," and that is a very different thing than being what somebody believes, particularly the superintendent believes, is in the public interest; very different.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: The appeal as laid down:

The applicant for licence who deems himself aggrieved by the decision of the superintendent may appeal therefrom to the court of appeal.

Not to the supreme court.

The practice and procedure upon and in relation to the appeal shall be the same as from an appeal from a judgment of a judge of the supreme court in an action.

Mr. Singer: Could I interrupt my hon. friend at that point? Perhaps I am getting a little too technical and legal, but if I could address my remarks to the hon. Attorney General.

At this point it seems to me, and the hon. Minister of Health just read the section, it seems to me that the power to revoke lies not with the superintendent but lies with the Lieutenant-Governor in Council, who is at least politically responsible and the superintendent is not. It lies with the Lieutenant-Governor in Council to the extent of powers given in the Act.

I am open to correction, but I do not think the words, "in the public interest," are a part of the contemplation of the terms of The Insurance Act. This is where I get very concerned about it, because you are doing two things that are very different. You are giving the power to cancel to the superintendent, who is a civil servant, not to the Lieutenant-Governor in Council, who is at least politically responsible. You are using the words, "in the public interest," which I do not think are in The Insurance Act. If I am wrong in that, perhaps my friend, the hon. Attorney General could elucidate.

Hon. A. A. Wishart (Attorney General): Mr. Chairman, I would like first of all to support the hon. Minister of Health in his explanation and to confirm that the Act was reviewed by the superintendent of insurance. I personally had the opportunity to scan it, of course, when it was being considered as legislation and I was aware of the clause which we are discussing, section 10.

I think the hon. Minister very capably defined what might be a definition of what is in the public interest or what is not in the public interest. It came rather as a surprise to me to hear the hon. member for Downsview complaining about the power being given to superintendents. If I recall the tenor of his remarks not too long ago, he was complaining that the superintendent of insurance did not have power enough in our Insurance Act.

Mr. Singer: If he is going to have any power, he is going to have power to fix rates.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: It is true that the superintendent of insurance under this Act may cancel the licence of the carrier of the insurance. There is an appeal, as the section reads:

—to the supreme court which may direct and may, upon cause, make an order directing the superintendent to remove the suspension or withdraw the cancellation.

I would simply say that while there is ministerial responsibility in The Insurance Act and different procedures here, there is ample safeguard and this, I think, makes for an administrative procedure which does not need, when there is this safeguard, to come up to the Minister to be dealt with in that situation.

Mr. Sopha: Mr. Chairman, may I ask the hon. gentleman why there should not be a further appeal to the court of appeal? Supposing an insurance company had $3 million in premiums; it is a pretty serious thing for them to have their licence cancelled. Why should they not have the right to appeal to the court of appeal? Why should they be at the whim of a judge whose wife, perhaps, shouted at him as he was going out the door in the morning and he was in no mood to listen to the pleas of counsel? He says that he does not want to be bothered with this and affirms the order of the superintendent. Why should they be stopped short at the door of the court of appeal? I have been in court sometimes when I have said to the judge, "I can appeal to the court of appeal"; and they are offended because I say it. I said to one recently, "The court of appeal is a respectable body; what is wrong with my saying I will go to the court of appeal? I will be in good company with them." What is the fear of legislative counsel of the court of appeal? Why do they deny access to the court? Those judges get paid $25,000 a year and the chief justice gets more, to hear cases, and I cannot think of anything more serious than the cancellation of a licence of an insurance company that has $2 million or $3 million of premiums in force, to bring to the court of appeal and, indeed, right on to the top—to the Supreme Court of Canada. It is serious enough. Why wrap it up in this obscurantism, of "cause being shown." If I were writing this—I will be presumptuous—if I were writing this, subsection 2 would say this:

Any carrier whose licence under this Act is suspended, may appeal from the suspension to the court of appeal.

In the criminal code, as my hon. friend said, an accused person who is convicted has the right of appeal to the court of appeal. It does not say what the court of appeal has to do; it does not say that cause has to be shown or stipulate any of the conditions for granting relief. It just says, "may appeal to the court of appeal" against his conviction. That would be the simple language that I would employ here: "—may appeal therefrom to the court of appeal." We do not, as my hon. friend knows, have to stipulate the Supreme Court of Canada, because there are provisions for an appeal from the court of appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada. I would not deny these insurance companies—somebody will get the impression that we are against insurance companies, when we are not.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Mr. Chairman, this is an interesting discussion. However, I think the time has come when we might rise. We will consider this question. The point the hon. member has made will be considered in order that we may examine this section and see whether it really does achieve what we want. I notice that it has been carefully drawn, and despite the thought of the hon. member for Sudbury that there are individual judges who with any degree of regularity at all, would be affected in their judgment by what their wives said to them when they left the house—if we were to adopt that argument I do not know where we would ever have a final court of appeal. Inevitably one must go to a man—unless we could build a computer—who would not be affected. However, we will commence with section 10 when we resume this discussion.

I move that the committee rise and report that it has come to certain resolutions and ask for leave to sit again.

Motion agreed to.

The House resumed; Mr. Speaker in the chair.

Mr. Chairman: Mr. Speaker, the committee of the whole House begs to report progress and asks for leave to sit again.

Report agreed to.

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we will resume the discussion of this bill, and in the afternoon we will deal with the estimates of The Department of Health.

Hon. Mr. Robarts moves the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to.

Motions.

Introduction of bills.

Mr. W. G. Noden (Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day, I want to thank you for permission to bring to the attention of the hon. members of this House, a national educational award that was granted last Friday in Ottawa.

The Henry Marshall Tory award was presented by the Canadian association for adult education at its annual meeting to the Quetico conference and training centre, a residential adult education centre in north-western Ontario. The Quetico centre is at Kawene, 100 miles west of the Lakehead, near the entrance of Quetico provincial park.

The Tory award is presented to organizations in recognition of distinguished achievement in adult education in Canada. It is awarded in honour of Dr. Tory, a founder of four Canadian universities and the first full-time director of the national research council. The award is the first one to be granted during the past three years.

The Quetico centre is dedicated to the economic and cultural growth of northwestern Ontario. Its programme includes courses for management, officers of community and labour organizations, artists, craftsmen, the unemployed and Indians. Thank you.

Hon. J. W. Spooner (Minister of Municipal Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I ask your permission and the indulgence of hon. members to make an announcement of considerable interest to the municipalities and their ratepayers located in the eastern Niagara region, more specifically in the counties of Lincoln and Welland. The hon. members of the Legislature will recall that some weeks ago, while introducing the estimates of The Department of Municipal Affairs, I announced that the department hoped to undertake a series of comprehensive studies of municipal and intermunicipal problems and relationships in certain sections of the province, which have been experiencing during the past few years extensive urban growth and development where there appeared to be a growing concern with the complexity and urgency of the resulting municipal problems, and, more particularly, the basic question whether the existing structure of local government in these areas could be expected to deal adequately with both present and future needs.

One of the regions then mentioned was the eastern Niagara region where, within the counties of Lincoln and Welland, there are now three rapidly growing cities of St. Catharines, Niagara Falls and Welland, with the town of Port Colborne due to be elevated to the status of a city on January 1, 1966, together with five other towns, three villages and 14 townships and the two administrative counties, with a total population of about 300,000 people. Some two years ago these municipalities, in recognition of growing concern with the problems that I have mentioned, formed an intermunicipal research committee, which resulted in the production by Dr. Henry Mayo, senior professor of political science at the University of Western Ontario, of a preliminary report strongly recommending the undertaking of a full-scale review of municipal and intermunicipal relationships in this important section of the province, which would be of great assistance to both the municipalities and the government of the province in the consideration of any possible changes in the existing structure.

As a result of a number of meetings and consultations with representatives of all the municipalities in the area, including a meeting over which I presided in Niagara Falls on April 28, 1965—which was attended by representatives of nearly all the municipalities concerned—I am now satisfied that there is widespread local support for the undertaking and that a decision to go ahead with the project is now justified. I am glad to be able to announce that I have been able to secure the services of Dr. Mayo, himself, as chief commissioner, and I propose to appoint as assistant commissioner, Mr. C. Frank Moore, QC, a veteran municipal lawyer, who, owing to his experience at one time as Crown attorney for the county of York, subsequently, as the head of the legal department of the township of North York and as solicitor for the municipality of Metropolitan Toronto until his retirement in 1963, is highly qualified, in my opinion, to make a substantial contribution, in the light of his legal knowledge and administrative experience, to the work of the commission.

Professor Mayo is the author of various books, including, An Introduction to Democratic Theory, published by the Oxford University Press, New York, 1961. He has written many articles on local government and in 1955 and 1956 was the technical advisor to the Royal commission on metropolitan development in Alberta. He was also a member of the Canadian council on urban and regional research. Dr. Mayo already has a substantial knowledge of the specific problems of this particular area and has made many valuable contributions in his speeches and articles to an understanding of what may be called regional government problems of the type which appear to be developing in this and other areas of the province.

The commission will be assisted by an adequate research staff, specially assigned to the project, headed by Mr. F. H. Finnis, MBE, who served for four years as a municipal research associate with the Canadian tax foundation and more recently has acted as research director and secretary of the Royal commission on Metropolitan Toronto.

Both the terms of reference and the procedure to be adopted in the Niagara region review will be similar to those which have been followed with my approval in the Ottawa, Eastview and Carleton county local government review which was organized approximately a year ago and is expected to complete its work and bring in a report in the near future.

The commission will also work in close co-operation with the existing Niagara peninsula intermunicipal committee which was, to a large extent, responsible for the stimulation of local interest in the project. This committee comprises one representative from each of the two county councils and one representative from each of the three cities. The arrangements for meeting the cost of the project will be similar to those made in the Ottawa and Carleton county review, under which the total cost will be temporarily financed by The Department of Municipal Affairs, and at the conclusion of the survey the municipalities will be required to reimburse the province for 50 per cent of the cost, which amount they will share among themselves in any manner they may consider equitable.

It is estimated that on the basis of the experience gained in the Ottawa and Carleton county review, the proposed review will be completed by the end of August, 1966.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Clerk of the House: The 47th order. The committee of the whole House; Mr. A. W. Downer in the chair.

MEDICAL SERVICES INSURANCE (continued)

On section 10:

Mr. E. W. Sopha (Sudbury): Mr. Chairman, I wonder if the hon. Attorney General (Mr. Wishart) has had an opportunity to consider overnight, or with the morning coffee, our suggestion to amend this section?

Hon. A. A. Wishart (Attorney General): Mr. Chairman, in respect to section 10, when the debate was adjourned yesterday the question had been raised in the matter of appeal by the hon. member for Sudbury. The hon. member for Downsview (Mr. Singer), I believe, was somewhat concerned with the use of the expression "in the public interest."

I was actually prepared to answer the concern of the hon. member at the time, when the debate adjourned. I would like to deal with it now, if I might.

On the question of appeal, which was raised by the hon. member for Sudbury: I think I should draw his attention to the Act on the statutes of Ontario known as The Judges' Orders Enforcement Act, which is chapter 196 of the Revised Statutes of Ontario. That statute provides in section 3—that is the last section in the Act, incidentally:

An appeal lies from an order made by a judge as persona designata to the court of appeal.

—and the section proceeds:

(a) if the right of appeal is given by the statute under which the judge acted—that does not apply here:

or (b) if no such right of appeal is given, then by leave of the judge who made the order, or by leave of the court of appeal.

—so that The Judges' Orders Enforcement Act does provide for a right of appeal where the original appeal is to a judge as persona designata, by leave of the judge or by leave of the court of appeal.

My submission is that in section 10 of Bill 136 the designation there is to a judge of the supreme court, I would submit that is persona designata. If there is any question on the opinion that it is not an appeal to a judge as persona designata, then I would refer the hon. member to The Judicature Act and to section 26 thereof, which reads:

Except where it is otherwise provided by statute, subject to the rules regulating the terms and conditions on which appeals may be brought, an appeal lies to the court of appeal from any judgment, order or decision of a judge of the high court in chambers that finally disposes of any cause or matter.

So, on the one hand, if it is persona designata you have The Judges' Orders Enforcement Act; on the other hand, if it is not, and the hon. member feels it is not, then he has section 26 of The Judicature Act, which provides a right of appeal.

I think that should effectively dispose of any concern that there is not the fullest right of being able to carry the matter on up to the highest court in the land.

On the question of public interest, I wish the hon. member for Downsview were here. I think I should say to him that this is the formula, this is the language, which we use now in numerous Acts; that expression is a very common one. I should just like to make reference to it in a number of cases.

The Private Investigators Act, in section 14—these are Acts which have been passed by this Legislature and most of them fairly recently—says:

The registrar may, after giving the licensee an opportunity to be heard, suspend or cancel licence where, in the opinion of the registrar to do so is in the public interest.

That is The Private Investigators Act, the recent one.

Again in section 8:

The registrar shall issue a licence or renewal of a licence where, in the opinion of the registrar, the proposed licensing is not against the public interest.

Another use of the same expression.

The Collection Agencies Act, which was debated by the members of this Legislature, and I am sure the hon. member for Downsview took part in that debate, says in section 4:

The registrar may, after giving the licensee an opportunity to be heard, suspend or cancel licence where in the opinion a term or condition upon which the licence was granted or where in his opinion to do so is in the public interest.

Actually, we use the term "in the public interest" and also the expression "in his opinion."

In The Mortgage Brokers Registration Act, in section 3:

Sec. 3, ss 5: The registrar shall grant registration or renewal of registration to an applicant where the proposed registration is not against the public interest.

In The Ontario Energy Board Act, section 39:

Where, after the hearing, the board is of the opinion that the construction of the proposed line or station is in the public interest, it may make an order granting leave to construct the line or station.

The Real Estate and Business Brokers Act, section 5 (7):

The registrar may, after giving the registrant an opportunity to be heard, suspend or cancel a registration for the breach or term of condition on which the registration was granted, or where in his opinion to do so is in the public interest.

In The Securities Act, and this, I think, shall be my last example. Section 6:

The director, after giving the registrant an opportunity to be heard, shall suspend or cancel any registration where in his opinion such action is in the public interest. But where the granting of an opportunity to be heard would in his opinion be prejudicial to the public interest, he may suspend any registration, etc.

The expression is used twice in the same section: "prejudicial to the public interest" and "in the public interest."

Mr. Sopha: But we had to suspend the director.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: One final example: The Used Car Dealers Act, section 4:

The registrar may grant registration or renewal of registration to an applicant where the proposed registration is not against the public interest.

Now all these Acts are fairly recent.

The hon. member who raised the point surely, if he is not aware, should have been aware; and I am sure he perused these Acts carefully. I merely take this occasion to point out that it is an expression that has been used frequently in much of our recent legislation, and I think that surely he must have had his tongue in his cheek when he took the time of the House to debate the meaning of the expression, "in the public interest."

I might further say, with respect to section 10, that the language of section 10, subsection 2, is almost word for word with the language of section 11 of The Nurses Act, which is chapter 90 of the Statutes of Ontario, 1961-62. If you look at section 10 of the bill which is before you, Bill 136, and subsection 2 thereof, you might compare it with this language which is section 11 of The Nurses Act:

If the council refuses or neglects to register a person, a person aggrieved may apply—and this is the language that is so similar:

—to a judge of the supreme court who, upon due cause shown, may make an order directing the council to grant the registration, renew the registration, remove the suspension or withdraw the cancellation, as the case may be, or may make such other order as is warranted by the fact—

You will see that the language is very similar to that of subsection 2 of section 10; again I simply point out that this is an Act, The Nurses Act, on our statute books, using language which is on all-fours with that of section 10, subsection 2, of the bill under discussion.

I trust that will clear up the points which have been raised. I think, therefore, that no amendment should be necessary to section 10.

Mr. Sopha: I would ask your indulgence, Mr. Chairman, to make an additional comment. I did not raise anything about the public interest, or ask for the definition of it, which I know to be a common enough expression in the statutes. What I am concerned about is this matter of appeals. It does appear to me, and I am convinced beyond all peradventure, that the law officers of the Crown have so got their backs up about the criticism coming from the Opposition that they have become absolutely inflexible about any change. Remarkably, the hon. Attorney General gets up this morning and tells us that there are two possible interpretations to subsection 2; that to me is deliberate obscurantism. That is inviting litigation, inviting arguments by people who have to make use of this section.

I take it that one will argue that a supreme court judge is persona designata, though I always thought that one of the characteristics of a person acting persona designata, was the use of the article, "the." When they say "the county court judge," he is an identifiable person. There is only one person who can fit that description, "the county court judge." When you say you use the indefinite article, the "supreme court judge," then you are referring to, I think it is, 24 people—the chief justice and the 23 puisne judges. Accordingly it is not held to be persona designata.

The hon. Attorney General, having dealt with that branch, refers to The Judicature Act and the section with which I am, and have been, familiar, and says that an appeal may lie from a judge in chambers. How do I know that, in the first application that is brought under this section, the person sitting in chambers will not take the position that it is a matter that ought to come on in weekly court? And accordingly, if it is to be heard in weekly court, then that section of The Judicature Act does not apply.

If the hon. Attorney General, to measure him by his words, is concerned about granting an appeal to the court of appeal from the order of the superintendent, then why not say so in simple language? Why not go directly to the court of appeal? It is sufficiently serious to exercise the talents of three men instead of one, and the hon. Attorney General well knows that if this comes on in chambers or in weekly court, the applicant is faced with perhaps a morning or a day in which 20, 30 or 40 other matters are being dealt with in chambers or in weekly court.

It becomes questionable therefore, whether the judge sitting in chambers or in weekly court has the time to apply himself to the serious problems that might arise under this subsection.

All we are asking for over here are two things, commonsense and justice. I think it is eminently good commonsense that such a serious exercise of powers as is granted by this Legislature to the superintendent ought to be reviewed promptly by judges in the highest court of judicature in Ontario, that is to say, the court of appeal.

I have become aware over the last few years that the civil service, the bureaucracy, does not like the courts. This government, and the bureaucracy which serves it, show evidence that they want to keep away from the courts. They are not married to the idea of granting easy appeals to the courts. They do not like to be in the courts. Indeed, in the last few years in the legal bills committee we have seen example after example of statutes coming in, the stimulus coming from the bureaucracy, to give them the privilege of not appearing in the courts as witnesses. They do not even like to go, and we have seen this phase come in that they cannot be subpoenaed as witnesses and produce any documents unless the Minister gives his permission. The McRuer commission is hearing representations from many sectors about easy appeals, and almost all of the representations to the commission say that there ought to be easy appeals to the courts from the administrative decisions, except in respect of two or three boards—the labour relations board and the workmen's compensation board are two of the ones most frequently mentioned.

I really question that the hon. Attorney General, the chief law officer of the Crown in the province, should get up and deliberately point to obscure language in a subsection of an Act that this Legislature is asked to pass. We are the lawmakers. You would not know it, that the 108 that sit here, are the lawmakers and our word is final. There is no body superior to us in this province. We are not, and I emphasize—at least I am not, and I speak for myself; I am not subject to the whims of the law officers of the Crown.

I have my democratic rights, and indeed they are of very high order. Having been sent here by 80,000 people, I have my right to make my observations about what this supreme law-making body should do and what it should state in the statutes of this province. I regret that the chief law officer of the Crown gets up in this House and points to a section, makes an explanation, which invites litigation and expense and inconvenience and annoyance and frustration in regard to the interpretation of a simple principle. If you believe in appeal, then say so. Put it in two lines, instead of putting it in six. If you want an appeal on the merits, say so. Do not use obscure language, like "upon cause shown." I do not even know what that means.

If a client came in to me, the president of Excelsior Life Insurance, if there is such a company, and said to me: "Sophia what does that mean?" I would have to tell him: "Well, it may mean this and may mean a second thing, and it may mean a third thing. It will depend who we get in weekly court."

I would have to tell him if we got Mr. Justice Gale, the chief justice of the high court, then he would be of a temperament, because he has shown it, that he would be willing to review the exercise of discretion of the superintendent most readily. That is Mr. Justice Gale's intellectual predilection. He believes in reviewing the bureaucracy. But I would have to tell him, if we got Mr. Justice X, and I will not give a name, he would be most reluctant to review it. He might say to us, you have to show me some place where there is a flagrant miscarriage of justice here.

You have to show me where the superintendent went wrong. You have to show a bias on his part. You have to show a failure to adjudicate on the issue.

Of course, you are unable to do it. You cannot do it. You do not know the considerations upon which the superintendent decided, because he does not say so. He does not have to say so, this statute does not make him say so.

As I say, I do not know what those words mean; but I say finally, if you want a review on the merits of the decision, that is to say, the taking of evidence afresh, then say so in the statute and give a free rein to the judge in the high court, though I interpolate that I would not even allow the appeal to the judge of the high court. I would go directly to the court of appeal, as we do from the municipal board. The municipal board decides many weighty and important matters. We do not fool around with a puisne judge of the high court. We go directly from the municipal board to the court of appeal. Why not here?

Say a company has $7 million in premiums in force. Along comes the superintendent and says, you are out of business. It is going to end up in the Supreme Court of Canada anyway. Why have the intermediate step of the judge of the high court dealing with it? Why not save a little time and money and effort on the part of counsel and the executives of the insurance company and go directly to the court of appeal? That is my brief.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, I must suggest that the hon. member seems inclined to misinterpret any statements that are made for clarification of this section. What I was trying to point out to the House was that there was ample provision for appeal, either under The Judges' Orders Enforcement Act or under The Judicature Act, either way that one might care to move.

I do not like to refer to a judge of the supreme court as a puisne judge of the supreme court. I think the judges of the supreme court are not deserving of that adjective.

Mr. Sopha: Well, it is a term of—I spelled it out, puisne.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Oh, I thought you were calling—

Mr. Sopha: No, puisne, referring to a judge.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I must apologize to the hon. member. I guess your pronunciation and mine—

Mr. S. Lewis (Scarborough West): How do you pronounce it?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Well, he pronounces it correctly now. However, the point I would like to make is that you can go on to the court of appeal, and I shall try to be brief, Mr. Chairman, a judge of the supreme court—if I might get the hon. member's attention, too, as well as that of the House, Mr. Chairman.

Not every case would go to the court of appeal and to suggest that such would happen is straining certainty and making a situation which I think is unlikely to occur. If the judge of the supreme court should declare the cancellation to be wrongful that, I would think, would put an end to it. I doubt if the superintendent would appeal every case to the court of appeal. I reject the suggestion that the section should provide for an appeal immediately to the court of appeal. There are some statutes which do so, but I think in a situation of this kind the appeal to the judge of the supreme court and having made it amply clear that you can go on to the court of appeal should surely be sufficient.

I would like to refer again to section 11 of The Nurses Act which perhaps is not of the same stature as the question of the cancellation of the licence of an insurance carrier, but the language is:

—the person may apply to a judge of the supreme court who, upon due cause shown—

Now surely that language is not so difficult to understand; that if an appealing person shows cause, as the language is used here, they make an order for the registration to be restored, and so on.

I cannot think of any more simple, straightforward, quick procedure for allowing a person to reach a review of a superintendent's decision than is laid down in section 10 of this Act.

Section 10 agreed to.

On section 11:

Mr. A. E. Thompson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Chairman, under section 11, I would be very interested to hear why the hon. Minister of Health (Mr. Dymond) decided on $100.

I was inquiring from one of my colleagues who is learned in the law as to what kind of people would get a fine of $100 and for what kind of crime. I was informed that some poor soul who went out and lifted a can of fish from a store could come up before the court and could be fined $100; for impaired driving the fine could be $100—no matter what your financial situation is—and when you think of the enormous wealth through the profits that some of these carriers have been making, with their 28 per cent retention fee, I question, sir, who decided on the $100? Could the hon. Minister tell us who raised this as the maximum—why should it not be $500?

Hon. M. B. Dymond (Minister of Health): Mr. Chairman, I cannot tell exactly who suggested it, but I presume it was the law officers who were guiding us in drawing this Act. I would draw your attention, sir, to the fact that this is $100 per day for each day on which the carrier continues to carry on business. In addition to this, I am quite certain that this is a case where the superintendent of insurance would decide that this carrier was not acting in the public interest and he would very promptly lose his licence, which is about the most severe penalty that could be imposed upon him.

Mr. Thompson: To follow up on this, Mr. Chairman, if he loses his licence, what becomes the situation for all the people who have paid premiums in order that they might be provided with coverage?

Hon. Mr. Dymond: This is covered in another section of the Act. They must be advised of their rights under the Act to transfer to another carrier and they must be refunded pro rata, the premium that they have been charged.

Section 11 agreed to.

On section 12:

Mr. Sopha: Mr. Chairman, I wonder why this section 12 does not go on to say:

—and the person, servant or agent of the corporation which so refuses shall be liable to a term of imprisonment, of not more than six months.

The Summary Convictions Act provides that your citizen, John Jones, is liable to a maximum fine of, I think, $500 and/or six months' imprisonment. That is to say, he can be both fined and imprisoned. Why a special privilege to corporations? Of course, that harks back to the special place that corporations have had in our society. We must not put the director of a corporation in jail, although I think as a result of the Windfall probe, some are going to find themselves there. But why should they not—if they deliberately refuse when they ought to issue a contract—why should they not go to jail or be liable to go to jail, so that they will read this section and say, "If I refuse to sell a contract to Mary Smith here, I am liable to go to jail"? If an ordinary citizen can go to jail, why not a person acting for a corporation?

Hon. Mr. Dymond: I understand, Mr. Chairman, that it is impossible to put a corporation in jail. I do not know; I would have to depend on the hon. Attorney General to advise us as to whether an officer of a corporation can go to jail, but I would point out that, here again, the stringent penalty is not the $500—and we seriously considered making it $5,000 or $25,000, in the light of the fact that most of these bodies are corporate bodies with large resources. The stringent penalty is that the right to do business can, and would be very likely, taken away from them under those conditions. If a carrier were found to be breaching the law as laid out in section 12, I am quite certain, sir, that I would consider it my responsibility to request the superintendent of insurance to withdraw this corporation's licence.

As far as its relationship to The Summary Convictions Act is concerned, I am afraid I must defer to the hon. Attorney General for an explanation.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, briefly, the hon. member for Sudbury is again stretching language when he says in wild terms that the ordinary citizen goes to jail for this sort of thing. The ordinary citizen does not go to jail for refusing to sell a piece of merchandise or refusing to enter into a contract. An officer or director of a corporation can be put in jail and is put in jail very often, under our jurisprudence, for theft or fraud where citizens are deprived of property or their rights; but refusal to enter into a contract is not a criminal offence in the sense that it calls for a person to lose his freedom and be thrown in jail. The penalty here, I suggest, as the hon. Minister of Health has pointed out, is ample and effective.

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Chairman, one of the reasons why we raise this is because of The Air Pollution Act and the fact that the government is too timid to say toughly and firmly, "Start cleaning up and stop fouling the air." When we asked last year about it, there was one firm, apparently, that had been fined, and I hope that the hon. Minister will indeed mean what he says, that he will indeed be very tough with these people, not only from the point of view of the fine, but far more important from the point of view of cancelling their licences, if this is abused.

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): Mr. Chairman, I am inclined to agree with the representations made by my hon. friends on the Liberal benches, except for one thing and that is that the whole section is just window-dressing anyway. I doubt if there will ever be a charge laid or a conviction registered under the section, as long as this Act is in force—and I hope it will not be for very long.

What is being represented to the public is that all insurance companies must have available standards contracts and standard co-insurance contracts. This is what the bill purports to say.

Anyone who has tried to buy renewable term insurance from a life insurance company that does not feel like selling it, knows how effective such availability is. They all have it available, but they will get their agents to tie you up in knots and take you through long, long harangues about the virtues of some other flossy type of policy with all sorts of fine print, so that the average purchasers will usually give up. Either he will buy what they want to palm off on him or he will try to go somewhere else.

I doubt if a case would ever arise where a prospective purchaser of insurance would get a clear-cut refusal, either in writing or with witnesses present, which I think would be necessary if a charge was going to stand up in court. He would just get the old run-around, if they did not want to sell the standard contract or the standard co-insurance contract. If they would rather promote some other type of contract which mainly confused the issue for the consumer and led him to believe that he was getting benefits which he probably was not getting, they could easily do it, there is nothing in the law that could stop them. Let us forget the myth that this section in the bill will, in fact, require a private carrier to sell one of these contracts if he decides he does not want to sell it. By the time the insurance agent gets through befogging the issue, the prospective customer will not know what has been offered to him or what has been refused.

Section 12 agreed to.

On section 13:

Mr. J. Renwick (Riverdale): Mr. Chairman, I have two comments on section 13, both of them are questions.

Why is it that the Act does not provide any penalty for a carrier who attempts to charge a subscription in excess of the applicable maximum subscription for the contract? It seems to me that of all places where a penalty should be imposed, it is in this section. Nowhere else in the Act do I see any penalty or any effective sanction to make certain that carriers keep within the maximum subscription rate.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Section 10, subsection 1.

Mr. Renwick: Apart from the suspension and cancellation of the licence.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: That is a pretty heavy penalty. That is pretty drastic.

Mr. Bryden: Would you contemplate a less drastic penalty being available?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: This might be worth thinking about.

Mr. Renwick: My other question is one that has concerned me and I do not think it has been raised before: the difference between two persons who go to get a standard insurance contract—who go to the same carrier and apply for a standard insurance contract. One of them is old and ill; the other one is young and well; is that carrier obligated to issue the contract at the identical subscription rate or is there going to be a differential in the subscription charged for a standard contract by a licensed carrier depending upon the physical health of the applicant, his age, or any other factors?

Hon. Mr. Dymond: If I understand my hon. friend correctly, Mr. Chairman, here again I would point out that premium rates now prevailing will apply, in the case of standard contracts, to people for whom there is no reason to charge the maximum premium. The maximum premium will only apply to those who, because of age or state of past or present health, are considered high insurance risks. This is the very important feature of this bill: It does not interfere with the rates being now charged.

I think I read into the record yesterday, sir, the experiences met with in Alberta where this has been in effect. It has been their finding, specifically documented, that fewer than 15 per cent of the people applying came under the maximum premium rate. We will find that this will obtain to a far lesser degree in Ontario because, as I already pointed out, a very large percentage of those in the group, who will be totally or partially supported by government, will come in this high-cost risk group. Therefore the number of high-cost risks left to be spread over all of the insurance base will be relatively low. I think this should answer the question for the hon. member.

Mr. Renwick: If I understand this correctly, then the issuance of standard medical insurance contracts is going to have no bearing whatsoever on the group insurance principle. The principle of this bill has nothing to do with group insurance; it is purely an individual application for an insurance coverage and so long as the carrier keeps within the maximum rate that is imposed, or which is prescribed, he can charge any number of variable rates despite the fact that provision is made for Medical Carriers Incorporated to have a pooling arrangement.

I was obviously labouring under a misapprehension because it was my understanding that with the number of licensed carriers who are going to be issuing policies, with the ability of those licensed carriers to have a pooling arrangement, the people in the province of Ontario, regardless of their age, physical or mental infirmities, were going to at least have the benefit under this scheme of being considered as members of a group; and that therefore the rate which any individual person was going to have to pay was going to be a rate similar to that which any other person in the province would pay, and would not be related in any way to his age, or physical or mental infirmity.

The reason this concerns me, of course, is that it is the very people who, because of age, or physical or mental infirmity, are going to have more difficulty in paying their premiums who, under this bill, are going to be the persons who are going to have to pay higher rates than persons who have no mental or physical disability. I would like the hon. Minister to comment, because it obviously escaped my attention until just recently that the group principle is completely denied in the plan this government is putting forward.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Of course, Mr. Chairman, the group principle cannot apply in this plan because this does apply to individuals seeking insurance coverage. The difference between the cost of the group coverage and individual coverage is very largely eaten up in the much higher administrative costs dependent upon doing business in this way. It was never intended, nor has it ever been inferred or suggested by anything that we on this side of the House have said, that these individual contracts would be looked upon as a group. We have stated that the present insurance industry principle shall apply, that the industry can rate the applicant or subscriber as it will; but they can never charge a subscriber more than a maximum premium approved by government.

Of course, the high-risk cases can, and might well be, charged the maximum rate. Experience indicates that. But the pooling arrangement will make it possible that this rate will be less than it would otherwise be if there were no pooling arrangements.

The insurance actuaries to whom I have spoken have outlined their thinking in this regard. They believe that in Ontario, with the government having taken up the group whom we will support, either in whole or in part, one bad risk will occur for every 17 good risks; and the intention now is that ten cents of each good risk premium will be put into the pool against the high costs for those who are bad insurance risks. In this way, it will be possible to keep the maximum premium down to the lowest possible level. In other words, $1.70 per month from good risks can be applied to the financing of bad risks. But at no time have we suggested that they would be looked upon or treated as a group, because this is administratively impossible under this system.

Mr. Renwick: Mr. Chairman, I think the confusion in my thinking must have arisen because of the provisions throughout the bill for enrolment periods. I had assumed that enrolment periods meant that, for stated periods of time, groups of people were going to be admitted as eligible persons to make application for standard insurance contracts; and, because they were coming in by way of groups, that therefore they would have all the benefits of a group insurance arrangement. This would mean that, regardless of their age, or physical or mental infirmity, each person would be entitled to the same subscription rate for a standard medical insurance contract from a licensed carrier.

If what the hon. Minister has stated is true, that the differential will depend entirely on the insurability of that risk as long as it keeps within the maximum subscription rate, then there cannot conceivably be any reason for having open enrolment periods and closed enrolment periods. There should certainly therefore be no reason for penalizing a person who does not apply during an open enrolment period by having him subjected to a three-month delay period.

It does not seem to me that the principle which the hon. Minister has stated is consistent in any way with an open enrolment period. I think that the government should seriously consider deleting the open enrolment period if they are going to allow the differential in the premiums which are going to be charged by the licensed carrier, depending on the state of health of the applicant, or the age of the applicant.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Mr. Chairman, the open enrolment period bears absolutely no relationship to the premium, nor to the grouping, nor to anything else. Just because an open enrolment period is set, no waiting period is actually being presented as an inducement to people to become insured during this open enrolment period.

The penalty clause, if you will, the waiting period—if one chooses not to come in during the open enrolment period—obtains, for instance, in hospital insurance now, where there is no open enrolment period. One can join as a pay-direct at any time, but one is subject to a three-month waiting period, during which one pays his regular premium but does not get the advantage of any benefits.

Mr. Chairman, the difference between group premiums and individual premiums, as stated, rests with the much lower administrative costs; a group, insurance-wise, is quite different, as I am sure my hon. friend knows better than I, to a number of people coming in as individual contractors and seeking individual contracts during an open enrolment period. Of course we expect that there will be numbers of people, but they will not be centrally grouped where there is a central body collecting the premium and turning it over to the insurance carrier, all in one lump. This is the difference between the group, insurance-wise, and the group of whom my hon. friend made mention.

Again I must point out, sir, that the bill does not interfere with premiums or premium structures obtaining now. The bill gives us the power to set a maximum premium on which no carrier can charge a subscriber, but it does not interfere with the prepaid competitive pricing such as obtains at the present time, and I gave certain examples that are actually in practice. I gave some figures during second reading, which were in vogue in the province of Alberta. I regret that I have not got them here but they are recorded in Hansard. I did give figures that now actually obtain in the province of Alberta. They are no different from what they were before the government-supported plan went into operation there, and from the experience in other places there is no reason to believe that any different set of circumstances will obtain here in the province of Ontario.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, with regard to the question of open enrolment periods, I would suggest that it is not we but the hon. Minister who is a little confused on the principle of an open enrolment period.

Mr. Chairman: I wonder if the open enrolment question does not come in the next section—

Mr. Bryden: Very well, Mr. Chairman, although it is related to—all right, I am quite willing to leave it.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Mr. Chairman, there is one further point that emerges and I must say that, together with my friend, the hon. member for Riverdale, I am beginning to get a clear picture of the administrative monstrosity that we are being presented with here.

Indeed, Mr. Chairman, it underlines another point. I think it is really ridiculous, almost irresponsible, that the Opposition and the public of this province should be asked to buy a pig in a poke. After all these years of study the hon. Minister—

Mr. Bryden: So-called—

Mr. MacDonald: “So-called” is right—I was going to dignify it with the term “study” for a moment—“procrastination” might be more appropriate.

After all these years of so-called study, the hon. Minister comes before this House and is not yet in a position to state what this maximum figure is going to be. Now what is indicated to us is that the 16 out of 17—if I may take the hon. Minister's figure—I had risk out of 17—the 16 out of 17 will buy their insurance as they do now and they will allegedly be getting the benefits of competitive rates, but the seventeenth, the person who is sustaining all of the consequences and results of illness, because of a basic infirmity, either physical or mental, or because of old age, is the person who is going to continue to take the rap.

The whole principle, it seems to me, of the insurance that we are moving toward is the principle that you should pool your risks, that a person who is unfortunate enough to suffer all the other consequences of ill health, is not going to have added to that the added burden of an extra payment; it is going to be borne by his fellow citizens in keeping with the Christian principle that “I am my brother's keeper,” if one can conceive of Christian principles being established through insurance. But here the hon. Minister tells us quite flatfootedly—and I had not quite realized this—that these people who need insurance most because of the fact that they have an infirmity, are the very people who are going to have to pay the rap for an excessive insurance. But how excessive—and I get back to my main point—we do not know.

The Minister has the affrontery to come into the House to ask us to accept this. He is going to leave it in good faith to the insurance actuaries to come up with a figure, which, I judge now, is certainly going to be in the range of $180 or conceivably even more.
